

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PROSPECTUS.

In announcing their intention of commencing the publication of a new periodical journal, the editors feel that it will be expected of them to assign substantial reasons for the undertaking. It may be said, that the public is burdened with those which are already printed, and that a new journal can with difficulty force its way into notice, amidst such numerous competitors. We feel the force of the remark, but may suggest, that the field in which we propose to labour, is still unoccupied. Our object is, to furnish to the members of the society of Friends, an agreeable and instructive Miscellany. For this purpose, we shall expatiate over a wide and diversified field, of which a general outline will here be delineated. In the first place we shall endeavour to present a selection from the literature of the present day, purified from the exaggerated sentiments, the theatrical manner, the false morality, the perverted sublime, with which the example of a few great geniuses has infected the taste of the age.

We think that the time is peculiarly fitted for such an undertaking. At no former period, has the human intellect been so intensely and variously occupied. We can scarcely turn our eyes to a corner of nature, respecting which, during the last thirty years, there has not been some important discovery. Within that period, new sciences have been created, and all the old ones enlarged in their boundaries. Departments of knowledge, apparently the most unconnected, have been made to shed light on each other. Remote regions of the earth have been explored by the most learned men of the age. The pyramids and the catacombs of Egypt have given up their treasures of ancient lore to the patient genius of Europe; which is restoring to us, from beneath monkish chronicles, the almost obliterated remains of the lost authors of Greece and Rome. Every class of organized beings, down to the doubtful animalcule of the microscope, has been examined and described. The boundaries of the solar system have been passed, and astronomers are now observing its path through the starry heavens, and computing the revolutions and magnitude of the stars themselves. All this prodigious energy of research is guided by a practical good sense, which is continually bringing it to bear upon the common interests of mankind; and enriched by a taste and a cultivated imagination, which beautify whatever they touch, and embellish the grave sciences with all the graces of composition.

From these inexhaustible sources, as instructive and elevating as they are pure and delightful,—in place of the novel and the romance,—we propose to fill a large department of our paper.

A portion of our journal will be devoted to selections from the writings, both in prose and verse, of the great masters of the old English school. A relish for the pure and simple models of composition which they have left, is a sure indication of correct and manly habits of thought, and will be inculcated throughout our pages. There is a natural adaptation of manner to the subject and occasion, which is required both by good taste and sound morals. It is truly refreshing to turn from the exaggerated and overloaded style which has become fashionable, to the simplest yet powerful touches, the happy keeping, the graceful lights and shades, which distinguish the writings of Addison and Swift, of Pope, of Goldsmith, and Cowper.

In another department of our paper—the philanthropic—we can promise to our readers a fund of interesting information. The improvements in education, in prison discipline, in the management of the poor, the sick, and the insane, and in the instruction of the dumb and the blind; the efforts of Christian beneficence throughout the world, in spreading the Scriptures, in civilizing the savage, and loosening the bonds of slavery, will all pass under review.

We shall support, whenever we have fit occasion, the views which the society of Friends entertain respecting many allowed abuses, such as lotteries, gambling, and intemperance.

As we wish to make the paper a fireside companion for Friends throughout this country, we shall study to infuse into it the mild and liberal spirit of our peculiar institutions, and to take from the most scrupulous mind all just cause of distrust respecting the practical tendency of our labours.

The journal will exhibit a summary of passing events, and an account of the various plans for internal improvement which are in operation.

A portion will be set apart for original communications, essays, poetry, and criticism. In this department we have good reason to look for strong support.

An important part of our labours has not yet been alluded to. Attached from conviction of their truth, to the doctrines of the people called Quakers, we make no secret of our opinions. We are well satisfied that many of the evils under which the society now suffers, have arisen from ignorance of our true principles, on the part of many of those who have left our communion. We shall, therefore, endeavour to illustrate, according to our ability, the genius and history of our society. Extracts from, and reviews of the writings of Friends, whether of early or modern date; and dispassionate expositions of the great principles involved in the present controversy, will be frequently and freely given. Nor shall we shrink, when we think the cause of justice requires it, from a free examination of the public conduct of individuals, and a defence of the course pursued by Friends, where we believe it to be misrepresented and calumniated. In doing this, we shall allow no taint of party spirit to darken our pages. The truth itself may sometimes be severe; but whatever it may require at our hands, personalities shall be steadily avoided, and private character held sacred.

A great mass of curious and valuable information relative to the early settlement of Friends in this country, and the lives of individuals distinguished in our annals, is now accessible, and must speedily perish if there be no attempt made to preserve it. Communications upon this subject, as well as upon all those which we have enumerated, are solicited and will be gratefully received.

In venturing upon so untried a course as we have marked out for ourselves, we feel the full force of the objections which many scrupulous minds may urge against it. But having examined carefully the part we have taken; and being convinced that the cause of sound principles has sustained a loss for want of means of refuting calumny, exposing sophistry, and correcting misstatements, we shall rest our defence with perfect confidence upon the temper and discretion which we mean to exercise. If we redeem the pledge we thus give, we trust that we shall succeed in acquiring for our journal a character of fairness and fidelity, that shall give authority to its statements, and enable it to allay much of the irritation which rumour and calumny are sure to excite, and by means of which they have so fatally affected the peace of society. In fine, we enter upon the duties of editors with feelings chastened by a sense of the responsibilities we have assumed, and of the arduousness of the undertaking; yet animated by the prospect of an honourable and useful career.

FOR THE FRIEND.

Curious Observations on a late publication, entitled an Essay on the Simplicity of Truth, signed Catholicus, by J. Phipps. London, 1779, p. 40.

It has been the lot of the people called Quakers, to be misunderstood and misrepresented in a remarkable degree. Attacked at one time as Jesuits and at another as Deists; censured now for their libertinism and now for their bigotry,—there is scarcely a point of their doctrine or a rule of their discipline which they have not been compelled to defend. But these various defences are by so many different hands—are so spread over the face of our history,—are, as regards many of them, so inaccessible to the general reader, and so unattractive in composition and appearance,—that few, even of our own members, are aware of their value, and how complete an exposition of the doctrines and testimonies of the society they present. The “evil times” on which we have fallen, have compelled us to resort to this great armoury, which has been, as it were, locked up from common use. It may be truly said that the polish and temper of the weapons which it has furnished for our warfare with the libertine spirit of the day, have been unexpected both by ourselves and our opponents.

There is scarcely a single false position which has been taken, that is not in some one or other of these neglected volumes, stated and refuted. It is thus that ignorance is perpetually reviving the exploded errors of former times. We may here learn that the whole of these spurious doctrines was sifted and rejected long before the present generation attempted in its restless, innovating spirit, to pull down the ancient edifice of Quakerism, which had been built up amidst persecution and calumny, and is not, therefore, very likely to fall before the withering blast of infidelity.

We have been led into this train of thought by a perusal of the pamphlet, the title of which is prefixed to this article. It contains a decisive argument upon the necessity of maintaining inviolate the whole discipline, and a clear statement of the great principle that the original constitution of the body is its only legitimate rule of action. The reasoning could not be more appropriate to the circumstances of the present day, if it had been penned with a full knowledge of the pretences which men, in the constant breach of our order, set up to be held as the true representatives of Friends; and of the unfair manner in which the protection of the discipline has been claimed by those, who, under its shelter, have been busily engaged in laying waste both our order and our principles.

The pamphlet is an answer to a writer who appears to have been disowned for paying tithes, and who accused Friends of a popish and persecuting spirit in the exercise of discipline. It is chiefly occupied with a discussion respecting tithes, a subject little understood, and, happily, not felt in our own country.

The following extracts refer to the general principles by which all religious societies subsist, and will amply reward a perusal.

“The doctrine and order deliberately and conscientiously received and settled by the united concurrence of the body, it hath all along held it to be its indispensable duty to maintain, not by external severities, but by the gospel methods of instruction, advice, and admonition: and in cases of disorderly walking, which have a tendency to infringe upon the peace and unity of the church, it hath always been principled against proceeding further, than to a suspension of close communion with the parties offending, or in the ultimate, as occasion might call for it, to declare, that they, being departed from the unity of the body, are no longer of it.

“Thus far the society hath found it requisite to proceed, and no further; for it hath constantly denied all authority in Christian churches, either to force an hypocritical conformity, or to inflict such pains and penalties as tend to the privation of life, liberty, or property. Hence it is evident, that the discipline of the Quakers stands not upon the same foundation with that which is supported by violence; but differs from it in nature, as well as in measure.

“Respecting the application of their discipline to injurious and scandalous immoralities, the society considers itself not in the light of a civil magistracy, to whom the punishment of crimes and immoralities belongs, but as a religious body, to which such offences are no further cognizable, than as they are contrary to its principles, and breaches of its religious order. Immoralities, therefore, stand upon the same footing, in regard to the discipline of the society, with the breaches of its rules, and can be no otherwise noticed by it.

“With regard to the occasional extension of its ultimate degree of discipline to offences merely against its principles and rules, I apprehend, that when any religiously united body hath, in its collective capacity, according to the best of its understanding, as received from the holy spirit and the holy scriptures, fixed the terms of its communion, it has a right, in all points it deems material, to see that they are preserved inviolate by its members, and to acknowledge, or reject any, according to their faithfulness, or unfaithfulness thereunto; and where it judges any have justly forfeited their membership, it hath a right to declare it: otherwise, litigious and refractory members might render the church a stage of perpetual contention, a huddle of confusion, or, as a kingdom divided against itself, which cannot stand. For its own preservation therefore, it can do no less than to withdraw itself from every brother that walketh disorderly; (2 Thessa. iii. 3.) which it can do by no other means, but by declaring its disunion with them.

“This is the ultimate process of the people called Quakers; which is not intended by them for the punishment of any, but for keeping the church as clear from disorder as may be.

“This author allows, (page 19,) that every civil society hath an undoubted right to exclude every member that breaks the rules and orders formed by it; but denies it to a Christian Society, because every member has a right to examine and judge whether the society, of which he is a member, is in fact governed by the laws and rules laid down in the sacred records.

“This is a reason why he ought not to be compelled to abide in fellowship with one that he believes not to be so governed; but it cannot entitle him, either to insist upon the society’s rescinding any of its rules, against its own conscience, or retaining him in membership with it, whilst he either professionally, or practically, lives in the disbelief of its principles, or the infringement of its established order. The liberty of individuals to examine, implies not a power in them to control the body, any more in a religious than a civil one.

"Rules are necessary to the support of order in religious, as well as civil societies. There must be some power in the collective body, which is not in every particular singly, to answer the end of order. This cannot be less than a power to accept, or reject, particular members, according to the suitability, or unsuitableness of their conduct with its doctrines and rules. The nature of society, and the fitness of things, require thus much; and the discipline of the Quakers extends no further: it intrudes not upon the civil rights of its members, affects no secular authority, either over their persons or property, but leaves them in a reasonable freedom, either to continue in membership, by a conduct agreeable to its principles and rules, or to separate from it if they think fit.

"The nature of society requires unity and harmony. A continued infraction of the terms of its communion, is not only a continual interruption to the peace of it, but has a tendency to its dissolution. Hence it behoves every regular, united body to support the observance of its rules among its members, for its own peace and preservation: sensible of this, the apostle, in his epistle to the Romans, writes thus: 'I beseech you, brethren, mark them who cause divisions and offences, contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned, and avoid them.' This a church cannot do, but by clearing itself from them; which is not persecution, but a necessary exertion of gospel discipline towards those, who, by their turbulence, might give disturbance to it, or, by good words and fair speeches, deceive the hearts of the simple. (Rom. 16, 17, 18.)

IMPORTANT DECISION.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman in Illinois to his friend in Philadelphia, dated August 23, 1827.

"A late judicial decision of the Supreme Court of Missouri has afforded me infinite pleasure, the more so as I have long had the object very much at heart, and been exceedingly anxious to see it effected.

"I had always been of opinion that the ordinance of Congress of 1787 had emancipated the slaves in the territory North West of the Ohio. But as the people of this state have acquiesced in a contrary decision of an inferior court near 40 years, I had repeatedly urged on the Legislature to make provision for the gradual but speedy emancipation of this remnant of servitude, and had laboured to convince the masters that it was their interest to have such a law adopted, as it would have the effect of lulling the negroes for a time, and preventing their taking the question to the highest Courts of Justice, which must decide in favour of the negroes, and give them instant freedom. One of these unfortunate negroes* having been removed from this state to Missouri, and there having been treated with cruelty, and finally transported and sold in Louisiana, found his way back to St. Louis, and there instituted a suit for his freedom under the ordinance of 1787. The Circuit Court having decided against him, he took his case to the Supreme Court, where although two out of the three Judges were advocates of slavery, the decision was reversed, and it was unanimously decided that he was a freeman. This decision has produced considerable excitement in this state, and it is said there have been several suits instituted by the negroes to recover their liberty—and I cannot for a moment doubt but what our Supreme Court will concur in the decision made in Missouri. If so, this foul blot will be immediately washed out, and the friends of man will have a new cause to felicitate themselves on the progress of correct principles, and on the restoration of his long lost rights."—African Observer.

PICTURE OF THE ATHEISM AND REVOLUTIONARY SPIRIT OF THE FRENCH.

Voltaire, Rousseau, Diderot.

In the eighteenth century, the English were the first people of Europe, in literature as in every thing else. The whole of the modern French philosophy was produced by that of Bacon, Locke, and other Englishmen; at least, it borrowed all its first principles from them. In France, however, it soon assumed an appearance quite different from what it had ever had in England. In Germany, on the other hand, the mighty regeneration of literature in the middle of this century, received its first impetus and ruling direction, principally from the poetry and the criticism of the English.

Voltaire was the first who contributed, in a great degree, to bring the philosophy of Locke and Newton into France. It is singular with what a perversity of genius this man makes use of all the marvellous greatness of nature as revealed to him by the science of England, not for the purpose of exalting the character of the Creator, but for lowering that of men;—how fond he is of dwelling on the insignificance of this earthworm, amidst the immeasurable splendours of stars and planets. As if the spirit, the thought which can comprehend all this universe of suns and stars, were not something greater than they; as if God were some earthly monarch, who, among the millions over which he rules, may well be supposed never to have seen, and almost to have forgotten the existence of some paltry village on the border of his dominions. The eighteenth century in general made no use of the physical knowledge it inherited from the seventeenth, except one extremely hostile to the higher truths of religion. In Voltaire,

* Of this description of negroes there are many hundreds in Missouri, and still a greater number in Illinois, and I am sorry to add that they are now running them off and selling them in the lower country.

indeed, there is no such thing to be found as any regular system of infidelity, scarcely even a single firm principle, or settled philosophical opinion, or even precise form of philosophical doubt. As the sophists of antiquity took a pleasure in showing the versatility and ingenuity of their spirit, by defending first one opinion and then the one exactly opposite to it, so Voltaire wrote one book in favour, and another in contradiction of providence. Yet in so far as he is sincere, that he cannot help letting us see, very plainly, which of these works is his own favourite. Throughout all his writings, whatever be their subject, he cannot resist any opportunity of introducing his impious wit, and showing his aversion for Christianity, and, in part at least, for all religion. In this point of view his spirit operated as a corrosive and destructive engine for the dissolving of all earnest, moral, and religious modes of thinking. Yet it appears to me that Voltaire has done even more harm by the spirit and purpose which he has thrown over history, than by his derision of religion. He felt what was the defect of French literature in this department, as well as in that of poetry. Since the time of the Cardinal Retz, the abundance of historical memoirs, alike interesting from their subjects, and the lively mode of their composition, had increased to such a degree, that they might almost be said to be a proper literature by themselves—and certainly to form one of the most brilliant parts of the whole literature of France. But in consequence of these memoirs, there is no doubt that history declined too much into the tone of conversation, became split into particulars, and lost itself at last, to the great injury of historical truth, in an endless variety of anecdotes. However delightful the perusal of such works may be, they are, after all, only the harbingers and materials of history, not histories in the proper acceptation of the word. At least there is much space intervening between the best possible style of writing such anecdotes, and a style of historical composition such as that of the ancients was, or among the moderns, that of Machiavelli. The French literature possesses many excellent narrators, some well collected, and (even as pieces of writing) praiseworthy tracts concerning the older history of the country, but no truly classical, national, and original work of history. Voltaire was very sensible of this defect in the literature of his nation, and with his usual vanity of universal genius, attempted to supply it himself. That in regard to art he was not entirely unsuccessful, that as a writer of history, even in respect to the mode of composition adapted for works of that kind, he can sustain no comparison, I do not say with the ancients, but even with the best English historians—Hume and Robertson; this is now universally admitted even in France itself. Nevertheless, the spirit in which he viewed history, very soon acquired very great influence even over English writers—particularly Gibbon—and became almost the ruling historical spirit of the eighteenth century. The essence of this mode of thinking in respect to history which proceeded from Voltaire, consists in expressing, on every opportunity, and in every possible form, hatred for monks, clergymen, Christianity, and, in general, for all religion. In regard to politics, its prevalent spirit is a partial, and, in the situation of modern Europe, an absurd predilection for the republican notions of antiquity, accompanied very frequently with an altogether false conception, or at least extremely imperfect knowledge of the true spirit and essence of republicanism. Among the followers of Voltaire this went so far as to take the appearance of a decided and bigotted hatred of all kingly power and nobility, and in general, of all those modes of life and government which have been produced by what is called the feudal system; and all this, in spite of Montesquieu, who characterized and praised with the acuteness and liberality of a true philosopher, what these comparatively ignorant writers were only capable of reviling. How much was set in a false light, how greatly historical truth was injured, and the whole of the past unworthily condemned, begins now to be discovered, since historical inquirers have adopted a more profound and accurate method of research. For after the philosophy of the eighteenth century had entirely accomplished its own destruction, and the religion which it would have overthrown had come victorious out of the struggle, every thing in history and in the past has begun to be seen in a more just and natural point of view. Yet there remain many falsifications, errors, and prejudices, with regard to past ages, which have still to be amended; for in no department did the philosophy of the last century so deeply and so extensively establish its influence as in history, where its wickedness and falseness are, of course, less observable to those who take facts upon trust, than when their spirit is brought distinctly forward in the shape of philosophical doctrine and opinion.

RETIREMENT.

BY COWPER.

Far from the world, O Lord, I flee,
From strife and tumult far;
From scenes where Satan wages still
His most successful war.

The calm retreat, the silent shade,
With prayer and praise agree;
And seem by thy sweet bounty made
For those who follow thee.

There if thy Spirit touch my soul,
And grace her mean abode;
Oh with what peace and joy and love,
She communes with her God!

There, like the nightingale, she pours
Her solitary lays;
Nor asks a witness of her song,
Nor thirsts for human praise.

Author and Guardian of my life,
Sweet source of light divine,
And, (all harmonious names in one,) My Saviour, thou art mine!

What thanks I owe thee, and what love—
A boundless, endless store,
Shall echo through the realms above,
When time shall be no more.

Our Poetical Correspondent, "W." is a young man, belonging to the Society of Friends in this town, only 17 years of age, an apprentice to a mechanical business, and has never enjoyed any other advantages of education than such as are afforded in our common district schools. His effusions indicate, we should say, considering his disadvantages, a genius unparalleled among American poets. Such richness and sublimity of language, such brilliancy of imagination and delicacy of sentiment, have not, we believe, distinguished any of the early productions of the most celebrated modern poets.

OCEAN.

Unfathom'd deep, unfetter'd waste
Of never-silent waves,
Each by its rushing follower chas'd,
Through unillumin'd caves,
And o'er the rocks, whose turrets rude,
E'en since the birth of time,
Hath heard amid thy solitude,
The billow's ceaseless chime.

Thro' what recesses, depths unknown,
Dost thou thy waves impel,
Where never yet a sunbeam shone,
Or gleam of moonlight fell?
For never yet did mortal eyes
Thy gloom-wrapt depths behold,
And naught of thy dread mysteries,
The tongue of man hath told.

What, though proud man presume to hold
His course upon thy tide,
O'er thy dark billows uncontroll'd
His fragile bark to guide—
Yet who, upon thy mountain waves,
Can feel himself secure,
While sweeping o'er thy yawning caves,
Deep, awful and obscure?

But thou art mild and tranquil now—
Thy wrathful spirits sleep,
And gentle billows, calm and slow
Across thy bosom sweep.
Yet where the dim horizon's bound
Rests on thy sparkling bed,
The tempest-cloud, in gloom profound,
Prepares its wrath to shed.

Thus, mild and calm in youth's bright hour,
The tide of life appears,
When fancy paints, with magic power,
The bliss of coming years;
But clouds will rise, and darkness bring
O'er life's deceitful way,
And cruel disappointment fling
Its blight on hope's dim ray.

Haverhill, (Massachusetts,) 1st mo. 1827. W.

From England.—The ship Antioch, arrived at New York, from Liverpool, brought a London paper of the 3d ult. No further arrangements in the new ministry were made public. It was however said Mr. Herries had accepted the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The disturbances in Catalonia had become more serious. Mr. Lamb, the British Minister at the Court of Madrid, had demanded an explanation as to the extent of the disturbances, and the measures adopted to prevent them, and in consequence all the Counsellors of State and Ministers, had been summoned to St. Ildefonso, to prepare an answer, and regulate the number of troops to be sent against Portugal.

The Russians gained a victory on the 17th of July, over the Persians, on the banks of the Araxes.

Thomas Young, of London, has been chosen a Foreign Associate of the Paris Academy of Sciences.

Nothing of interest had occurred in Greece since the fall of Athens. The war dragged heavily, without much activity on either side. Lord Cochrane was at Poros with the Hellas, and some smaller vessels. A great naval force was assembled at Smyrna, of French, English, Russians and Austrians; about twenty sail were in Smyrna, and many in the neighbouring ports. The whole of the American squadron was in the Archipelago, destined for Smyrna.

Mr. Washington was shot by the Greeks in a broil at Acropolis, and died on board the English line of battle ship Asia, Admiral Codrington.

Infant School.—Those who feel an interest in the welfare and moral improvement of the rising generation of the poorer classes of society, who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, will, doubtless learn with pleasure, that in the Infant School in Chester-street, which was opened on Monday, the 1st inst. with 50 scholars, there where on Saturday upwards of 90, and that there is every prospect that within a week or two the whole number that can be accommodated in that school, viz. about 130, will be entered. About a fifth part of the whole have paid the little sum required, that is, three cents per week. This requisition is made, not for the sake of the amount to be received, but to save the feelings of such parents, as from a pride which springs from a laudable motive, are unwilling to have their children taught by charity.—Am. Daily Advertiser.

Stockton and Darlington Railway.—The proprietors, who belong chiefly to the Society of Friends, encountered a good deal of opposition in Parliament and elsewhere; but the work promises to remunerate them in the most ample manner. The cost of the railway, which is twenty-five miles long, and is carried over two hills by inclined planes, was less than 200,000*l.* 120,000 tons of minerals and merchandize have been conveyed along it in the course of the year expired, generally at the rate of 2*d.* per ton per mile, including haulage, and wagons found; and the receipts for tonnage have exceeded 2,000*l.* per month. The coaches that ply on it have travelled 45,469 miles, carrying passengers at the rate of 1*d.* per mile outside, and 1½*d.* inside, with a velocity of eight miles an hour, and without one single accident occurring to injure man, horse, or coach. In consequence of this cheap and easy conveyance the amount of intercourse between Stockton and Darlington has increased more than tenfold—the coach formerly having plied only three times a week. Government, too, is not without its share of the benefit, for the stage-coach duty has risen from 28*l.* per annum to 140*l.*—Liv. Adv.

Robert A. Parrish has made a trip in his steamboat up the Delaware to Easton in 36 hours and 15 minutes; distance between 90 and 100 miles.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH, 13, 1827.

As a part of the design of the Editors in establishing the FRIEND, is to circulate information relating to their own peculiar interests, amongst the members of the Society of Friends, we have been restrained from the usual practice of advertising our plan in the common newspapers. The Prospectus on our first page will explain at large the course we mean to pursue.—In order to give it an extensive circulation, and at the same time exhibit a specimen of our paper, we have printed a large edition of this number, which will be widely distributed. Persons out of the city, who are disposed to encourage us, will receive their papers by mail, or as they may direct, upon remitting to our publisher a year's subscription in advance. The second number will be printed in two weeks, and thenceforth the papers will be regularly issued once a week. Although we are assured of having enlisted sufficient talents, learning and zeal in our cause to support the Journal with credit, we earnestly solicit original communications for our pages. As "Moderation" is inscribed on our door posts and our threshold, we shall always think ourselves bound to scrutinize closely, whatever may be offered for our pages relating to Principles and Men. We shall endeavour to render the lighter department of our journal acceptable to our young readers, without making it frivolous.

———Happily to steer
From grave to gay, from lively to severe, has always been accounted the great secret of winning the youthful mind to the love of virtue.

We are desirous of rendering this miscellany a favourite parlour and fireside companion with Friends throughout America. The want of a common medium of intellectual intercourse has long been felt among us. If we can by means of this paper, direct our young people to elevated pursuits and studies, assist in guiding their taste, in maturing their judgments, in forming them to habits of manly and serious thinking—in cultivating in them sentiments congenial with the doctrines and testimonies of our religious Society—our highest ambition as to this enterprise will be satisfied.

COMMUNICATION.

THE BURIAL.

There is scarcely any circumstance connected with the recent separation of the followers of Elias Hicks from the religious Society of Friends, that is productive of more pernicious consequences, than the misrepresentations which are circulated, with the view of producing excitement, and awakening prejudices against those persons who continue their attachment to the long established government and principles of the Society. In the country, especially, the mischievous effects of this practice are lamentably obvious. Individuals whose sources of information are very few, and who have not the means of detecting the impositions practised upon them, frequently have their minds prejudiced by the representations of those on whose veracity they have been accustomed to rely with implicit confidence, but who, under the influence of party feeling, are induced to give them a colouring which the truth will not justify. To this cause may be attributed the antipathy to Philadelphia Friends which is apparent in some places, and which has contributed in no inconsiderable degree to protract the unhappy dissensions that have so long agitated our once peaceful community. Could those persons whose feelings toward their brethren have been embittered by false reports, ascertain correctly the undisguised truth, there are few among them who would not perceive that their prejudices are unfounded—that the pictures of oppression, of persecution and intolerance which have been exhibited to their view, with such high colouring, are mere phantoms of an imagination diseased by envy and ill will.

A circumstance has recently taken place in this city, which furnished a favourable opportunity for indulging this odious habit. Our readers will readily perceive that we allude to the burial of a deceased member of the Northern District monthly meeting, who had lived within the limits of the late monthly meeting of Green street.

The facts respecting this painful event have been shamefully, and we may add, wilfully misrepresented, to the disadvantage of the Society in Philadelphia. Justice to the injured reputation of the parties concerned, demands that the facts should be impartially and accurately stated.

In attempting this unpleasant duty, it will be proper first to observe, that the burial grounds belonging to Friends of Philadelphia, are held in joint tenure by trustees appointed in each monthly meeting. The trustees are merely the instruments by which the title to the property is held, and have no more control over it, than the deeds which record the conveyance. A committee of two Friends is appointed in each of the monthly meetings to act jointly, to whom is entrusted the entire care and control of the burying grounds. This committee employ the sexton, and to them only he is accountable—it is their business to give him directions relative to the duties of his office, and in a word, to have the exclusive oversight and direction of the grave yards.

Beside this committee, there is another appointed also by each monthly meeting, to receive applications for interment and grant the requisite order to the sexton for opening the ground—here their duties cease. The trustees have no right whatever to interfere with the duties of either of these committees, and we believe there never was an instance in which they attempted such interference, except in the recent transactions.

There were five monthly meetings in this city, all branches of, and subordinate to the quarterly meeting of Philadelphia. Each of them appointed such committees as we have described. Green street monthly meeting, one of the five, declared itself independent of Philadelphia quarterly meeting, and, in violation of the discipline, applied to, and was received as a component part of Abington quarter; which meeting never had, nor can it have, either collectively, or by its subordinate meetings, any title to, or control over, the property of Friends in Philadelphia.

In consequence of the disorderly manner in which Green street monthly meeting had been held; its continued disregard of the discipline, and its rejection of the authority of its superior meeting, to which "the compact agreed to by both parties," made it accountable, the quarterly meeting of Philadelphia was subjected to the painful necessity of dissolving it, and attaching its members to the monthly meeting for the Northern District, of which they had formerly been a part. The dissolution of the monthly meeting, of consequence, released from their appointments all those who acted under its authority, and among the rest, the two committees whose duties we have defined. Their existence necessarily ceased simultaneously with that of the meeting which created them.

Thus circumstanced, it became the obvious duty of the committee entrusted with the care and control of the burying ground, to inform the sexton that orders for the interment of persons who deceased within the limits of the late monthly meeting of Green street, would hereafter be granted by the committee of the Northern District, of which monthly meeting Green street Friends had now become members. A desire was generally felt that this business might be arranged in the most friendly manner possible, and every facility afforded for procuring the requisite orders for interment. In accordance with this amicable feeling, the monthly meeting of the Northern District appointed several Friends resident within the former limits of Green street meeting to grant orders, and as threats of violence had been repeatedly held out, endeavours were used to remove every shadow of excuse for resorting to any disgraceful or illegal measures.

Notwithstanding the dissolution of Green street monthly meeting by its superior meeting, a number of individuals, regardless of the subordination which they owed to the quarter, continued to assemble at the meeting house, under the assumed title of a monthly meeting; and although they declared their connexion with Philadelphia quarter to be dissolved, and that they had become members of Abington, yet they attempted to interfere with, and to act in the management of the concerns of Friends of Philadelphia, as though they still considered themselves a monthly meeting belonging to their quarter.

These preliminary statements will enable our readers to judge of the position of affairs at the time when the individual deceased, whose interment has given rise to so much misrepresentation. We shall relate the circumstances of the transaction minutely; and as our information is from undoubted authority, the statement may be implicitly relied upon.

The individual died on the 29th of the 8th month, and immediately on receiving intelligence of the occurrence, a near connexion called upon the family and offered his services to procure the interment in the regular order of Society, by an order from the committee of the Northern District monthly meeting. This friendly offer was declined, on the ground that another relative (who was an officer in the meeting at Green street) had taken on himself the necessary attention to the obsequies. It is proper to observe, that soon after the decease took place, a consultation was held among some of the leading members of the meeting, to decide what was to be done. We should have thought that the sad and subdued feeling which the dissolution of a fellow being was calculated to produce, would have calmed the tumult of party feeling, and hushed every unkind and angry emotion. But not so—the solemn accompaniments of death were to be employed as a means of kindling excitement. It was determined to force an interment, on an order from the committee whose powers had become defunct by the dissolution of Green street monthly meeting.

Previously to learning that such a conclusion had been come to, an order for the interment of the deceased was signed by Leonard Snowden and Edward Randolph, two of the committee appointed by the Northern District monthly meeting.—Anxious to evince the friendly disposition which was entertained toward the members of Green street, and to afford every facility to the bereaved relatives, Edward Randolph and Joseph Rakestraw called upon the father of the deceased, and presented him with the order—he declined receiving it. They then waited upon the relative before alluded to, who had charge of the funeral arrangements, and tendered the order to him—he also refused it. Some mild persuasion was used to convince him of the propriety of accepting it, rather than resort to violent measures, but he gave the most peremptory refusal, observing that he would rather bury the corpse in his own yard, than receive the order from them.

It should be particularly noticed, that the reception of the order by any individual, could in no way affect any supposed right which the meeting at Green street might claim—no principle would have been compromised as regarded it, and the burial might have been peaceably and respectably solemnized in the regular order of society. Friends had now done every thing that brotherly kindness and a just sense of propriety could possibly require; and finding the parties determined to proceed to unlawful violence, they had only calmly to await the issue.

On the morning of the 30th of 8th month, John Chapman informed the committee appointed to the care of the burying ground, that the death had occurred, and stated his belief that a forcible entry would be made into the grave yard, in order to inter the corpse. In the afternoon of the same day, Henry Cope, one of the committee, went out to the western burial ground, and was there informed by the person who resides on the premises, that Gabriel Middleton and William Stevenson had been there; that Gabriel Middleton had broken open the gate, by forcing out the staple which secured the lock, and that they had admitted a person into the yard, who by their direction was then employed in digging a grave. Henry Cope went to this man, and inquired his authority for opening the ground, and by whom he was employed. He replied that one of the persons was John Simmons—(who is not a member of the Society of Friends) the names of the others he had either forgotten, or was not disposed to give. He was then informed by Henry Cope, that as one of the committee appointed to have the care of the property, it was his duty to forbid his digging the grave. The man replied, that the persons by whom he was employed, had promised to indemnify him, and intimated that he should not desist. Henry Cope then withdrew; and neither he nor any other member of the committee visited the ground again until some time after the interment had taken place. On the following morning, the 31st of 8th month, a forcible entry into the grave yard was again made, and the body interred; but no opposition of any kind was offered to its accomplishment, except simply forbidding the grave digger to proceed, as has been already related.

Such are the facts connected with this extraordinary proceeding. We have given a plain and impartial narration of them, and leave every reader to draw his inference. We apprehend, however, that every unprejudiced mind must perceive that the dignity and authority of the quarterly meeting, the preservation of good order, and the support of our christian discipline, all required that the course adopted should be taken—and we can perceive in it nothing incompatible with that friendly feeling which ought ever to be maintained to ward all our brethren.

OBSERVER.

The Sheffield (English) Courant, says—Hannah Kilham, our persevering townswo-man, is preparing for a second visit to Africa. Her former one was but very short, being undertaken at the express request of the friends who promoted her journey. She remained there, however, sufficiently long to observe the wants and to form plans for the improvement of the poor Africans; and, since her return, she has been actively employed in acquiring a knowledge of the different dialects spoken among the black in the colony of Sierra Leone. In the attainment of this knowledge she has availed herself of every means in her power, such as visiting the different merchant ships, from that coast, conversing with the captains and individuals that may have been living there for any length of time, and collecting what information she could from the most intelligent of the natives who have visited this country. In this way she has been able to form two vocabularies of two different dialects much spoken among the negroes; and it is her intention on her arrival in Africa to form schools, and catechise the children in their own language, as far as she is able, and also to acquaint herself with the different dialects spoken by the captured negroes, of various tribes, collected in Sierra Leone. We heartily wish her success, believing with her, that to Christianize the African, we must educate him, and that the abolition of slavery to be effectual, must commence amongst the blacks themselves; and this may be accomplished by raising the moral standard in their own hearts, by teaching them to know themselves—their duty to God, and their neighbour.

A curious but melancholy fact is mentioned respecting the conduct of the Turks, to the persons who, from choice, remained in Athens. Those who left the garrison were honourably protected, and seven Bays of consequence accompanied them as hostages; but of the Greeks, who preferred to remain in their ancient city, three were killed, as a sacrifice. It almost surpasses belief that such barbarous superstition can exist in Europe, and among a people engaged in constant intercourse with the most civilized nations in the world.

SKETCHES OF EARLY PENNSYLVANIA HISTORY.—No. 1.

The early annals of Pennsylvania are possessed of a high and peculiar interest; they exhibit the rare example of a government founded without force, supported without wars, and extended without martial conquests. Her illustrious founder was deeply sensible that the doctrines and precepts of the Christian religion are designed to have a practical influence, not only on the private conduct of individuals, but also to regulate and control the character and actions of communities and nations. Hence we find the early government of Pennsylvania founded upon the deep and broad bases of justice and truth, and for many years, her practice illustrated by, and made conformable to so auspicious a theory.

In her mild and just policy towards the Indians, in her Christian endeavours in favour of the much injured Africans, in her enlightened amendments of the penal code, in her labours for the promotion of general education,—Pennsylvania has a high and well deserved title to the veneration of the friends of humanity.

To the members of our religious society, the early annals of our state possess a deep and peculiar interest.—They show us what our forefathers were, what they professed, and what they practised; they illustrate, by a positive application to human affairs, the excellency and beauty of our mild and benevolent profession, and they furnish a powerful incentive to emulate the example and to follow in the footsteps of our dignified predecessors.

I have often feared that the society at the present day, was but little acquainted with the history of the only government in which they have ever exercised exclusive or permanent influence,* and that too many were ignorant of the actual advances made by our ancestors in the science of government and in the practice of philanthropy. In order, therefore, to exemplify in some degree the history of primitive Pennsylvania, we propose, in a series of short essays, to present such facts as we have in possession, or may acquire in the course of our reading. Notices of distinguished men, of prominent features of policy, and of the exertions of benevolence and philanthropy, will be given without strict attention to arrangement or order of time, and we may also occasionally bring into view distinguished men and interesting measures of more recent date. The extracts in the present number, are taken from "Notes on the Provincial Literature of Pennsylvania, by Thomas I. Wharton, Esq. printed in vol. 1, part 1, of the Memoirs of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania."

NOTES, &c.

The first settlers of Pennsylvania were, chiefly, members of a religious society which has been supposed to decry and undervalue human learning, and to place literature, as well as painting and music, on its index expurgatorius. However truly this may have been said of some of the early teachers of this sect, certainly the colonial history of Pennsylvania affords no materials for the support of the theory. It is believed that no one of the states of this

* If New Jersey may be supposed to present an exception to the above remark, it will be recollected that the government so soon passed into other hands, that the influence of the society in legislation, must have been at least of comparatively small account.

Union can exhibit so early, so continued, and so successful a cultivation of letters, as Pennsylvania. Hardly had the emigrants sheltered themselves in their huts—the forest trees were still standing at their doors, when they established schools and a printing press—to teach and to be enlightened: literally inter silvas querere verum. Within four years from the time that our ancestors landed in the wilderness, a printing press was at work in Philadelphia, sowing broadcast the seeds of knowledge and morality; and only a few months after the arrival of William Penn, public education was attainable at a small expense. It appears from the journals of the provincial council, that in December 1683, Enoch Flower undertook to teach school "in the town," as it was then called, "of Philadelphia." His charges, a record of which is still preserved, indicate the simplicity of the period. "To learn to read English, four shillings a quarter; to write, six shillings, &c. boarding a scholar—to wit, diet, lodging, washing, and schooling, 10 pounds for the whole year"—little more than what is now paid for a single quarter's schooling alone, in some of our institutions.

Six years afterwards, a public school, or as it would now be called, a seminary or college, was founded by the society of Friends in this city. The preamble of the charter granted in 1701, proves how deeply the true principles of morals and philosophy were anchored in the minds of the founders and rulers of Pennsylvania. "Whereas," it recites, "the prosperity and welfare of any people depend, in a great measure, upon the good education of their youth, &c. and qualifying them to serve their country and themselves, by breeding them in reading, writing, and learning of languages, and useful arts and sciences, suitable to their sex, age, and degree; which cannot be effected in any manner so well as by erecting public schools for the purpose aforesaid, &c." Proud says that the poor were taught gratis in this institution.* It is curious and instructive to compare the doctrines of this instrument, with those which had been promulgated thirty years before, and were at that time acted upon in a neighbouring province. "I thank God," said the governor of Virginia, "we have not free schools nor printing; and I hope we shall not have these hundred years. For learning has brought disobedience, and heresy, and sects into the world; and printing has divulged them libels upon the government—God keep us from both." The first preceptor in the Friend's public school, was George Keith, afterwards sufficiently famous. His income from this office seems to me considerable for the times. He was allowed a salary of 50*l.* per annum, with a house for his family, a school-house, and the profits of the school besides, for one year. For two years more his school was to be made worth 120*l.* per annum. One year, however, appears to have been quite enough for the restless spirit of George Keith. Vol. I, part I, p. 104, Hist. Soc. Mem.

Printing, which the governor of Virginia had also deprecated with so much holy horror, was introduced into Pennsylvania so early as 1686. It is worthy of remark and remembrance, that this province was, comparatively speaking, far earlier than her sister colonies in the use of the press, and, consequently, in the general dissemination of literature. I have already stated, that a printing press was in operation in Philadelphia only four years after the landing of William Penn. In Massachusetts, where learning and the arts have been cultivated with great success, printing was not introduced until eighteen years after its settlement. In New York, not until seventy-three years after the settlement; in the other colonies, not for a much longer period. Page 105.

The first printer that settled in Pennsylvania, was William Bradford, a native of Leicester, in England, and a member of the society of Friends, who emigrated in 1682-3, and landed on the spot where Philadelphia was soon afterwards laid out, before a house was built. It is believed that he set up his first printing press at Kensington, in the neighbourhood of the treaty tree. Page 105.

Literature and science received ample encouragement both by words and deeds, from the provincial government of Pennsylvania. Before one English foot had been placed on the soil of the colony, the venerable and illustrious founder issued a manifesto, containing the soundest doctrines of political philosophy, and the most convincing reasons in support of them. The following passages deserve to be constantly borne in mind, in every district of this country. "Governments, like clocks, go from the motion men give them, and as governments are made and move by men, so by them they are ruined too. Wherefore governments rather depend upon men than men upon governments. Let men be good, and the government cannot be bad: if it be ill, they will cure it. But if men be bad, let the government be ever so good, they will endeavour to warp and spoil it to their turn. That, therefore, which makes a good constitution, must keep it: viz. men of wisdom and virtue, — qualities, that because they descend not with worldly inheritances, must be carefully propagated by a virtuous education of youth; for which after ages will owe more to the care and prudence of founders, and the successive magistracy, than to their parents for their private patrimonies." Page 151, 152.

The 12th article of the frame of government provides in express terms, "That the governor and provincial council shall erect and order public schools, and encourage and reward the authors of useful sciences and laudable inventions in the provinces." Among the committees into which the provincial council was to be divided, was "a committee of manners, education, and arts, that all wicked and scandalous living may be prevented, and that youth may be successively trained up in virtue, and useful knowledge and arts." Such were the sentiments entertained at the outset of the government, and the provisions for enforcing them. The same principles appear to have been cherished at every stage of the colonial history, of which one example has already been given in the extract from the character of Friends' school. B.

The Governor of Pennsylvania has given his consent according to law, that a part of the line of canal along the Delaware, beginning at Bristol and extending eighteen miles, shall be put under contract. This will be done on Saturday next, and the excavation will be actively commenced as soon as possible.

We have taken pains to ascertain the present situation of the several canal lines which have been provided for by law. In the summer of 1826, contracts were made for a canal from the mouth of Swatara to the mouth of Juniata, 24 miles, and from Pittsburgh to the mouth of Kiskiminitas, 50 miles. These sections will be open for navigation in the spring of 1828. During the present season contracts have been entered into for extending these lines, from the mouth of Juniata to Northumberland, 49 miles; from the same point to Lewistown or Juniata, 48 miles; and from the mouth of Kiskiminitas to Blairsville, 45 miles; of these, one section beginning at the mouth of Kiskiminitas and extending about 20 miles to the Salt-works, will be navigable next spring, and the remainder in the spring of 1829. A part of the French Creek feeder has also been commenced, and will nearly be completed this season. When operations on the Delaware have commenced, there will be about 220 miles of canal in a train of rapid completion.

During the present season, the following surveys have been commenced, and will be finished in time for the next session of the legislature.

1. A survey on both sides of the North Branch of the Susquehanna, from the south line of the state to Northumberland.

2. A survey for a canal between the mouth of the Swatara and the Schuylkill or Delaware, through Lancaster and Chester counties.

3. A survey for a railroad on the same route.

4. A survey for a canal along the Susquehanna, from the mouth of Swatara, to the point at which the rail road line leaves that river. This point, it is believed, will prove to be in the neighbourhood of Columbia.

5. A survey from Carpenter's point on the Delaware, to the city of Philadelphia.

6. A further examination of the several summits between the west branch of Susquehanna and the Alleghany rivers, with a view to determine whether a continued water communication be practicable. Levels have been taken in all the proposed points of connexion by Messrs. Wilson and Mitchell, and the waters have been measured. An engineer will be despatched in a few days to re-examine the two summits which appear most favourable, and report upon this interesting subject.

7. A Survey from Pittsburgh to Lake Erie, by the Beaver and Chenango route.

8. A survey between the same points by way of French creek, across the Waterford and Conneaut summits.

It is intended, if possible, during the present season, to explore the routes between the Delaware and North Branch of Susquehanna, by way of the Lehigh and Nescopeck, and by Broadhead creek and the Lockowanna, a communication which the commencement of the Lehigh and Delaware canals have rendered exceedingly interesting to a large section of the state.—Pennsylvania Gazette.

From Princeton, N. J. we learn that the deliberations of the Convention for Internal Improvement, which sat in that city last week, resulted in a recommendation to pursue the old plan of cutting a canal from the Delaware to Washington, N. J. at the same time to petition the legislature of the state to authorize a survey of the same route, with reference to its applicability to a railroad, of the probable cost of such a conveyance, as well as to the amount of receipts that would arise from transportation.—U. S. Gaz.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We feel grateful to the numerous friends and correspondents who have already pledged themselves to support us; many of their communications which could not be inserted in the present number, shall receive early attention. The very interesting narrative, in particular, of the exclusion of Friends in various parts of the country, from their own meeting houses, will be inserted in our next number. As the second number will not be published for two weeks, we request those who wish to become subscribers to forward to our publisher their names, with TWO DOLLARS, the price of a year's subscription.

Cursory Observations on a late publication, entitled an Essay on the Simplicity of Truth, signed Catholicus, by J. Phipps. London. 1779, pp. 40.

"The society proceeds no further in any case, than it believes itself necessarily obliged to do as a Christian body; and it is warranted also by the laws of the land, in showing its disunity with such of its members as break its rules and orders. This I have understood hath been publicly declared by one of the Judges in the Court of King's Bench to be the common privilege of all societies of tolerated Dissenters.

"As offences against the rules and tenets of a society, though not in themselves deemed immoral, when overlooked or indulged, are liable to make way for, and lead into things more pernicious, it is incumbent on the society to deal with the disorderly, as well as immoral members, for the prevention of evil consequences both to themselves and the body; and if such refuse the advice of the church, they justly incur the sentence of our Saviour, who directs it as a duty, in particulars, to hear the church, and that he who shall neglect to hear it, be accounted as a heathen man, or a publican: (Matt. 18. 19.) that is, as one not in membership with it. This must be done by an exclusive act of the church; for we esteem this to be preceptive and obligatory to the body, as well as to its particular members.

"In this direction of our Lord, here is something besides acts of immorality to be censured; i. e. the neglect of a member to hear the church. Can this intend no more than to afford it a bare hearing, without any further observance! To what purpose would the former be without the latter? There is certainly a medium between due observance, and absolute slavery; and I should think this medium can hardly admit either of an open opposition to the rules of the church, or an endeavour to expose it to publick censure and derision.

"The Apostle Paul, sensible of the necessity of unity and harmony in the church, was zealously concerned that the brethren might not walk disorderly, but in all things consistently with the truth, and in unity one with another. 'I beseech you, brethren,' saith he, 'by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment.' (1 Cor. 1. 10.)

"Besides God's exterior dispensation of his written law, he still condescends, according to his ancient promise, to teach his people immediately by his spirit in their hearts. This is the true basis of the right of private judgment: and as this is a privilege sacred to every man, so it is to every religious society; no one of which is entitled to impose upon others in matters of doctrine or order; neither hath any member of a church a right to impose himself upon it contrary to its established rules.

"The respectable John Locke saith, 'No man by nature is bound unto any particular church or sect, but every one joins himself voluntarily to that society, in which he believes he has found that profession and worship which is truly acceptable to God.' — 'As no man is bound to any church against his particular conscience, neither is any church bound to any man against that rule and order established therein, according to its collective conscience.' — 'I hold, that no church is bound, by the duty of toleration, to retain any such person in her bosom, as, after admonition, continues obstinately to offend against the laws of the society. For these being the condition of communion, and the bond of the society, if the breach of them were permitted without any animadversion, the society would immediately be thereby dissolved.' Letter on Toleration, 4th edition, page 10 and 13.

"Liberty of conscience is every man's right, and no less the right of every society; and as no man ought to be forcibly imposed upon in that respect, neither should any society suffer itself to be imposed upon against its judgment by any man, whatever his pretence may be. Nor is that man who attempts it, doing as he would be done by, in such attempt, nor showing that regard to the conscience of the body which he challenges to his own. The liberty of individuals Catholicus pleads for, would prove the slavery of society.

"The religious liberty of a person consists not in a power to impose himself upon any religious society, against the rules of its communion; but in a freedom to join himself to one, whose rules, doctrine, and worship, are conformable to his conscience; or to disjoin himself from one, where all, or any of them, are not so.

"Every one, who hath espoused opinions different from those of the people called Quakers, is at liberty to leave them, and join himself to any other people. This cannot with propriety be stiled hard or unjust measure. Freedom of inquiry is allowed, and liberty of action is allowed, so far as can be consistent with the nature of society; which cannot be properly supported, if its members are suffered to live in the breach of its rules and orders without animadversion.

The intention of our discipline is not a dominion over the faith, or an abridgment of the just liberty, of any; it is not to persecute, for that is to pursue with malignity, and to punish for religion; which the society is firmly principled against. It seeks not the hurt of any, but the good of all, and that purity of manners, love, peace, and harmony, may, as much as possible, be preserved throughout the whole body, on the basis of truth.

"It is allowed, that 'every one must judge for himself;' but not that every one must judge for the church too. For, what strange confusion would this introduce! One member would demand this to be the rule, another the contrary; how should both be satisfied, and the church subsist in unity and harmony? Is the liberty of individuals to destroy the liberty of churches? Is every church to be subjected to an anarchy of jarring consciences, or to be determined by the united suffrage of its own? How shall it steer safely amidst such multifarious and clashing currents, without danger of making shipwreck of faith, and of a good conscience?

"Some things which the society esteems of moment, Catholicus deems of little or no concern, and blames it for exercising its discipline at all about them; and when any professing themselves in membership with it, show a dissent, and appear in opposition to its rules, he would have us to understand, it is the society that differs from them, not they from the society, and that all the contention and discord that ensues is to be charged to its account: for they, peaceable creatures, seek nothing but the full, just, and absolute liberty, of framing rules for the body, so as may best suit with their own fancies, opinions, and practices. By the same easy principles, such a perfect conformity with the whole world may be cultivated, as shall produce that kind of universal love and harmony, which would render the church, like Babylon, 'the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird' (Rev. 18. 2.)

The anguish of the sympathetic heart is keen, but no less exalted are its gratifications.

PICTURE OF THE ATHEISM AND REVOLUTION-

In regard to Voltaire, I must observe that he seems to have been actuated by motives of a personal nature, which render the spirit of his history still more narrow and unjust. It is evidently his purpose to make us believe that all the ages before that of Lewis XIV. were ages of darkness, and that even then, all nations except his were mere hordes of barbarians. This much exalted monarch plays this important part in the historical and intellectual drama of Voltaire, because he, it seems, while the whole earth was wrapped in chaos and barbarism, was the first who pronounced a creative FIAT LUX. Yet the great writers of the time of Lewis, and even Newton and Locke, were, after all, only the first faint rays of the coming splendour. The mid-day sun of entire illumination and freethinking, did not, according to Voltaire's opinion, manifest himself till somewhat later. But however inclined he was in the general to flatter the foolish vanity of his nation; yet, in many moments of mirth or displeasure, he spoke either from levity or bitterness, in a very different tone, as, for example, in that well known saying of his, that "the character of a Frenchman is made up of the tiger and the ape." In other more moderate but not less caustic expressions, it is easy to see how thoroughly Voltaire had studied and comprehended his countrymen. But this was a piece of knowledge which he never displayed except by accident.

Even Montesquieu contributed to the formation of this philosophy of the eighteenth century; principally, as I apprehend, because he neglected to give any rule or standard of unity to that immense collection of admirable political remarks and opinions which he laid before the world. This was exactly in compliance with what was then the usual fashion in every department of thought and action. The erudition, the genius and powerful reflections of this great and remarkable writer, contributed only to increase the general relaxation of all principle; for the spirit of the age, being furnished with no guiding rule, floated hither and thither amidst that vast sea of political facts and precepts, like a ship without anchor or compass, upon the waves of the ocean.

The tendency to sublime and elevating thoughts, even to religious feelings and views, is so strong in our nature, and occasions to call these forth are so profusely scattered over the world around us, that we cannot be at all surprised to find that many of the great French naturalists remained entirely, or at least in a great measure, free, from the prevalent spirit of irreligion, and have even here and there risen to a style of reflection much higher than that of their age. Although many of his opinions do not harmonize with revealed religion, and many others cannot stand the test of philosophy,—although he himself was by no means free from the material fetters of the entire physical system of philosophy which was then in fashion; yet I can never help considering the great Buffon as one, who is entitled to be classed, at least in the way of comparison, with the better thinkers of the eighteenth century. Among the latter authors, I may just allude to the zealous and intellectual Bonnet.

The social manners and constitution of modern Europe, and more particularly of France, had become, in very many respects, so remote from nature, that we can scarcely wonder that a restless and inquiring spirit should have gone entirely to the opposite extreme. But how little fitted admiration and respect for nature alone are to supply human life with a proper rule of conduct, the example of Rousseau affords a sufficient proof. In regard to the feeling and zeal which animated him, Rousseau, as a reasoner, is not only superior to Voltaire, and all other French philosophers of the last century, but of a class entirely different from them. The influence which he exerted over his age and nation was perhaps only on that account the more hurtful. It is only when a strong mind, striving passionately in quest of truth, pursues its researches in a wrong direction, and embraces error in room of it, that error assumes a form of real danger, and becomes capable of seizing possession of generous natures, whose general principles are in an unsettled state. The wit of Voltaire contributed very much to unsettle and relax principle, and thereby paved the way for Rousseau. But this man's impetuous and overwhelming eloquence drew into the whirlpool of error, many whom the mere sophistry of wit and pleasantry could never have led astray. It is true that at first Rousseau's pictures of savage life, and his theory of a pure democracy of reason, gave rise to more wonder than conviction. But as it was this man's fortune to become the founder of a new system and method of education, wherein the development of the individual man is supposed to be best conducted upon the isolated principle of seclusion, and entirely without regard to his situation as a citizen, we need not be astonished to find that at a somewhat later period even the wildest of his dreams about natural politics found both admirers and defenders. After having seen that the extension of physical science contributed very much, in its misapplied condition, to immorality, irreligion, and even atheism, it is no wonder that a direction equally culpable and dangerous was given by the philosophers of the eighteenth century to the improved knowledge of men and nations. But however much men might refine and adorn their descriptions of American savages, in order to promote the idea of the possibility of natural perfection, there remained always a few points in the testimony of every traveller which presented unsurmountable difficulties to the admirers of barbarity. In Voltaire, on the other hand, and in many other French writers of his time, we may observe an equally absurd predilection, another extreme—one as far removed as can well be from the wild freedom of savages. I mean a passion for the Chinese, a people polished into perfect tameness and uniformity, and exhibiting the best specimen of what has since been called "the Despotism of Reason." An age which was perpetually endeavouring to substitute a complete system of police in the room of the antiquated influences of religion and morality, which regarded the perfection of a few manufactures as the sole and highest object of human society, and what they called "the doctrine of pure ethics," as the ne plus ultra of illumination—an age such as this could scarcely indeed fail to contemplate, with mighty admiration, the spectacle of a nation which has, according to its own account, possessed for some thousand years laws without religion, which has had newspapers some centuries longer than ourselves, which can imprint upon porcelain colours more brilliant than we are acquainted with, and make paper thinner and finer than any European manufactory. It is lamentable to see into what contemptible perversities, the misdirected ingenuity of a few rational men can conduct both themselves and their contemporaries.

Voltaire and Rousseau were the first who gave its form and shape to the spirit of the eighteenth century; but they had many coadjutors in their attempts, many who were indefatigable in rendering the moral philosophy of Locke more decided in its principles as well as bolder in its consequences, and in rendering it, so improved, the manual of the age. What results this produced in regard to human life, may be learned from the single example of Helvetius. This man proved to the satisfaction of his readers, that selfishness, vanity, and sensual enjoyment are the true and certain guides, the only rational ends of enlightened men, the only realities in human life—and his readers soon began to suspect that the same principles ought to be extended to the whole universe. Mind, according to this doctrine, there is none, for matter is every thing, and man is distinguished from the brutes not by intellect, but by hands and fingers—advantages which, in some degree at least, he appears to share with the monkey. The difference between the man and the monkey was indeed diminished very much in the opinion of many philosophers of this time, and it was a very favourite speculation to discover the existence of intermediate and connecting species between them. It is much to be regretted that Rousseau did not fulfil the intention he once expressed, of openly combating the dogmas of Helvetius. He must, in the course of such a controversy, have at least been compelled to settle and explain somewhat more fully his own principles—and these, however erroneous, possess, when compared with those of the other, much that is both good and noble, and capable of being improved.

The last step in the progress of the French anti-revolutionary philosophy, is that marked by the congenial spirit of Diderot. I may, without question, assume the fact, that this man was the centre-point and animating principle, not only of the Encyclopædia, but also of the Système de la Nature, and of many other works connected in the same spirit of audacious atheism. He wrought indeed much more in secret than in public; he was different from Voltaire and Rousseau in this, that he had less vanity of authorship than they, and was perfectly satisfied when he could gain the victory, without wishing to be personally held up as the victor. He was peculiarly distinguished by a most fanatical hatred, not only of all Christianity, but of all kinds of religion. He maintained that these are all alike founded in the superstitious terrors left on the minds of a half destroyed race, by those terrible revolutions in the natural world, the traces of which are still so apparent around us. In many of the writings of this school, even the name of Atheism is not concealed, but it is openly stated that man can never be happy till he learns to throw aside the whole doctrine of a deity—an opinion, the absurdity of which has been but too fatally demonstrated by the experience of a few subsequent years. Of all the forms in which this atheistical system was brought before the world, perhaps the most singularly extravagant was the theory which represented Christ as a mere astronomical symbol—a being never possessed of historical existence—and the twelve apostles as so many old signs of the zodiac. The whole spirit of this system, and the whole of the practical purposes which it was intended to serve, may be learned from the single well known wish, of which the fathers of the revolution made no secret—"that the last king might be burned on a funeral pile, composed of the body of the last priest."—Schlegel's Lectures.

FROM THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

One or two gossiping paragraphs on the subject of Adam Smith, whose distinguished name may render the most trifling notices concerning him matter of some interest, and we will then release our courteous reader from our recollections, on the subject of these old Northern Lights. Dr. Smith is well known to have been one of the most absent men living. It was, indeed, an attribute which, if any where, might have been matched in the society we speak of, of whom several, particularly John Home and General Fletcher Campbell, were extremely addicted to fits of absence. But those of the great Economist were abstraction itself. Mr. Mackenzie placed in his hand the beautiful tale of La Roche, in which he introduces Mr. David Hume, for the express purpose of knowing whether there was any thing in it which Mr. Hume's surviving friends could think hurtful to his memory. Dr. Smith read and highly approved of the MS.; but, on returning it to Mr. Mackenzie, only expressed his surprise that Mr. Hume should never have mentioned the anecdote to him. When walking in the street, Adam had a manner of talking and laughing to himself, which often attracted the notice and excited the surprise of the passengers. He used himself to mention the ejaculation of an old market woman, "Heigh Sirs!" shaking her head as she uttered it; to which her companion answered, having heaved a compassionate sigh, "and he is well put on, too!" expressing their surprise that a decided lunatic, who, from his dress, appeared to be a gentleman, should be permitted to walk abroad. In a private room his demeanour was equally remarkable; and we shall never forget one particular evening, when he put an elderly maiden lady, who presided at the tea-table, to sore confusion, by neglecting utterly her invitations to be seated, and walking round and round the circle, stopping ever and anon to steal a lump from the sugar-basin; which the venerable spinster was at length constrained to place on her own knee, as the only method of securing it from his most uneconomical depredations. His appearance, mumping the eternal sugar, was something indescribable.

We had the following anecdote from a colleague of Dr. Smith, who, as is well known, was a commissioner of the board of customs. The board had in their service, as porter, a stately person, who, dressed in a huge scarlet gown or cloak, covered with frogs of worsted lace, and holding in his hand a staff about seven feet high, as an emblem of his office, used to mount guard before the custom-house when a board was to be held. It was the etiquette that, as each commissioner entered, the porter should go through a sort of salute with his staff of office, resembling that which officers used formerly to perform with their spontoons, and then marshal the dignitary to the hall of meeting. This ceremony had been performed before the great Economist perhaps five hundred times. Nevertheless one day, as he was about to enter the custom-house, the motions of his janitor seem to have attracted his eye without their character or purpose reaching his apprehension, and on a sudden he began to imitate his gestures, as a recruit does those of his drill-sergeant. The porter, having drawn up in front of the door, presented his staff as a soldier does his musket: the commissioner, raising his cane, and holding it with both hands by the middle, returned the salute with the utmost gravity. The inferior officer, much amazed, recovered his weapon, wheeled to the right, stepped a pace back to give the commissioner room to pass, lowering his staff at the same time, in token of obeisance. Dr. Smith, instead of passing on, drew up on the opposite side, and lowered his cane at the same angle. The functionary, much out of countenance, next moved up stairs with his staff advanced, while the author of the 'Wealth of Nations' followed with his bamboo in precisely the same posture, and his whole soul apparently wrapped up in the purpose of placing his foot exactly on the same spot of each step which had been occupied by the officer who preceded him. At the door of the hall, the porter again drew off, saluted with his staff, and bowed reverentially. The philosopher again imitated his motions, and returned his bow with most profound gravity. When the Doctor entered the apartment, the spell under which he seemed to act was entirely broken, and our informant, who very much amused, had followed him the whole way, had some difficulty to convince him that he had been doing any thing extraordinary. Upon another occasion, having to sign an official minute or mandate, Adam Smith was observed to be unusually tedious, when the same person, peeping over his shoulder, discovered that he was engaged, not in writing his own name, but in imitating, as nearly as possible, the signature of his brother in office, who had held the pen before him. These instances of absence equal the abstractions of the celebrated Dr. Harvey; but whoever has read the deep theories and abstruse calculations contained in the 'Wealth of Nations,' must readily allow that a mind habitually employed in such themes, must necessarily be often rapt far above the sublunary occurrences of every-day life.

African Cascade on the Orange River.—

Having passed the southern branch, which at this season is but an inconsiderable creek, we continued to follow the Foramas, for several miles, through the dense Acacia forests, while the thundering sound of the cataract increased at every step. At length we approached a ridge of rocks, and found it necessary to dismount, and follow our guides on foot.

It seemed as if we were now entering the untrodden vestibule of one of nature's most sublime temples, and the untutored savages who guided us, evinced by the awe and circumspection with which they trod, that they were not altogether influenced by the genius loci. They repeatedly requested me to keep behind, and follow them softly, as the precipices were dangerous for the feet of men; and the sight and sound of the cataract were so fearful, that they themselves regarded the place with awe, and ventured but seldom to visit it.

At length the whole of them halted, and desired me to do the same. One of them stepped forward to the brink of the precipice, and having looked cautiously over, beckoned to me to advance. I did so, and witnessed a curious and striking scene; but it was not yet the waterfall. It was a rapid, formed by almost the whole volume of the river, compressed into a narrow channel of not more than fifty yards in breadth, whence it descended at an angle of nearly 45°, and rushing tumultuously through a black and crooked chasm among the rocks, of frightful depth, escaped in a torrent of foam. My swarthy guides, although this was unquestionably the first time that they had ever led a traveller to view the remarkable scenery of their country, evinced a degree of tact, as ciceroni as well as natural feeling of the picturesque, that equally pleased and surprised me. Having forwarned me that this was not yet the waterfall, they now pioneered the way for about a mile farther along the rocks, some of them keeping near, and continually cautioning me to look at my feet, as a single false step might precipitate me into the raging abyss of waters; the tumult of which seemed to shake even the solid rocks around us.

At length we halted, as before, and the next morning I was led to a projecting rock, where a scene burst upon me, far surpassing my most sanguine expectations. The whole water of the river (except what escapes by the subsidiary channel we had crossed, and by a similar one on the north side,) being previously confined to a bed of scarcely one hundred feet in breadth, descends at once in a magnificent cascade of full four hundred feet in height. I stood upon a cliff nearly level with the top of the fall, and directly in front of it. The beams of the evening sun fell upon the cascade, and occasioned a most splendid rainbow; while the vapoury mists arising from the broken roar of the waterfall, and the tumultuous boiling and whirling of the steam below, striving to escape along its deep, dark, and narrow path, formed altogether, a combination of beauty and grandeur, such as I never before witnessed. As I gazed on this stupendous scene, I felt as if in a dream. The sublimity of nature drowned all apprehensions of danger; and, after a short pause, I hastily left the spot where I stood to gain a nearer view from a cliff that impended over the foaming gulf. I had just reached this station, when I felt myself grasped all at once by four korannus, who simultaneously seized hold of me by the arms and legs. My first impression was, that they were going to hurl me over the precipice; but it was a momentary thought, and it wronged the friendly savages. They are themselves a timid race; and they were alarmed, lest my temerity should lead me into danger. They hurried me back from the brink, and then explained their motive, and asked my forgiveness. I was not ungrateful for their care, though somewhat annoyed by their officiousness.—Thompson's Southern Africa.

The following concise and beautiful description of the excellency of the plan of Christian redemption, forms the conclusion of the Memoirs of Lindley Murray. It is the testimony of one who had practically felt and experienced the powerful support, the holy consolation, and the final promise of eternal joy and glory, which the religion of Christ, and that alone, can disclose and impart.

"I cannot finish these memoirs of my life, without expressing, still more particularly, my sense of the greatest blessing which was ever conferred on mankind. I mean the redemption from sin, and the attainment of a happy immortality, by the atonement and intercession of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. I contemplate this wonderful proof of the love of God to man, as an act of mercy and benignity, which will stimulate the gratitude and love, the obedience, praise, and adoration of the redeemed, through ages that will never end. This high dispensation is, in every respect, adapted to our condition, as frail and sinful creatures. In surveying our offences and imperfections it prevents despondence; directs us where to look for relief; and freely offers us, if we are truly penitent, and believe in Christ, pardon and peace: in reflecting on our religious attainments, it checks presumption and keeps us humble; and amidst all the trials and troubles of life, it cheers us with the prospect of a merciful deliverance, and of being soon received into those blissful regions, where we shall be secured, eternally secured, from sin and sorrow; where we shall be admitted into the Divine presence, and unceasingly celebrate in joyful anthems, the praises of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, one God blessed for ever. To them who obtain this glorious and happy state, all the afflictions of the longest and most painful life, will then appear to have been, indeed light and momentary: as a drop of the ocean, as a grain of sand on the sea shore, compared with the greatness of their felicity, and the endless ages of its continuance."

FOR THE FRIEND.

CLAUDE GAY AND VOLTAIRE.

Claude Gay was a native of Lyons, in France, and was educated by his parents in the Catholic Faith. He became dissatisfied early in life with the Romish tenets, forsook that communion, and settled in the island of Jersey, in order to live among Protestants. He here met with a copy of Barclay's Apology, the perusal of which convinced him of the truth of Friends' principles, and determined him to embrace their profession. For this change in his views he suffered some persecution, and was at length banished from the island and forbidden to return, under pain of corporal punishment. He removed to England in 1745, and lived chiefly in London, and died at a very advanced age at Barking, in Essex, in the year 1786. His private character was amiable, inoffensive and unassuming. He became an approved minister in the Society, and paid several religious visits to various parts of England, the islands in the British Channel, Holland, France, Germany and Switzerland. He was remarkable for his industry and humility, and often travelled on foot, in the performance of his religious duties. His public ministry was sound, fervent and tender; he was frequently engaged in prayer, and his petitions were usually preferred in the appropriate terms "for the merits of Christ." He was the author of several works; he translated the first part of Penn's "No Cross no Crown," and a selection from the memorials of deceased Friends into French. His translations possess no great literary merits, and are written with a strong English idiom. But although Claude Gay was no scholar, he was an upright, simple hearted Christian. He lived an unblemished life, endured a lingering disease with great patience, and declared to those who conversed with him in his last illness, that all fear of death was removed. How great is the contrast between the useful life—the humble labours—the triumphant death of Claude Gay, and the splendid, though mischievous career—the false glory and the real demerit of his celebrated countryman, whose name we have coupled with his. Two characters more opposite in all points cannot well be imagined—and the interview which is recorded to have taken place between them, is curious and interesting. It was in one of the visits to Switzerland which has been alluded to, that Claude remained for some time at Geneva. He was noted there for his good sense, moderation and simplicity. The arch infidel heard of him—his curiosity was excited, and he desired to see him. I give the remainder of the narrative in the language of Simond.* "The Quaker felt great reluctance, but suffered himself at last to be carried to Ferney, Voltaire having promised beforehand to his friends, that he would say nothing that could give offence. At first he was delighted with the tall, straight, handsome Quaker, his broad-brimmed hat, and plain drab suit of clothes, and the mild and serene expression of his countenance, and the dinner promised to go off very well; yet he soon took notice of the great sobriety of his guest and made jokes, to which he received grave and modest answers. The patriarchs and the first inhabitants of the earth were next alluded to; by and by, he began to sneer at the historical proofs of revelation; but Claude was not to be driven away from his grounds, and while examining these proofs, and arguing upon them rationally, he overlooked the light attacks of his adversary when not to the point, appeared insensible to his sarcasms and his wit, and remained always cool and always serious. Voltaire's vivacity at last turned to downright anger; his eyes flashed fire whenever they met the benign and placid countenance of the Quaker, and the dispute at last went so far that the latter, getting up, said, 'Friend Voltaire, perhaps thou mayst come to understand these matters rightly; in the mean time, finding I can do thee no good, I leave thee, and so fare thee well!' So saying he went away on foot back again to Geneva, leaving the whole company in consternation. Voltaire retired immediately to his own room. Huber (the father of the celebrated author on Bees) was present at this scene, and made a drawing of it, in which the two principal actors are most happily characterized. †

Among the many claims which the illustrious founder of Pennsylvania and his associates present, for the gratitude and admiration of posterity, none are more powerful or engaging, than those derived from their honourable, just, and Christian treatment of the Aborigines of our soil. It is a consoling reflection, that of the unnumbered woes and wrongs which have been perpetrated on this noble and high-minded, but deeply injured race of men, not a single act of oppression or cruelty is found chargeable to our forefathers. The kindness which they received from these poor sons of the forest, was generously recompensed and reciprocated. Whilst in many other parts of America, bloody wars were waged, and fearful outrages committed by the European settlers, with the mercenary view of robbing the Indians of their lands,—our ancestors paid a fair and satisfactory equivalent for every inch of ground which they inhabited or acquired.—Whilst between the first settlers, in many of the States of our Union and the Aborigines, constant jealousies, heart burnings, mutual encroachments, and bloody murders, were constantly occurring, in Pennsylvania peace, concord, and the mutual interchange of good offices, were ennobling the intercourse of our fathers with their rude, but faithful and honourable friends; and it is well worthy of remark, that so long as our religious Society exercised control in the government, or influence in its councils, so long was the soil of Pennsylvania free from the stain of Indian blood. In the present and succeeding number of our sketches, we shall present a concise view of the early Indian History of our State, taken from a discourse by T. I. Wharton, Esq. delivered in 1826, before the Society for the commemoration of the landing of Wm. Penn; and a discourse delivered by Roberts Vaux, before the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, on New Year's Day, 1827. It appears that in the very inception of his plans for settling his colony, Wm. Penn had prescribed for himself, a course of conduct towards the Indians, founded in the strictest justice, and adorned by the brightest benevolence. In his petition to Charles the 2d, for a grant of land on the American Continent, he declares one object to be, "The glory of God, by the civilization of the poor Indians, and the conversion of the Gentiles by just and lenient measures to the Kingdom of Christ."*

In order to show the relative merits of Wm. Penn, I cannot do better than to quote at some length, the following very just and apposite remarks from Wharton's Discourse.

"No one circumstance, in the annals of Pennsylvania, has made a deeper impression upon history, than the treaty, or more correctly speaking, the conference under the Elm, which took place shortly after the landing of Wm. Penn."

"Whether we consider the honesty of the motive, the fairness of the whole proceeding, or the faith which preserved it, we are entitled to look upon it as an event by itself, one of those unique and striking occurrences, which redeem and dignify the character of our species, and gladden the dark pages of the diplomatic dealings of civilized men with savages."

After noticing the fact, that the merit of treating with the Indians for their lands, has been claimed by others antecedent to Wm. Penn, Wharton proceeds—

"That prior to the landing of Wm. Penn, deeds of cession were made in several cases by the Indians to their European visitants, collectively or individually, is a fact too well established to be denied, if there was a disposition any where to dispute it. Such was the case in New Hampshire, Rhode Island, New York, Maryland, and the Carolinas, according to their several historians. But, what appears to me to constitute the great and distinguishing merit of the treaty under the elm, is the perfect fairness of the transaction towards the Indians; the equality of advantages with which they met the whites; and the sincerity and good faith with which the negotiations were commenced and concluded. In that ancient fable which describes the progress and consummation of the diplomatic alliance between the lion and the other beasts, we may find a type of the treaties between Christians and the Indians of this continent. In most instances of negotiation with the natives for the purchase of their land—I believe I may say in all—prior to the time of Penn, the colonists backed their suit with that powerful argument, that last reason of kings, whose persuasiveness the defenceless natives were unable to resist. They perceived on the part of the Europeans, a determination to keep hold of their lands, for possession they had already taken without license; and they could not but be sensible that the means were at hand, to enforce that determination which they had no power to resist; and that peaceably or forcibly their territory was to be obtained. WILLIAM PENN, however, approached them with naked hands, with no other armour than honesty of intention; no weapons but reason and justice; no band of armed men was ready as make weights

* Travels in Switzerland, vol. i. p. 396.

* See Vaux's Reports, page 7.

to fill up the deficiencies of argument; no fortresses frowned defiance upon the Aborigines, and admonished them to submit to inevitable necessity."

Wharton then mentions some other usual accompaniments of treaties which were wanting on this occasion, and proceeds—

"But all was openness and peace; the dealings of men whom the common Father created equal in rights; and who, in the language which Penn himself addressed to the Indians, 'were equally accountable to him for all the deeds done in the flesh.' It was the unfeigned desire of our progenitors, I again use the language of the Founder, 'to enjoy the province with the love and consent' of those whom they found in the partial occupation of it, and that love they hoped to gain 'by a kind, just, and peaceable life;' and to preserve by the most exact and even justice. Herein, then, consists one of the points (and a sufficiently remarkable one,) of distinction, between the negotiations of Penn with the Indians, and those of other provinces; that whereas I repeat, in most other cases, the Indians were overawed by a military array or other irresistible force, and yielded their claims to what the emigrants were already in possession of; in the instance of our own State, the founder, a year before his arrival, made known to them his determination not to occupy an inch of the soil, without their full and free consent; and, in the never to be forgotten interview under the elm, consummated that intention, by a compact in which he met them as brethren of common lineage, and treated with them as the rightful proprietors of the soil. Another remarkable circumstance about the treaties of Penn, and which would itself be sufficient to distinguish them from others made during that century, was their durability. Unlike some other articles of the same name, which have been manufactured in different parts of this continent, in recent as well as in the olden time, which scarcely survived the cooling of the wax with which they were sealed, the treaties of Penn were made for posterity, as well as for the existing generation. They were calculated, in honest good faith, for use, and not merely for show, and to serve some present purpose. From a small and unarmed band with which the settlement was commenced, the colonists had increased to a powerful and populous nation; while on the other hand, by that facility which seems every where to attend them, the Indians had wasted to the very skeleton of their former strength. Of their rapid advances in strength, however, no advantage was taken by the government or people of Pennsylvania. Their compacts were preserved inviolate, the rights of these children of a common humanity were scrupulously respected, and thus a prouder title and a higher glory was gained for Pennsylvania, than the most brilliant triumphs that military tactics could obtain over this defenceless race. I allude to the appellation justly bestowed upon the land of 'unbroken faith.'

"That a similar degree of harmony existed between the colonists of other provinces and the Indians of their vicinity, will not be asserted by those who have looked into their histories with any attention. If we were to admit that their treaties were made in good faith and without military control, it must still be conceded, on the other hand, that they were not maintained in the same spirit. The history of many of these States is, in fact, little more than a monotonous detail of minute warfare with the original proprietors of the soil, a lamentable record of desolated fields and smoking wigwams, of ambushes, surprises, captivity or bloodshed. Let these annals be consulted, in no unfriendly spirit, and then let us turn to the virgin page of Pennsylvania, pure as the character of her Founder, and find renewed occasion for reverencing the magnanimous but humble-minded men to whom we owe so great a trophy."

I have quoted the whole of these very just and striking observations, even at the risk of incurring the charge of tedious diffusiveness, for never was a tribute more justly due, than that which is here paid to the honesty, integrity, and high honour of our benevolent ancestors. B.

Extraordinary Preservation at Sea.

The ship Mary Ann, of about 100 tons, loaded about three weeks since near Bangor, a full cargo of slates, with which she put to sea. The crew were surprised, after getting to sea, to find her very leaky, and that the leak gained very fast upon them. Considering the nature of the cargo, and the rate at which she made water, they deemed it impossible to save her. They finally took to the boat, and rowed from her, and lay at a distance to watch her sinking. They continued to watch her till far beyond the time in which they had calculated she would disappear. Surprised that she still continued afloat they returned to her, and found that the leak ceased to increase, but they were perfectly at a loss to account for the circumstance. They set the sails, and finally got into Milford Haven; and, to their astonishment, found the leak had been stopped by the body of a fish, which had been forced in with some sea weed, by which means the ship and cargo were saved.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE FRIENDS.

PARTED FRIENDS.

By C. W. Thomson.

Parted friends may meet again,
When the storms of life are past;
And the spirit freed from pain,
Basks in friendship that will last.

Worldly cares may sever wide—
Distant far their path may be—
But, the bond by Death untied,
They shall once again be free.

Death—the end of care and pain—
Death—the wretch's happiest meed—
Death can break the strongest chain—
Death is liberty indeed.

Parted friends again may meet,
From the toils of nature free;
Crown'd with mercy, O how sweet
Will eternal friendship be!

FOR THE FRIEND.

STANZAS WRITTEN AT SEA.

Eternal Power! whose word divine
Call'd into Life this pensile ball—
I bow before thy mystic shrine,
And hail thee—Sov'reign Lord of all!

I've known the 'mid the rural scene,
Where solemn quiet holds her reign,
And, soaring through the blue serene,
The skylark hymns his matin strain.

Sweet is that scene to eye and soul,
Of vocal groves and laughing skies,
And streams whose crystal waters roll
Enamell'd with the landscape's dyes.

Nor less upon the billow deep
Thy all controlling power I feel—
Where storms their anarch empire keep,
Before thy awful presence kneel.

For tost upon the raging tide,
Like leaf before autumnal gale,
Our trembling bark flies fast and wide,
Scarce conscious of or helm or sail.

Waves after waves our course o'ertake,
Howling as for their destin'd prey—
Upon our deck resistless break,
Or dash in angry foam away.

And still the storm's o'erhanging plume
Shrouds us in darkness, mist, and rain;
Still, as he flies, some wretch's doom
Seems howl'd in thunders to the main.

Amidst this elemental strife—
Thou Sovereign of the skies and sea!
I feel how brief how frail is life,
And trust, and trust alone in thee!

Vain is the pilot's boasted skill,
If thine averted presence frown;
And thou canst guide through every ill—
Though ten-fold tempests thunder down.

Then take, Supreme! into thy hand
The life thy matchless mercy gave—
Whether before thy bar to stand
This night, or waft me o'er the wave.

And should thy goodness still prolong
That life—O condescend to be
Its morning and its evening song—
The Tower to which my soul can flee.

The following pious effusion, in reply to the four lines in our last number, beginning in the third stanza of "Ocean," is from a female hand.

"Yet who, upon thy mountain waves,"

Hope the Anchor.

Though billows swell at midnight hour,
Beneath the feeble bark,
And threat'ning clouds with darkness low'r,
T' appal the human heart.

Yet he whose mind is staid on Him,
Who spake and it stood fast;
Can rest in peace 'mid ocean's din,
Nor fear the tempest-blast.

Let helpless man, condemn'd to make
The stormy voyage of time,
When meteors glare, and mountains quake,
Regard the hand divine.

Who holds on high supreme control,
This nether world to sway;
Nor leaves the humble, faithful soul,
To perish by the way.

When whirlwinds agitate the pole,
And seas tempestuous rise,
In holy faith repose, my soul,
On him beyond the skies.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH, 27, 1827.

YEARLY MEETING AT GREEN STREET.

"The Friends.—Yesterday morning the first yearly meeting of that part of the society of Friends adopting the opinions of Elias Hicks, was held in the meeting house near Green street. The females occupied the brick house, and the men a large temporary frame building, erected for that purpose, in the court. A vast crowd assembled, including many friends from the country. During the meeting, which will last the whole week, it is said some of their celebrated preachers will visit them." Democratic Press.

As is stated in the preceding extract from the Democratic Press, the first yearly meeting of the followers of Elias Hicks, commenced on the 15th of the present month, and was concluded on the 19th. The separation of this body of persons from the religious society of Friends, and their formation into a new sect, may therefore be considered as completely effected.

The women's meeting was held in the brick meeting house at the corner of Green and Fourth street. The men convened in a temporary building erected for the purpose, in the lumber yard at the opposite corner of the same streets. It may be well, in order to correct some misrepresentations which are already in circulation, to say, that by computation, the dimensions of the house and the number of benches being ascertained, the males attending on the first day it is believed could not have exceeded 1150. At some of the sittings the number was much less; and at the meeting on fifth day morning, it is apprehended there could not have been present more than about 700.

The principal transactions were the appointment of a large committee of men and women to represent, and attend to the concerns of, the yearly meeting in its recess—the issuing of an epistle addressed to Baltimore yearly meeting, and one to their own members—the appointment of a treasurer, and a conclusion to raise fifteen hundred dollars for the current expenses of the year.

We are further informed, that a committee to whom was referred the subject of transferring rights of membership without certificates, (a mode not sanctioned by the discipline of Friends,) reported, that under existing circumstances, neither the individuals who had thus transgressed the long established usage of Friends, nor the monthly meetings who had countenanced this disorderly procedure, by receiving them, were censurable,—but that it was inexpedient at present to make any rule of discipline sanctioning the proceeding.

THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS IN ENGLAND.

Considerable pains have been taken to disseminate the idea that the society of Friends in England is rapidly declining, and that many of its meetings have been discontinued within a few years. We have been at some trouble in order to ascertain the truth of these assertions, and are gratified in being able to state that they are unfounded. Letters received during the present year from persons now in England, who have the best opportunities of correct information, assure us, that for several years past the number of meetings set up exceeds those which have been laid down; and that there is an actual increase in the members of the society in that country. It is a fact that several meetings in different parts of the country have been dropped, in consequence of their members having generally removed into the towns, on account of difficulties connected with agricultural employments—particularly the great exposure of the youth to various temptations, in attending the corn markets. But it is obvious that the mere change of residence does not lessen the aggregate number of Friends, other meetings being increased, or new ones established, in consequence of the accession.

The last printed account of the meetings in Great Britain which is in our possession, was published in 1822, by direction of the yearly meeting of London. At that time this meeting consisted of twenty-six quarterly meetings, the half year's meeting of Wales, and the general meeting of Scotland. These include one hundred and one monthly meetings, and four hundred and four meetings for divine worship—exclusive of Ireland, and the meetings on the continent of Europe. Since 1822, the number of meetings has increased; and the total amount at that time will be found to be quite equal, we believe, to what it has been at any period during the last twenty or thirty years. As regards the condition of the society in Great Britain, numerous accounts, official as well as private, represent Friends as being preserved in great harmony and unity; and it is hoped that there is an increase of true spiritual religion among them. The youth especially, in many parts, appear to have been favoured with a renewed visitation of divine grace, through submission to which a consoling prospect is afforded, that a succession of faithful Friends will come up in support of the doctrines and testimonies committed to the society. There has also been a considerable increase in the ministry among them—that although our accounts speak of many deficiencies still existing among them, yet there is cause of thankfulness that, as a body they are, through mercy, preserved from the evils which have devastated some of the fairest portions of the society in this land. B.

The following passage from Espriella's letters should make a deep impression upon the mind of every lover of his country. Whatever may be the external splendour of a nation—if it is created by a moral degradation such as is here pictured—if, in order to excel the rest of the world in the manufacture of cloths and muslins, and pins and needles, the great body of the people is to be transformed into machines, of no more value, and scarcely more intelligent, than the spinning jennies and steam engines, to which they seem almost subordinate and inferior—let us keep to the plough, and to the frugal simplicity of our forefathers. The lamentation of the poet over the degradation of the peasantry, is as just as it is touching:

"Ill fares the land, to hast'ning ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates, and men decay,
Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade;
A breath can make them, as a breath has made.
But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
When once destroy'd, can never be supplied."

"Mr. — remarked, that nothing could be so beneficial to a country as manufactures. 'You see these children, sir,' said he. 'In most parts of England poor children are a burden to their parents and the parish; here the parish, which would else have to support them, is rid of all expense; they get their bread almost as soon as they can run about, and by the time they are seven or eight years old, bring in money. There is no idleness among us;—they come at five in the morning; we allow them half an hour for breakfast, and an hour for dinner; they leave work at six, and another set relieves them for the night; the wheels never stand still.'

"These children, then, said I, have no time to receive instruction. 'That, sir,' he replied, 'is the evil which we have found. Girls are employed here from the age you see them till they marry, and then they know nothing about domestic work, not even how to mend a stocking or boil a potato. But we are remedying this now, and send the children to school for an hour after they have done work.' I asked if so much confinement did not injure their health. 'No,' he replied, 'they are as healthy as any children in the world could be. To be sure, many of them, as they grew up, went off in consumptions; but consumption was the disease of the English.' I ventured to inquire afterwards concerning the morals of the people who were trained up in this monstrous manner, and found what was to be expected, that in consequence of herding together such numbers of both sexes, who are utterly uninstructed in the commonest principles of religion and morality, they were as debauched and profligate as human beings under the influence of such circumstances must inevitably be; the men drunken, the women dissolute; that however high the wages they earned, they were too improvident ever to lay by for a time of need; and that though the parish was not at the expense of maintaining them when children, it had to provide for them in diseases induced by their mode of life, and in premature debility and old age."

COMMENTARY.

At Abington Quarterly Meeting held in the 8th month last, the adherents of Elias Hicks declared themselves independent of the Yearly Meeting held in Philadelphia, and formally dissolved the tie which had hitherto bound them to its communion. This conclusion was unquestionably a separation from the Religious Society of Friends, and the commencement of the organization of the Society, which has just closed its first general assembly. Those members of Abington Quarterly Meeting, who remained faithful to our principles and discipline—when they found that their efforts to prevent this secession was unavailing, and that the large majority of those present, had fully determined upon their course, interfered no longer with what they had considered the transactions of a new Society. After it had adjourned, Friends remained behind, in order to transact the proper business of the Quarterly Meeting. Instead of allowing them quietly to proceed in it, a number of the followers of Elias Hicks intruded themselves into the meeting, and behaved with great rudeness and disorder. They ridiculed those who attempted to speak, and addressed the company in taunting and contemptuous language. Several of them stood around the doors and windows of the women's apartment, laughing and talking aloud. For the truth of this statement, we can appeal to hundreds of witnesses who were present on the occasion.

The clamour and confusion thus created was so great, that Friends could not proceed with the business, and were obliged to adjourn the meeting till the following morning. At the hour to which they had adjourned, Friends assembled at the Meeting House, and found the doors locked and barred against them. Application was made to the person appointed to the care of the house, with a respectful request that he would open it for the use of the Quarterly Meeting; but he informed Friends that he had been forbidden to do so, and exhibited a written authority to that effect, signed by three of the Trustees, all Hicksites. Charles Shoemaker, one of the Trustees for the property, and a worthy and respected member of Abington Meeting, endeavoured to persuade them to permit Friends peaceably to occupy their own property, which they had unquestionably a right to do; but, persuasion and argument were alike unavailing.

It should be observed that the number of persons who were thus refused admittance into the meeting house, was about three hundred—that none of them had been disowned, and consequently were fully entitled to all the rights as members of that society, to whom only the property belonged. But, though the followers of Elias Hicks had it in their power to exclude Friends from their own meeting house, they could not prevent them from the performance of Divine Worship. The friends who were assembled, collected under the shade of some neighbouring trees, where a solemn meeting was held; and HE who has graciously promised to be with the "two or three that were gathered in his name," condescended to appear "in the midst of them," and overshadow the company with his heavenly presence. Under a grateful sense of the unmerited favour, prayer and praises were reverently offered to his worthy name. The followers of E. H. were not satisfied with debarring Friends from the use of the meeting house, several of them stood around the circle of worshippers, demeaning themselves in a light and unbecoming manner, irreverently keeping on their hats, while a female minister was engaged in supplication.

After the meeting for worship was over, Friends removed to a neighbouring mill, in order that they might transact their business unmolested; where the meeting for discipline was satisfactorily held.

Such are the facts relative to the first instance of the expulsion of Friends from their meeting houses on a religious account, during a period of at least one hundred and thirty years.

DR. DARWIN.

The following fine criticism and just estimate of the poetical character of Darwin, is from the pen of an accomplished judge of poetry himself—the finest lyrical poet of the age.

"Darwin was a materialist in poetry, no less than in philosophy. In the latter he attempts to build systems of vital sensibility on mere mechanical principles, and in the former, he paints every thing to the mind's eye, as if the soul had no pleasure beyond the vivid conception of form, colour, and motion. Nothing makes poetry more lifeless than description by abstract terms, and general qualities; but Darwin runs into the opposite extreme of prominently glaring circumstantiality, without shade, relief, or perspective.

"His celebrity rose and fell with unexampled rapidity. His poetry appeared at a time peculiarly favourable to innovation, and his attempt to wed poetry and science was a bold experiment, which had some apparent sanction from the triumphs of modern discovery. When Lucretius wrote, science was in her cradle; but modern philosophy had revealed truths in nature more sublime than the marvels of fiction. The Rosicrucian machinery of his poem, had at the first glance an imposing appearance, and the variety of his allusion was surprising. On a closer view, it was observable that the Botanic Goddess and her Sylphs, and Gnomes, were useless, from their having no employment; and tiresome, from being the mere pretexts for declamation. The variety of allusion is very whimsical. Dr. Franklin is compared to Cupid; whilst Hercules, Lady Melbourne, Emma Crewe, Brindley's canals and sleeping cherubs, sweep on like images in a dream. Tribes and grasses are likened to angels, and the truffle is rehearsed as a subterranean Empress. His laborious ingenuity in finding comparisons, is frequently like that of Hervey in his "meditations," or of Flavel in his "Gardening Spiritualized."

"If Darwin, however, was not a good poet, it may be owned that he is frequently a bold personifier, and that some of his insulated passages are musical and picturesque. His Botanic Garden once pleased many better judges than his affected biographer Anna Seward; it fascinated even the taste of Cowper, who says in conjunction with Hayley—

We therefore pleas'd extol thy song,
Though various yet complete;
Rich in embellishment, as strong
And learn'd as it is sweet;
And deem the Bard whoe'er he be
And howsoever known,
That will not weave a wreath for thee,
Unworthy of his own."

"THE ISLES OF GREECE."

It is not possible for any power of language, adequately to describe the appearance presented at the rising or setting of the sun in the Ægean Sea. Whether in dim perspective, through gray and silvery mists, or amidst hues of liveliest purple, the isles and continents of Greece present their varied features, nor pen nor pencil can portray the scenery. Whatever, in the warmest fancies of my youth, imagination had represented of this gifted country, was afterwards not only realized but surpassed. Let the reader picture to his conception, an evening sun behind the towering cliffs of Patmos, gilding the battlements of the monastery of the Apocalypse with its departing rays; the consecrated island surrounded by inexpressible brightness seeming to float upon an abyss of fire; while the moon in milder splendour is rising full over the opposite expanse. Such a scene I actually witnessed with feelings naturally excited by all the circumstances of local solemnity; for such indeed might have been the face of nature, when the inspiration of an Apostle, kindling in its contemplation, uttered the alleluias of that mighty voice, telling of Salvation, and Glory, and Power.

Mousing Rat.—On the farm of Lyonthem near Falkirk, there is a remarkable instance, not only of docility, but usefulness in a rat. It first devoured the mice caught in traps, and was afterwards seen to catch them as they ventured from their holes, till at length the whole house was cleared of these vermin, except it is believed a single one. It has frequently been seen in pursuit of this solitary mouse, and the little fugitive, which takes refuge behind the ingle, has a part of its fur singed off. From the service it renders, the family kindly protects the rat, and it runs about and gambols among them on the floor without the least uneasiness. It sometimes disappears for a week or ten days, and it is supposed that in these intervals it visits the stackyard in its professional capacity.

SELECTED POETRY.

ON THE DEATH OF — — —.

Thou art gone to the grave, but we will not deplore thee,

Though sorrows and darkness encompass the tomb;

Thy Saviour has passed through the portal before thee,

And the lamp of his love is thy guide through the gloom!

Thou art gone to the grave!—we no longer behold thee,

Nor tread the rough paths of the world by thy side; But the wide arms of mercy are spread to enfold thee, And sinners may die, for the sinless have died!

Thou art gone to the grave!—and, its mansion forsaking,

Perchance thy weak spirit in fear lingered long; But the mild rays of Paradise beam'd on thy waking, And the sound that thou heardest was the Seraphim's song!

Thou art gone to the grave!—but we will not deplore thee,

Whose God was thy ransom, thy guardian and guide;

He gave thee—He took thee—and He will restore thee,

And death has no sting—for the Saviour has died! HARR.

CELESTIAL ROSES.

They who celestial roses cull,
Of deathless scent and fadeless bloom,
First travell'd through the briars of earth,
And enter'd Heaven by the tomb.

Rejoice, then, pilgrim of the skies,
Your lot can ne'er be worse than theirs;
Soon will the pearly gates unfold,
Receive your souls—exclude your cares.

Within their precincts blooms the rose,
And blooms without a single thorn;
Smooth is the path they now pursue,
Who've pass'd through night to endless morn.

From a Delaware Newspaper.

In the year 1761, the society of Friends in the borough of Wilmington adopted the plan of burying their dead in rows, regardless of family distinction. The first person buried afterwards was Nicholas Meers, whose remains lie at the north corner of the grave-yard, near the intersection of Pasture-street and Queen-street. He was born in the year 1650, under the government of Cromwell, about the time the society of which he became a member first appeared. He lived through eventful periods—he was the subject of ten successive sovereigns, including the two Cromwells. He saw Pennsylvania and Delaware one great forest—a range for the deer, buffalo, and the panther; and he lived to see them a fruitful field, “a garden enclosed,” a refuge and an asylum for the persecuted. He left this scene at the advanced age of 111 years. B. F.

Mode of stopping Epistaxis (bleeding at the nose.)

A young man, nineteen years of age, bled from the nose two days, so profusely that he fainted several times. Mineral acids, ice to the nape of the neck, &c. were tried, but without stopping the flow of blood. Dr. Brunner was called in on the third day, and he blew up powdered gum Arabic through a quill—the hemorrhage ceased directly.—Philadelphia Journal of Med. and Phys. Sciences.

The Springfield Journal states, that a Shaker village in its vicinity receives between 12,000 and $13,000 annually for garden seeds!

An After Thought.—A young man of fashion lately threw himself, in a love fit, into the Seine; he was rescued from his perilous situation by a waterman, who heard him roar out most unmercifully, that he had forgot to add a postscript to his farewell letter to his mistress.

The Augusta (Geo.) Constitutionalist contains an account of an attack made by an alligator upon a female negro, who was going into a swamp with a basket of corn upon her head, to feed hogs. She was struck suddenly and severely on the breast and arms, by this ferocious creature, who attempted to devour her, tearing her flesh and clothes with his claws. She extricated herself with difficulty, and fled, pursued by the alligator; she sought shelter upon a log, one end of which rested upon a stump; her cries brought to her assistance several slaves from an adjacent field, who killed the alligator, and relieved the woman from her perilous situation.

A Grand Speculation.—“Ma foi!” said a little Frenchman to his friend, as they walked behind young Strut, who assumed a vast consequence on the strength of being worth thirty thousand dollars—“Ma foi!” I should like to make one grand speculation.” And in what would you speculate, Monsieur?” asked his companion. I should like to buy that young man for what others think him worth, and sell him for what he thinks himself worth: ma foi! it would make me one grand fortune.”

Cheap enough.—Good beef steak may be bought in our market at a cent and a half per pound. Six and a fourth cents at this rate would get enough to serve two families for a breakfast.—Western Monitor.

FROM THE ALBANY ARGUS, OCT. 22.

A rare instance of honourable conduct.—About ten years ago, a gentleman engaged in mercantile pursuits in the interior of this state, met with reverses, gave up all his property, compounded with his creditors, and was fully and unconditionally discharged by them. A few days since, he called upon them respectively, several of whom reside in this city, and paid every farthing of the original debts, with interest to this time, amounting to near $20,000. We are happy to add that his creditors here presented him a service of silver plate, as a testimony of their high regard for him personally, and their admiration of the exalted principles by which he had been governed.

“Have I come to this?”—How painful must be the reflections of a young man who has enjoyed the privilege of society, moral instructions, and faithful admonition, to find himself arrested in his wicked career by the arm of justice, and about to repay the penalty of the law for his crimes, while comparing his advantages with his present circumstances. Indeed he may well say, “have I come to this?”

This is not altogether an imaginary case. It so happened that the writer of this was present when several convicts arrived at one of our State Penitentiaries. Among the number was a young man of about the age of 24, of good appearance and well dressed. On going into the prison he involuntarily exclaimed, “Have I come to this?”—Alas, too late to avoid the punishment justly due him for his crimes. What instructions such a scene, and such language are calculated to afford to youth. It should teach them to obey the first command with promise to honour their parents; to avoid vain company; and in a word to remember their Creator in the days of their youth. And to a parent who possesses a deep interest in the welfare of a son just entering upon the scenes of active life; who knows the evil propensities of the natural heart, and the exposedness of youth to the snares of the world, a scene like this must occasion a degree of anxious solicitude, lest on some future day he may have occasion to hear from that son the melancholy reflection, “have I come to this?”

Voyage of Columbus.—The public will be happy to learn that Messrs. Wait & Son have published and English translation of the Personal Narrative of the First Voyage of Columbus to America. This Narrative has been recently, for the first time, published in Spain, by Mr. Navarrette, from the original manuscript lately discovered.—Boston paper.

In a note in the statute book of Connecticut, published since the late change of the state government, it is said—“The people of Connecticut have always considered the education of children to be a subject of primary importance, and have attended to it with peculiar solicitude. At an early period they made provision for common schools, for the purpose of disseminating the most necessary and useful knowledge to every part of the community.—Prior to the revision in 1672, a regulation was made, that in every town where there were more than fifty householders, a school should be kept, to teach the children to read and write; that a grammar school should be kept in each county town, and that the master should be paid by the parents, or inhabitants in general.” The early regulations of the colonists on this subject, have been faithfully and zealously pursued by their descendants down to the present time. The towns were divided into small school districts, the inhabitants taxed, at least in some of the states, and we do not know but in all, for the support of schools; and the result has been, that with very few exceptions, every person born and educated there is able to read and write, and generally understands arithmetic.

From this course has proceeded that spirit which now operates with such astonishing success throughout our vast republic, and particularly in this state, on the subject of education. The advantages which a community derive from this universal diffusion of knowledge, cannot be measured nor perhaps fully appreciated. In no part of the globe about which we have any knowledge, are they enjoyed to such an extent as in this country.—N. Y. Daily Adv.

THE GYPSIES.

The eleventh number of the Boston edition of Malte-Bran's Geography, just published, contains a curious and interesting account of that wandering tribe of people, who are found under different appellations dispersed through every country in Europe, and to whom in England, some imperfect traditions of their History have assigned the name of Egyptians, or Gypsies. From that work and other authentic sources, we have compiled the following sketch of this singular race.

During the early part of the fifteenth century, the attention of various nations in Europe was first attracted by a tribe of people, different in appearance and manners from the established inhabitants, and speaking a language peculiar to themselves. None could account for their origin; nor could the route by which they had been introduced be traced. Without a home, without a country, and without religion, "They have wandered through the world, and in every religion, and among every people, they have continued equally unchanged by the lapse of time, the variation of climate, and the force of example. Their singular physiognomy and manners are the same in every country. Their complexion receives no darker shade from the burning sun of Africa, or any fairer tint from the milder climates of Europe. They contract no additional laziness in Spain; they acquire no habits of industry in England. In Turkey, they behold the mosque and the crescent with the same indifference that they look on a catholic or protestant church in Europe. In the neighbourhood of civilized life, they continue barbarous, and near cities and settled inhabitants, they live in tents and holes in the earth, or wander from place to place like fugitives and vagabonds." These people are lively, fickle and faithless to every one, even to their own cast, addicted to sensuality, and, like savages, indifferent about the choice of their food. If an ox die of disease, and they can obtain its carcass, men, women and children hasten to the feast, and after their brandy or strong drink is exhausted, they pursue their journey, or take up their quarters for the night. The women may be distinguished by their dark and sparkling eyes, tanned complexion, oval visage, white teeth and jet-black hair. They deal in wanton dances and fortune telling. The mother trains her daughter in vice, and the daughter is scarcely grown before she follows the example of her mother. Although their clothes hardly hang together, a stranger perceives sometimes part of a military coat, the fragment of a lace cap, a torn handkerchief or paltry trinket; their gait and deportment, when thus adorned, evince a more than ordinary share of vanity.

"The wandering tribe of Zigeunes find occupation in some countries as smiths and tinkers; they mend broken plates, and sell wooden ware; a class of them in Moldavia and Wallachia lead a settled life, and gain a livelihood by washing or searching for gold in the beds of rivers; those in the Bannat of Hungary are horse dealers, and are gradually obeying the enactments of Joseph II., by which they are compelled to cultivate the land; but the great majority in Europe abhor a permanent residence and stated hours of labour. The women abuse the credulity of the German and Polish peasants, who imagine that they cure their cattle by witchcraft, and predict fortunate events by inspecting the lineaments of the hand. Many individuals of both sexes, particularly throughout Hungary, are passionately fond of music, the only science in which they have as yet attained any degree of perfection; they are the favourite minstrels of the country people; some have arrived at eminence in cathedrals, and in the choirs of princes. Their guitar is heard in the romantic woods of Spain, and many gypsies, less indolent than the indolent Spaniards, exercise in that country the trade of publicans. They follow willingly whatever occupation most men hate or condemn; in Hungary and Transylvania they are flayers of dead beasts, and executioners of criminals—the mass of the nation is composed of thieves and mendicants.

"The total number of these savages in Europe has never been considered less than 300,000, or than 150,000 in Turkey, 70,000 in Wallachia and Moldavia, 40,000 in Hungary and Transylvania, the rest are scattered in Russia, Prussia, Poland, Germany, Jutland, Spain, and other countries. Persia and Egypt are infested with them; they have appeared in Spanish America.

"The historical traditions concerning the tribe, are reduced to the vague recollection of an ancient and happy people under princes of their own race, that inhabited a country which, according to the doubtful assertion of a writer of the fifteenth century, the first Zigeunes called Little Egypt. It is also affirmed that when they first appeared, they were conducted in their migrations by dukes, princes, and even by kings. 'All the knowledge derived from their history is that they have wandered for many ages. No trace of their worship or religious belief, if they have any, can be discovered. They follow the customs of the countries in which they reside.

"The only information which can be obtained concerning them must be founded on the nature of their language; but the dialect of such a tribe, it may be supposed, is made up of the cant terms of beggars and pickpockets, or not unlike the rothwelsch of the German banditti, or the jargon of the Kataphians, the itinerant physicians in Turkey. Such, however, is not the case, and a people without a country, an asylum, laws or religion, speak a regular language, furnished with grammatical forms." And though it has necessarily undergone many changes, from their successive migrations, it still contains many affinities with a dialect of particular castes in Hindostan. This fact receives the stronger corroboration from having been first recognised by some young men, natives of the coast of Malabar, who were prosecuting their studies at Leyden. Numerous expressions were compared by them, and the same has since been carried to a greater extent by literary men residing in India.

"The Hindoo character of their language, their physical qualities, and the name of Sinte by which they are often called, are strong arguments in favour of the hypothesis, that the Zigeunes are one of the low Indian castes expelled from their country, by some great political revolution, and in consequence of that event, now accustomed and habituated to a wandering life.

"Several writers have attempted to ascertain the period of their migrations, and the region which they formerly inhabited. The devastations committed in India by Tamerlane, about the year 1400, afford a plausible pretext for their flight. It may too be kept in view that their country should be sought in the western part of India, near the banks of the Indus or the Sinde. Pallas infers from their dialect that their ancient country is Moultan, and their origin, the same as that of the Hindoo merchants at present at Astrakhan. Bartolomeo believes they came from Guzarate, perhaps from the neighbourhood of Tatta, where a horde of pirates called Tchinganes still reside. Lastly, Richardson boasts of having found them among the Bazigurs, a wandering tribe of minstrels and dancers. If it be necessary to trace their descent from the inferior Hindoo castes, none in our opinion resemble the Zigeunes more than a tribe of the Soudras, or the Correvas, who have no fixed abode, but lodge in tents; they live by selling baskets or mending kettles, and their women gain money by fortune-telling. Such employments are descriptive of the gypsies.

"Few objections of any importance can be raised against the general hypothesis, but the details connected with it are not so easily explained. Thus if the Zigeunes were Parias, they might in all probability have been the objects of Tamerlane's persecution, but it is not less likely that they would at once have professed Islamism as they now do in Turkey. If they were Tchinganes, the ingenious supposition may be admitted that they fled by sea and arrived in Egypt; but it is necessary to account for the change in their character: these warlike pirates are now mendicants and poltroons. If the Zigeunes were originally a branch of the Soudras or the Banians from Moultan, how happens it that no trace of their superstition is left? If it be answered that the Carrewas and other low castes were as ignorant and as wretched as the Parias, then it must be shown why people so obscure were expelled from a country in which their neighbours and equals were permitted to remain.

"Another objection of a more general kind may be urged against the supposition that the Zigeunes migrated from Indostan about the year 1400. Numerous and thickly scattered hordes inhabited Wallachia, Hungary and Poland, in the year 1433, while only a few detached bands appeared in Persia, Turkey, and Caucasus.

"The celebrated M. Hasse, the author of a different hypothesis, has proved that for the last 3000 years there have been in Europe wandering tribes that bore the names of Segynes or Zigeunes, and Sinties or Sinti; the same writer considers the modern gypsies, the Zigeunes or Sintis, the descendants of these ancient hordes. A Polish geographer, M. Lelewel, has clearly shown that Hindoo nations have been settled since the dawn of history on the shore of the Cimmerian Bosphorus and in Europe, particularly in Thrace. The merits of both these systems may be shortly examined.

"A tribe, whose name was almost the same as that of the Zigeunes, is mentioned in the most ancient profane history. 'The Sigynes, who resemble the Medes in their dress, live on the north side of the Ister (Danube,) in a country which seems to be desert, at least they are the only inhabitants of whom I have received any information. They have little horses with long hair, which are not strong enough to carry men, but able to draw cars with great rapidity. Their frontiers extend to those of the Hæneti, a people on the Adriatic. They call themselves a colony of Medes, a point concerning which I cannot decide, though it may be true, if we make allowance for the lapse of ages. The Ligurians give the name of Sigynes to travelling merchants, the Cyprians to javelins or spears. Such is the testimony of the father of profane history. Strabo describes a people bearing the name of Signii, and inhabiting the Hyrcanian mountains on the south side of the Caspian Sea. "They resembled the Persians in their manners, and had little horses with long hair, not fit for riding, but useful in drawing chariots." In the Argonautics of Apollonius the Sigynnæ are placed at the mouth of the Danube, and in the poems ascribed to Orpheus, in Pontus.

"Sufficient evidence of their ancient migrations is afforded by their settlements in these three distant countries. The description of their horses corresponds with that of the same animal in Baskiria and on the plains of Scythia. We cannot determine whether the Caucasian Zingi of Pliny, or the Indian Singe of the same author, were not different as to their origin from the Zigeunes or Zinganes; or if any traces of these ancient and errant tribes existed in Cappadocia, and in the town of Zingana.

"Different hordes of the same people are probably descended from the Sindi or Sinti, the former inhabitants of Sindica, a country near the Cimmerian Bosphorus. It is supposed from the ancient manuscripts that the name of that region is Indica; the words Sind, Hind and Ind are almost synonymous, and generally confounded by orientalists. Hesychius reconciles at all events the opinions of the ancients, and calls the Sindi an Indian people. The traditions concerning the commercial industry of these tribes, their cowardice, their submitting to the lash of Scythian masters, the prostitution of their women, whose name became a term of reproach, are so many proofs of their common origin with the Zigeunes or Sinties of the present day. Different branches of the same people were scattered throughout Macedonia, a country in which we observe a Sinti district, and in Lemnos, where the Sinties were the workmen of Vulcan; such employment is still the chief occupation of the Zigeunes.

"The Sinties and Sigynnii are not the only Asiatic people dispersed in Europe, or on its confines. The Scythians of the royal tribe were Medes by birth; a knowledge of their language may enable us to explain the ancient geographical names of Scythia. The opinion of D'Anville concerning the Tartar origin of the Getæ is now generally rejected; it is expected that ere long additional information may be obtained from the researches of M. de Saint Martin on the European India of the Armenian writers. It is known that the lower Danube was anciently called Matous; a name supposed to have been derived from the Indian hero, Madhu, the antagonist of Krishna, or from the word madhur, which signifies fresh water. Scylax mentions the town of Aigypsos, Ovid calls it Agyptos, and adds that it was founded by a Caspian on the delta of the Danube; from that place, in all probability, the Zigeunes obtained the title of Egyptians or Gypsies. The existence of the Indi in Asia Minor is attested in the history of the Machabees, and completely proved in a different work.

"It may be concluded from these detached facts, that tribes of the Hindoo race have been wandering or settled in Europe or its confines from the earliest historical age. It is for the historian and orientalist to examine how they came thither, whether they migrated in an age of which no record is left, or were the enemies of Khrisna, a supposition that might explain their singular pretension of having formerly rejected Christ, or if they were a branch of the Hindoo Berber, that Sehah Namé places in the hyperborean regions, or colonies transported from the Indus by the despots of Persia. The geographer has discovered that there existed at an ancient period in Europe, tribes from which the Zigeunes or Sinties appear to have been descended. It is unnecessary for him to extend his inquiries beyond that remarkable fact, or to explain why these petty hordes remained so long unknown in the midst of so many wanderers and savages during the Roman empire in the east. They might have called themselves Roma, from being the subjects of the Romans; they might have wandered near the marshes of Lower Wallachia and Little Egypt, where they are said to have formed a state, situated perhaps in the neighbourhood of Ægyptos. The Zigeunes, the Sintes, the Gypsies, Bohemians and Tchinganes, are probably so many tribes distinguished by their dialects and local migration."—Malte-Brun.

"The preaching of the Peace."

In the early part of the 13th century, the Italian republics were involved in a series of civil wars, the immediate causes of which are now lost in obscurity. So frequent, indeed, had been these appeals to arms, and so familiarized were men to violence and bloodshed, that cotemporary historians did not deem it necessary to do more, than indicate their occurrence, without assigning their motives, or informing us of their results. The animosity of the two great parties, which had for centuries divided the Italian states into Guelfs and Gibelines, was at that period, at its height. Two contending claimants of the imperial throne, had recently made that unhappy country the seat of war; while the ambitious priests who filled successively, for short periods, the pontifical chair, unmindful of the paternal character which they had assumed, incited to new contests, a people addicted to strife, and ungovernable in their resentment. Added to these exciting causes, was the jealousy which existed between the nobles and citizens, producing in many instances bloody commotions, which, whether resulting in the exclusion of the nobles from participation in the government, or in their usurpation of supreme authority, left the seeds of suspicion and hatred, to engender new dissensions, violent and interminable. In Lombardy, all these causes existed in their most aggravated form, and operated, perhaps, with not the less effect, that the famous Lombardy League, formed at a juncture when they were menaced by the Imperial Arms, had restrained for a time, the violence of passions which it could not suppress. At this period, a number of Dominican monks, whose unhappy office it had been to arouse the populace to the persecution of the unfortunate Albigenses, bethought themselves of an employment more worthy of their religion, and commenced those exercises, which were long known in Italy, as "The preaching of the peace." Severe in their morals, and practised in austerities, they had acquired a reputation for sanctity, well fitted to promote their laudable designs. Among those engaged in this noble undertaking, no one was more distinguished than John, of Vicencia. He commenced his preaching, at Bologna, in 1233, with eminent success. The citizens, the neighbouring peasants, and especially the soldiers, attracted by his eloquence, assembled in crowds around him, and displaying their crosses and their banners, seemed equally prepared to receive the precepts and obey the orders of the preacher. Among this multitude, moved by his discourse, all those in Bologna, who had entertained any enmities, were seen coming to lay them at his feet, and swear perpetual peace with their former foes. The magistrates themselves, actuated by the same impulse, submitted their laws to his revival, entreating that those statutes might be annulled which could give rise to future dissensions. Proceeding to Padua, the municipal authorities came out to meet him at many leagues' distance, and conducted him in triumph into the city, seated on the sacred car. The assembled populace heard with transport, "the preaching of the peace," and applauded those reconciliations, which effaced on the instant, the animosities of years. Thus he visited, with uniform success, the principal cities of Lombardy, every where reconciling enemies, and every where hailed as the "healer of breaches." Nor was it in the republican towns only, that he was received in this character: The nobles submitted their differences with equal confidence to his arbitration, and the whole population of Lombardy, prepared to assist at a solemn assembly, which he had convoked in the plain of Paquarra, on the banks of the Adige. Never had a nobler enterprise been undertaken, (such is the remark of M. Sismondi, whose relation of this extraordinary passage we follow,) than that of reconciling twenty inimical states, by the mere inspiration of religious sentiments, by the simple influence of Christianity—by the unaided power of language. Never had a grander spectacle been presented to the eyes of men. The entire populations of Verona and Mantua, of Brescia and Padua, and of eight other of the principal cities of Lombardy, surrounded their respective magistrates, assembled under their national standards, while a numerous company of bishops and of nobles appeared at the head of their vassals. From a lofty seat, elevated in the midst of the plain, the voice of the preacher, assisted, it was said, by supernatural interposition, was distinctly heard by every individual of that vast assemblage, and might well seem to their heated imaginations to descend from heaven. His text was the affecting language of the Redeemer, "My peace I give unto you—my peace I leave with you." With an eloquence till then unknown, he drew a frightful picture of the miseries of war; he described the spirit of Christianity, as a spirit of peace, proclaimed the authority of the Holy See, with which he was invested, and in the name of God, and of the church, he commanded the Lombards to renounce their enmities. He dictated to them a treaty of universal pacification, which was to be cemented by the union of families once inimical, and devoted to everlasting malediction, those who should violate this peace, calling down mortal disease upon their flocks, and dooming to hopeless sterility, their vineyards and their cornfields. Such was the success which attended the preaching of this apostle of peace, that for a time a universal cessation of war, rewarded his labours; and one of the treaties formed under his auspices, still extant, and which contains scarcely any other condition than that of mutual forgiveness of injuries, has handed down to posterity, the name of John, of Vicencia, with an eclat as singular as it is enviable.

THE REVOLUTIONS OF EMPIRE.

The following passage, from Plowden's History of Ireland, is fitted to excite melancholy reflections on the mutability of human grandeur. The Roman, Constantinopolitan, Irish and Spanish empires—where are they?—The Roman—stripped of its territories and its terrors—the Constantinopolitan, struggling for its very existence—the Irish—with its neck under the foot of its enemy—the Spanish, to use the eloquent figure of Edmund Burke, “a whale stranded on the coast of Europe.”

The sceptre has passed to “regions Cæsar never knew”—to pass in turn from these—and leave them like Assyria, and Egypt—a desolation and a waste.

“There happened, about the year of our Lord 1418, a very notable transaction, which proved the high estimation in which the kingdom of Ireland then was, and ever had been holden by the learned of Europe. At the council of Constance, the ambassadors from England were refused the rank and precedence which they claimed over some others; they were not even allowed to rank or take any place as the ambassadors of a nation: the advocates for France insisted, that the English, having been conquered by the Romans, and again subdued by the Saxons, who were tributaries to the German empire, and never governed by native sovereigns, they should take place as a branch only of the German empire, and not as a free nation; ‘for,’ added they, ‘it is evident from Albertus Magnus and Bartholomew Glanville, that the world is divided into three parts, Europe, Asia and Africa: Europe was divided into four empires, the Roman, the Constantinopolitan, the Irish, and the Spanish.’ The English advocates, admitting the force of these allegations, claimed their precedence and rank from Henry’s being monarch of Ireland only, and it was accordingly granted.”

The following excellent observations are contained in Butler’s Reminiscences, and are interesting not only on account of their intrinsic worth, but for the high authority from which they proceed. To those of our fair friends who are disposed to profit by the recommendation of the Reminiscent, we may take the present occasion to say that there is no more invigorating exercise of the understanding than the practice of composition. We mean of drawing up, clear and succinct statements in one’s own language, of an historical narrative, of a philosophical argument, of the relations of intelligent travellers, or of whatever may have been an object of study. It is a practice which may be considered as essential towards the formation of a clear masculine understanding—of fixed principles in morals and philosophy—of an easy and correct mode of expression. It may be found to be irksome in the beginning; yet it will soon become not only pleasant in itself, and in a high degree useful in the further pursuit of knowledge—but will furnish some of the most delightful recollections of the advances which the mind has made from time to time, in knowledge, wisdom, and virtue.

“Mr. Burke once mentioned to the Reminiscent, that, at one time, for want of a distinct object, to which he might direct his studies, his mind became perfectly inactive, and reading was an unpleasant exertion to him. He accounted for it by supposing, that after the first years of youth are past, the mind requires more substantial food than mere reading; so that to call forth literary application, it is necessary to superadd the stimulus of an ardent wish to attain a particular object, to the attainment of which, literary exertion will conduce, and therefore pleases. He observed, that for the want of such an object the generality of those who have distinguished themselves in their youthful studies, fall into an idle desultory reading, which ends in nothing.

“Mr. Gibbon applies this remark to female readers:—‘Except some professed scholars’ (he says, in a letter to Lord Sheffield) ‘I have often observed that women in general read much more than men; but for want of a plan, a method, a fixed object, their reading is of little use to themselves or others.’ Merely keeping a literary journal directs the attention, and finds a succession of objects for it: should it not therefore be recommended to studious ladies?”

From the above quotation to the following the transition is natural. The counsel it contains should be deeply impressed on the minds of all our young readers. The error to which Locke refers is very incident to the eagerness and presumptuousness of youth, and has dissipated the promise held forth in early life by many a bright and talented mind.

READING.

“This is that which I think great readers are apt to be mistaken in. Those who have read of every thing, are thought to understand every thing too; but it is not always so. Reading furnishes the mind only with materials of knowledge; it is thinking makes what we read ours. We are of the ruminating kind, and it is not enough to cram ourselves with a great load of collections; unless we chew them over again, they will not give us strength and nourishment. There are, indeed, in some writers, visible instances of deep thought, close and acute reasoning, and ideas well pursued. The light these would give would be of great use, if their readers would observe and imitate them: all the rest at best are but particulars fit to be turned into knowledge; but that can be done only by our own meditation, and examining the reach, force, and coherence of what is said; and then, as far as we apprehend and see the connexion of ideas, so far is it ours; without that, it is but so much loose matter floating in our brain. The memory may be stored, but the judgment is little better, and the stock of knowledge not increased by being able to repeat what others have said, or produce the arguments we have found in them. Such a knowledge as this is but knowledge by hearsay, and the ostentation of it is at best but talking by rote, and very often upon weak and wrong principles: for all that is to be found in books is not built upon true foundations, nor always rightly reduced from the principles it is pretended to be built on. Such an examen as is requisite to discover that, every reader’s mind is not forward to make; especially in those who have given themselves up to a party, and only hunt for what they can scrape together that may favour and support the tenets of it. Such men wilfully exclude themselves from truth, and from all true benefit to be received by reading. Others of more indifferency often want attention and industry. The mind is backward in itself to be at the pains to trace every argument to its original, and to see upon what basis it stands, and how firmly; but yet it is this that gives so much the advantage to one man more than another in reading. The mind should, by severe rules, be tied down to this, at first, uneasy task; use and exercise will give it facility; so that those who are accustomed to it, readily, as it were with one cast of the eye, take a view of the argument, and presently, in most cases, see where it bottoms. Those who have got this faculty, one may say, have got the true key of books, and the clue to lead them through the maze of variety of opinions and authors, to truth and certainty. This young beginners should be entered in, and showed the use of, that they may profit by their reading. Those who are strangers to it will be apt to think it too great a clog in the way of men’s studies; and they will suspect they shall make but small progress, if, in the books they read, they must stand to examine and unravel every argument, and follow it step by step, up to its original.

“I answer, this is a good objection, and ought to weigh with those whose reading is designed for much talk and little knowledge, and I have nothing to say to it. But I am here inquiring into the conduct of the understanding in its progress towards knowledge; and to those who aim at that, I may say, that he who goes steadily forward in a course that points right, will sooner be at his journey’s end, than he that runs after every one he meets, though he gallop all day full speed.

“To which let me add, that this way of thinking on and profiting by what we read, will be a clog and rub to any one only in the beginning; when custom and exercise have made it familiar, it will be despatched, in most occasions, without resting or interruption in the course of our reading. The motions and views of a mind exercised that way are wonderfully quick; and a man used to such sort of reflections sees as much at one glimpse, as would require a long discourse to lay before another, and make out in an entire and gradual deduction. Besides that when the first difficulties are over, the delight and sensible advantage it brings, mightily encourage and enliven the mind in reading, which, without this, is very improperly called study.”

There is now gone over to the country of my nativity, (alluding to Dr. Priestly,) one, who with the New Testament in his hands, is laying the axe, by his arguments, as much as is in his power to the very root of the christian religion. This is my faith that he is endeavouring to destroy the foundation whereon it is built, and yet pretending to bring his doctrines from scripture. But what will not sophistry do? What has it not done? Oh! the evils it has produced in the world. But I trust neither this man, learned and wise as he may be in the world’s estimation, nor any other, will ever be able to sap that foundation which God hath laid in Zion; nor to rob you or my own soul, of that glorious hope, and blessed consolation in the redemption and mediation of our dear Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. God forbid it should, and I trust it will not. The Lord will, by his own light and power, dispel every cloud and darkness that shall arise to cast up a mist before the eyes of the professors of christianity.

GEORGE FOX.

There are many circumstances connected with the life of this great and good man, which show him to have been not only a sincere Christian, but a sound Philanthropist. Our attention has lately been forcibly arrested in perusing some of his epistles, and observing the anxious and pious concern which he evinced for the spiritual welfare and temporal happiness of the Indians and blacks, on this continent. At the time when he visited America, most of the settlements of Friends were newly formed and located in the midst of Indian tribes. George Fox appears to have been ardently desirous that his brethren might not only give them proper instruction in the great doctrines of the christian religion, but that in their intercourse with the natives, they might practically enforce the sacred truths which they inculcated, and we believe none of the early settlers pursued a course of conduct toward them, more uniformly mild, pacific and equitable, than the Society of Friends.

He had witnessed, experimentally, the blessed effects of the gospel of Christ—he knew what it was to feel those rich consolations which gladden the soul of the awakened and converted sinner, when permitted to feel the evidence, that his iniquities are washed away in the atoning blood of the meek and lowly and crucified Lamb. He was convinced by his own experience, that no part of the great plan of christian redemption, was more eminently calculated to awaken humble gratitude and sincere love to God, than the precious truth, “that while we were yet sinners, and without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly, and that being now justified by his precious blood, much more shall we be saved from wrath through him.” He, therefore, earnestly enjoined it on his American brethren, as a duty which they owed to these poor benighted children of the wilds, to preach unto them Christ Jesus, and him crucified, as their Redeemer and Saviour. The following extracts from his Epistles, will confirm our assertions, and evince the benevolent and catholic temper of his mind, viz:

“For Friends in the ministry, scattered abroad in Virginia, Maryland, New England, Barbadoes, and other plantations beyond sea.”—“And some of you should take some of the eminent, true, good, and upright Friends, and go and discourse with some of the heathen kings, desiring them to gather their council and people together, that you may declare God’s everlasting truth, and his everlasting way of life and salvation to them, knowing that Christ is the promise of God to them, a covenant of light to the Gentiles, who is also the new covenant to the Jews.” &c. 1667.

“To Friends in Barbadoes.”

“And do not neglect your family meetings among your whites and negroes, but do your diligence and duty to God and them; which you will not neglect if you keep in the faith of Abraham, and of the blessed Seed which inheriteth the crown. And be at peace among yourselves, that you may show that you are in Christ, the Prince of peace; and that doth show, that you are the disciples of Christ, and learners and followers of Him, So possess Him who is life eternal.—Amen.” 1672.

“And also, you must preach the grace of God, to all blacks and Indians, which grace brings salvation, that hath appeared unto all men, to teach and instruct them to live godly, righteously and soberly, which grace of God is sufficient to teach and establish all true Christians, that they may appear before the throne of grace.”

“And also you must instruct and teach your Indians and negroes, and all others, how that Christ, by the grace of God, tasted death for every man, and gave himself a ransom for all men, to be testified in due time, and is the propitiation, not for the sins of christians only, but for the sins of the whole world, and how that He doth enlighten every man that cometh into the world; with his true light, which is the life in Christ, by whom the world was made.” 1679.

“To Friends in West Jersey and Pennsylvania.”

“And if sometimes you should have some meetings with the Indian kings and their councils, to let them know the principles of Truth; so that they may know the way of salvation, and the nature of true christianity, and how that Christ hath died for them, ‘who tasted death for every man,’ (and so the gospel of salvation must be preached to every creature under heaven,) and how that Christ hath enlightened them, who enlightens all that come into the world. And God hath poured out his spirit upon all flesh, and so the Indians must receive God’s spirit; for ‘the grace of God which brings salvation, hath appeared unto all men.’—And so let them know, that they have a day of salvation, grace and favour of God offered unto them; if they will receive it, it will be their blessing.” 1687. E. T.

Mr. Burke’s “Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful,” raised him in the world, and introduced him to the acquaintance of several persons distinguished by rank or talents. That his conversation was eminently interesting, entertaining and instructive, is universally admitted. It was very discursive: if the person with whom he conversed, had full leisure to listen, and only wished for general information, nothing can be conceived more delightful: it abounded with eloquence, elegance, learning, novelty and pleasantry: it was the basket of Pomona, full of every choice and every common fruit. But, if a person wished for information upon any particular point, and his time for listening was limited, Mr. Burke’s eloquent rambles were sometimes very provoking. Sir Philip Francis once waited upon him, by appointment, to read over to him some papers respecting Mr. Hastings’ delinquencies. He called on Mr. Burke, in his way to the house of a friend, with whom he was engaged to dine. He found him in his garden, holding a grasshopper: “What a beautiful animal is this!” said Mr. Burke: “observe its structure; its legs, its wings, its eyes.” “How can you,” said Sir Philip, “lose your time in admiring such an animal, when you have so many objects of moment to attend to?” “Yet Socrates,” said Mr. Burke, “according to the exhibition of him in Aristophanes, attended to a much less animal; he actually measured the proportion which its size bore to the space it passed over in its skip. I think the skip of a grasshopper does not exceed its length: let us see.” “My dear friend,” said Sir Philip, “I am in a great hurry; let us walk in, and let me read my papers to you.” Into the house they walked; Sir Philip began to read, and Mr. Burke appeared to listen. At length, Sir Philip having misplaced a paper, a pause ensued.—“I think,” said Mr. Burke, “that naturalists are now agreed, that locusta, not cicada, is the Latin word for grasshopper. What’s your opinion, Sir Philip?”—“My opinion,” answered Sir Philip, packing up his papers, and preparing to move off, “is, that till the grasshopper is out of your head, it will be idle to talk to you of the concerns of India.”—Butler’s Reminiscences.

FOR THE FRIEND.

THE POOR SYSTEM OF PHILADELPHIA.

From the accounts of the Guardians of the Poor, for the year ending with the 25th of the 5th month last, which have been recently published, I abstract the following statement. Although the subject more immediately concerns our own citizens, it will, I think, interest the distant subscribers of the Friend.

The poor laws of Pennsylvania, as applied to Philadelphia, are perhaps the very worst in the Union. They are administered by a body of mere than 60 men, that generally changes its majorities and its measures, every six months, and whose duties are so irksome, that it is difficult to find suitable persons willing to remain in the office long enough to become master of its details.

A committee, appointed by the Overseers last summer to visit the principal towns on the seaboard of the middle and northern states, for the purpose of examining their mode of relieving the poor—stated on their return, that they were compelled “to admit the mortifying fact, that every system they have examined, is superior to our own.” The committee further state, “that of all modes of providing for the poor, the most wasteful, the most expensive, and the most injurious to their morals, and destructive of their industrious habits, is that of supply in their own families.” This able and interesting report, attracted the public attention so strongly, that a meeting of the citizens was called soon after its publication to consider the subject. That meeting appointed a committee to examine it in all its details, and report a digested plan for relieving the poor. I am glad in being able to state, that this committee has completed its labours, and that a project of a law, free from the gross imperfections of the present one, and striking at the very root of many existing evils, will be submitted to the legislature, early in the ensuing winter.

The poor tax for 1827, was assessed as follows:

		per cent.
City,	$61,295.06	= 68.2
Southwark,	6,029.18	6.6
Northern Liberties,	16,050.22	18.
Penn Township,	6,586.81	7.2
	89,961.27	100

At the commencement of the year, there was in the treasury, $33,721.96, the amount received from taxes, was $87,490.38, from medical students attending the hospital practice in the alms house, $3,036.35; from the sale of manufactures, $1,137.97, from sundry fees, pay-patients, &c. $7,013.10; payments on account of the board of illegitimate children, and married women deserted by their husbands, $6,663.22, and various other sources, $5,644.76.

Orders were drawn in favour of the managers of the alms house, for $72,035.21, and in favour of the out-door guardians, for $74,874.21; making the whole expenditure, $146,910.42, and leaving a balance in the treasury, of $4,228.42.

The expenses actually incurred within the year, for the support of the alms house, amounted to $48,794.92, being for the support of an average of 1056 paupers, at a cost of 79½ cents each, per week.*

The number of paupers in the house at the commencement of the year, was 1027. During the year, 4860 were admitted, of whom 2477 were from the city, 575 from the Northern Liberties, and 781 from Southwark. The number discharged, eloped and deceased, was 5930, leaving in the house at the date of the report, 930 paupers. The alms house contained the greatest number of poor in the 1st month, when the average of its inmates was 1378, viz. 614 men, 619 women, and 145 children.

A considerable number of the paupers are employed in manufacturing the coarse clothes worn in the house, and in gardening, and other occupations. The amount of goods manufactured last year, is reported to have been $6,851.50, and the nett profits, $2,104.91, including the labour of the paupers employed, whose support is not charged.

The sums paid by the guardians, exclusive of the cost of medicines for the relief of the out-door poor, as they are termed, was $38,281.84, viz. in the city, $12,619.58; in the Northern Liberties, $13,858.76; in Southwark, $8,709.67, and in Penn Township, $3,093.83. For the support of the Children's Asylum (the most unexceptionable and interesting part of the present system,) $9,843.59 was paid, and $96.71 for the board of negro children in "the Shelter," an excellent and praiseworthy institution—that deserves more patronage and encouragement than it has yet enjoyed. $10,226.84 was paid for the board of an average of 30 married women, deserted by their husbands, and 249 illegitimate children.

$807.28 was expended in bread and wood given publicly to the poor, agreeably to the wills of several humane persons, who have left funds in the hands of the guardians for that purpose. The expences of the medical department of the alms house, were $8,904.81, and for medicines and physicians salaries for out-door poor, $4,050.95. The amount paid during the year, in salaries, to the steward, matron, physicians, nurses, assistants, agents, &c. of this cumbersome machine, amounted nearly to $10,000.

Such are the enormous expences under the Poor System of Philadelphia—a system which costs the city, in proportion to its population, nearly one half more than the tax paid for the same purpose in Boston, nearly double that levied in New York, and nearly three times the amount paid in Baltimore. S.

Green street Address of the 4th month.

COMMENTARY.

The events which occurred at Abington, were only the prelude to scenes of equal or greater oppression. The resolution to expel Friends from their meeting houses, and take exclusive possession of them, appeared now to be fully come to, and the followers of E. H. in different parts of the country, proceeded to act upon it.

Three of the monthly meetings of Abington Quarter, were denied the use of their meeting houses in the 8th month, viz. Gwynned, Horsham, and Byberry; and in the 9th month, Abington was added to the number.

In consequence of this unchristian treatment, Friends were obliged to hold their meetings in private houses. At Byberry, the violence of the separatists was truly affecting. One of them styled the Quarterly meeting's committee, which was in attendance, and other Friends, "The Infernal host," and another in the same spirit of "love and forbearance," declared that sooner than allow Friends to occupy the house, he would sit there until he died and the flesh rotted off his bones!!

In Bucks county, the same hostile feelings appeared to predominate. At the Quarterly Meeting, held at Falsington, in the 8th month, a distinguished minister among the new sect, denominated the Committee of the Yearly Meeting, who were present, "the blood-hounds of persecution!!" Many of the hearers appeared to catch the influence of his "forbearing" spirit, and two of the Monthly Meetings which immediately ensued, were necessarily held in the yard, attached to the meeting house, the followers of E. H. charitably keeping possession of the houses for themselves, while aged and infirm Friends, of both sexes, were under the necessity of standing for hours, in the open air, exposed to the burning rays of a summer sun. A third Monthly Meeting was held in a dwelling house.

The Monthly Meeting of Middletown, concluded to meet at the usual time, in the 10th month, at Bristol, leaving the house at Middletown, to the occupancy of the separatists. At the appointed time, they assembled at the meeting house, and found it locked against them. So careful had the followers of E. H. been that Friends should not find a meeting place on the premises, that a school kept on the property of the Society, had been dismissed, and the house locked up, lest they should use it as a meeting room. In this dilemma, the inhabitants of Bristol, evinced a spirit at once christian and brotherly—the houses of two religious societies, were promptly and generously offered for the accommodation of the Friends, who had assembled—but a neighbouring dwelling house having been concluded upon for holding the meeting, the kind offer was declined, though not without feelings of sincere gratitude to those who had given so gratifying a proof of their sympathy with Friends, under the trying circumstances in which they were placed.

At Solebury, the adherents of E. H. evinced a disposition not only to debar Friends from the use of the house for the accommodation of the Monthly Meeting, but also to coerce them into a compliance with their views. Without any apparent reason, they changed the day of holding the mid week meeting, and directed the person who had charge of the house, not to open it at the usual time. Thus circumstanced, Friends must either submit to their authority and jurisdiction, or hold their meeting at some other place. They concluded, however, to make one trial to obtain the use of the house, and accordingly went there on the established day of the meeting. The house was locked, and the person who kept the key, refused to open it for them—they were consequently obliged to meet under the sheds erected for the accommodation of the horses; but the inclemency of the weather, rendered it imprudent to continue there, and they removed to a private house.

The scenes which have repeatedly occurred at Darby, and the unkind treatment which the women Friends of that place have several times received, are of a painful character, and certainly ought to excite shame in all those who engaged in them—several of whom are leading characters among the new sect.

The women Friends attempted to hold their Monthly Meeting, after the separatists had gone through with the business of theirs. In their peaceable and quiet endeavours to accomplish this object, they not only experienced interruption from their own sex; but the men, forgetting that tenderness and respect which, under all circumstances, is due to the female character, rudely entered their apartment, and in an arbitrary and angry manner, ordered them to leave the house—and threatened them with calling in the civil authority. When they attempted to speak in their own defence, and to vindicate their just rights, some peremptorily and sternly commanded them to be quiet, and "hold their tongues," while others raised a loud clamour and outcry, purposely to drown their voices—and several were assailed by unkind and harsh epithets. The partitions separating the men's and women's apartments, were thrown open with great violence, and a large number of men encouraged to enter the women's room, who were obliged to endure the jeers and the taunts of the unfeeling spectators. The principal actors in these scenes, were men of mature years; several of them holding the high and responsible station of Elders in the new Society; while the objects of their rude attack were a few weak and defenceless women, some of them bending under a load of years and infirmity, who were peaceably endeavouring to discharge what they believed to be a religious duty, by quietly setting together to hold their Monthly Meeting.

Some of the Elders we allude to, not only joined themselves in these scenes of violence, but endeavoured to incite the youth to similar acts of incivility; one of whom acknowledged that they would not have engaged in them, if they had not been encouraged by their older Friends.

The women were finally driven from the meeting house, and obliged to resort to the dwelling of a Friend in the neighbourhood, where they were permitted to hold their meeting in safety.

It is really humiliating and painful to us to have occasion to recur to such transactions—the reflections which they necessarily excite on the frailty of human nature, are at once humbling and mortifying.

We were glad to find, however, that some of the more moderate adherents to the new sect, expressed their entire disapprobation of such unchristian conduct, and indignantly disclaimed all participation in it.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH, 3, 1827.

By accounts recently received in this city, we have been gratified to learn, that the Yearly Meeting of Ohio, which convened on the 3d of the 9th month, and that of Indiana, which commenced on the 8th of the 10th month, have both been satisfactorily held: several important conclusions, calculated to promote the welfare of the Society at large, have been adopted. The Yearly Meeting of Indiana, has issued an Epistle to its members, warning them against imbibing the pernicious sentiments which are at present afloat. In this Epistle, the doctrines of the Berean, of Elias Hicks' Sermons, and his Letter to Doctor Shoemaker, are quoted, and extracts given from the Holy Scriptures, and the writings of our ancient Friends; so as to show the contrast in a striking point of view. The Sermons and Letters of E. H. have already been examined, and their inconsistency with the tenor of sacred writ, clearly shown. As regards the principles inculcated in the Berean, the following extracts will be sufficient to illustrate their anti-christian tendency.

"Neither are the Scriptures a divine revelation to us, but a history only of what was revealed to others."

"In vain does any man quote the Scriptures, as authority for his opinions; for if they have not been immediately revealed to his own mind by the Holy Spirit, they deserve no better name, as it respects him, than speculations." Vol. II. P. 211.

"The author refers to the Scriptures, as to a divine revelation. There cannot, perhaps, be a greater abuse of terms than this; never was counsel more darkened by words without knowledge." P. 212.

No. 17. February 21st, 1826, p. 258. "In what manner, then, or by what means was He [Jesus Christ] made more than man?"

I answer, by the same means, and in the same manner, that every OTHER righteous, undefiled man, is raised above the mere human character; that is to say, by the power and spirit of God the Father."

Page 259. "Will it be presumed, that God, whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain, whose presence fills the whole universe, abide in his fulness, literally, in the man Jesus? Can it be supposed that He, of whom it is declared that he was limited in knowledge, power and action, possessed, absolutely, the spirit of God without measure? I believe not."

"The doctrine, therefore, contained in the chapter under review, ascribing a proper divinity to Jesus Christ, making him the foundation of every christian doctrine, asserting that the Divine nature essentially belonged to him, and constituting him a distinct object of faith and worship, is not only anti-scriptural, but opposed to the simplest principles of reason; and is, in short, among the darkest doctrines that has ever been introduced into the Christian church."

This work, it is well known, was edited and supported by the followers of Elias Hicks, and a noted preacher of this sect, declared it to be "one of the best works of the present day," and that "it would be a standard work for ages to come." This is decisive proof of the wide difference which exists between the doctrines of Elias Hicks, and his adherents, and those of the religious society of Friends—and it is a satisfactory circumstance, that the Yearly Meeting of Indiana, in its official capacity, has publicly declared this difference. We are in daily expectation of receiving a copy of the Epistle, and shall avail ourselves of an early opportunity to present it to the readers of the Friend.

We gratefully make our acknowledgments to our friends, for several articles of peculiar interest which enrich the columns of this day's paper;—to the communication from Baltimore, we would particularly call the attention of our readers, as containing deeply instructive matter, worthy the serious regard of all, at the present affecting crisis, and couched in a style and language, adapted to every capacity. We should be glad of a further acquaintance with the author.

"Sketches of Early Pennsylvania, No. 3," and "Falls of Kakabikka," have been received, which, with several other communications, prose and poetical, will be attended to in due course.

From the rapid manner in which our list of subscribers is filling up, and in a great many instances without an effort on our part, we are induced to hope that the enterprise meets with pretty general approbation. As we do not propose to print a large number of surplus copies, it may be well for those who intend becoming subscribers, not to delay forwarding their names, and it is requested very respectfully, of persons holding subscription papers, to return them, or a list of the names, as early as practicable.

A letter Box is attached to the door of the publisher's office, for the reception of communications for "The Friend."

It is ordained in the eternal constitution of things, that men of intemperate minds cannot be free. Their passions forge their fetters.—Ed. Burke.

Deep humility is a strong bulwark; and as we enter into it, we find safety and true exaltation.—Jno. Woolman.

FOR THE FRIEND.

"Love your enemies; bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you; and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you."

Christian forbearance is an essential qualification to happiness, but it is one, with which the mass of the professed followers of Christ, to judge from their actions, are very ignorant. How few of us are there who, when we consider ourselves oppressed, or injured, can adopt the language of Jesus of Nazareth, and say: "Father forgive them, they know not what they do." And yet true christianity must and will lead to this temper of mind; nor can we without this heavenly disposition ever enjoy, even in this life, that state of happiness which of right belongs to Christian resignation.

These remarks grow out of the state of feeling manifested and expressed by many of our brethren, who have become restless, and who say their views on religious opinions are not changed; that they do not believe the doctrines which have unhappily been introduced into our society; that they still believe, with our forefathers, that Jesus Christ was the Son of God, that he was, as to the flesh, miraculously, and consequently, divinely begotten, and that he laid down his life for the sins of the whole world, and that, "as by one man came death, so also by one man came the resurrection from the dead." But these dear friends object, that some of our members in authority have acted arbitrarily; have been oppressive. When in my moments of retirement, I have examined this question with all the intelligence in my possession, I have been jealous, lest an insubordinate disposition has been the mighty enemy, that has found his way into our enclosure, and has, like aameleon, put on every shade of colour, that will show him to most advantage. Now he calls in question the divine doctrines of the scriptures; then he admits a part of them, and denies others: now he contends that every man, in the same religious community ought, as a minister, be permitted to promulgate what doctrines he thinks proper, without any barrier or restraint; then he contends that the general usage of the society is intolerant. And thus, all who are dissatisfied—all who are opposed to order and subordination, cry out "oppression." If these things be so, so they ought not to be; nor will they ever make one of the comers thereunto happy. They who fall into this current may be flushed for a moment; they may fancy a state of happiness, but when they attempt to repose in the shades of the willows which grow on its banks, they will find they have been mistaken, and that they will not be screened from the tempest; but will be like the Israelites of old, and have to say, "we wept when we remembered Zion."

In all communities, subordination is necessary, but in none so much so, as in religious communities. And although "he is the freeman whom the truth sets free, and all are slaves beside," yet this blessed state of freedom does not lead to insubordination. When Saul was directed by the Lord's prophet, Samuel, what course to pursue in relation to the Amalekites; and when, after violating these instructions, he offered sacrifice unto the Lord; he was told that obedience was better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams. All religious societies have adopted certain principles in doctrine, and in discipline; and to obey these principles is the duty of every member of each Christian community. Those who violate them are unmindful of the injunction of the apostle: "Let all things be done decently and in order."

The first offence recorded in scripture history, originated in this unhappy temper: but the melancholy case of Cain, then of Esau, but more especially of the children of Israel during their pilgrimage to the promised land, and subsequently, should teach us obedience. I entreat our brethren, who have unhappily suffered their minds to become soured with their fellow members, to revert to those important items of scripture history, and see what sad disasters—what awful chastisements God's chosen people again and again brought upon themselves, by their insubordination. The offence of this people was not against Moses, but against the great disposer of all events, and of all things. When the Lord again and again determined to destroy them off of the face of the earth, Moses entreated for them; he interceded with the Most High, as one man intercedeth with another, and He who "is love," in his adorable goodness, heard his servant Moses, and granted his request. Thus did this people continue their state of insubordination from journey to journey, though punished time after time; and though miracle after miracle was wrought by Him, "who is wonderful in counsel, and mighty in working," to show them Moses was his instrument of righteousness, and the work unto which he had been called of Him. This people finally went to so great an excess, as to determine to make them a captain, and to return into Egypt, when not far distant from the land of promise. And when Joshua and Caleb attempted to encourage them to obedience, and to dissuade them from their wicked purpose, "all the people bade stone them with stones." Thus a spirit of insubordination had led them on from one excess to another, until they not only bade stone those instruments of righteousness with stones, but were ready, in the language of the "law-giver," to stone him. And, if we are not, as were the children of Israel, deceiving ourselves, and as they, viewing our sincere friends as our enemies; there is nothing—no act, that can be committed by a brother in communion with us, which can in any manner justify the insubordination, which has unhappily been introduced into our society, by those whose cry is "toleration." We know our own temper of mind, as well as the acts to which it leads; we think we know our brethren—in the former case we ought not to be mistaken, in the latter we may. To censure our brethren for presumed feelings, and acts, of which we know ourselves guilty, is unchristian. And had we even as positive proof of our brethren's errors, as we have of our own, our duty, as Christians, would be to forgive them, for we are bound to "love our enemies," and not to fear those who can, at the worst, do us but a temporary injury, but Him whose favours we abuse. To abandon a duty required of us, and one whose fruits, if complied with, would be peace and happiness, because we have taken a dislike to some of our brethren, is a worse reason for an error, than that given in the parable, by the man who received the one talent. This man knew, as he said, that his Lord was an austere man reaping where he had not sown, and gathering where he had not strawn, and he wrapped the talent in a napkin, and hid it in the earth. But we, because we have taken it into our heads, that some of our brethren are oppressive, not only refrain from doing our duty, but withdraw from religious communion with those, with whom our fathers went heart in hand, and unite with those who deny, as we think, the fundamental principles of Christianity! Where is our love to our brother? Where is our love to God? When we, like Esau, thus barter our birthright for a momentary comfort, and that but imaginary? When we sell that which would make us happy both in time and eternity, for the gratification of those feelings which should be crucified; feelings which Paul, the learned apostle, had to contend against; for, says he, "when I should do good, evil is present." And he, therefore, learnt to subject himself, lest, while he preached to others, he should become a cast away. And this is a duty all have to perform, who wish to walk in the paths of peace, and dwell in a quiet habitation. All jealousy and bickering—all animosity and strife, are to the soul, what rust is to iron. And, as this is not only tarnished, but even destroyed by the rust, so is the soul by those unholy dispositions of mind. While living, they are as a continual canker to it, and when dead—dead? it never dies; and yet, its eternal misery is called its destruction. Those who carry these unhappy feelings with them to the confines of eternity, may be mistaken if they think, there to shake them off, as they would an old garment. If happiness is our pursuit, the sooner we get rid of these feelings, the better. Those who have experienced them when freed therefrom, feel as if "a cart pressed down with sheaves" had been taken from off them; and their "souls can rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of their salvation."

PHILOTHEUS.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

The following stanzas were written in commemoration of the exclusion of Friends from their Meeting House, at Abington. By a young woman.

The gathering around the Oak Tree.

Why should the "little remnant mourn?"
Tho' closed the house of prayer:
An aged oak its shelter gave,
And surely He was there—
Who dwells in house not built with hands,
Eternal in the skies,
Incense nor costly altar craves,
Nor Lamb for sacrifice.
But who the purest offering still Finds in a willing mind:

And oft, "tho' paths they know not of,"

In safety leads the blind—

Yes—He was there—the faithful band

"O'ershadowed by his love,"

Saw in each bow that gently waved

A peace-branch from above.

Jesus was in the awful pause—

The prayer He prompted too;

And softly sighed—"Father forgive,

"They know not what they do.

"While thus they crucify afresh

"The Lamb of Calvary;

"Oh, Lord, be merciful to them,

"Tho' they are false to Thee."—

And many a voiceless prayer was borne

Up to the throne of God,

That none might question heaven's decree,

But bless the chastening rod—

That tho' our pathway thorny be,

We fearless might pursue

The track our fathers mark'd with blood—

Unmurmuring mark'd it too.

Then freely may the little band

Accept the chalice given,

'Till by the Saviour call'd to swell

The symphonies of heaven.

And when their weary pilgrimage—

Their day on earth is done,

God hath a coronal for those

Who trusted in the Son.

The one hundred and forty-fifth anniversary of the landing of William Penn, was commemorated in this city the 24th ult., by the Society instituted for the purpose. The following Ode was composed for the occasion, by B. H. COATES, M. D.

I.

When Britain's torn and bleeding band
Before the furious Saxon flew,
From field to field, around the land,
Each hour the madd'ning slaughter grew;
In flames, before their wasteful foes,
Temple, and tow'r, and city glow;
And priest and infant fed the soil;
And Wealth and Learning sunk before the sons of spoil.

II.

For this, adown the wane of years,
Long warfare wasted England's shore;
And tides of slaughter and of tears
Avenge'd the Briton's lavish gore.
The pirate Dane and Norman foe,
The rival monarchs' mutual blow,
Ev'n Faith and Freedom's cause sublime,
Consign'd the fated soil to misery and crime.

III.

Not such the realm by Heav'n design'd
To crown with peace the mingled race:
Ages and oceans past, they find,
At length, a quiet dwelling place.
Fix'd and sedate, the band of Penn,
Forsook the cheerful haunts of men:
Through seas unknown they plough'd their road
To found, in forests shades, fair Freedom's blest abode.

IV.

For their's was stubborn fortitude,
And their's th' indomitable mind.
For savage haunts and deserts rude
They left the cities of their kind.
Nor courts nor wealth their chief detain,
And royal favour tempts in vain.
Dearer to seek a woodland zone
Than stand, in idle pomp, around a monarch's throne.

V.

On free and crimeless empire bent,
The philosophic Founder stood:
Whose sire, by sterner Cromwell sent,
Had thunder'd round Jamaica's flood,
And made the warlike Spaniard yield:
The son, within a peaceful field,
Would fain, by long, laborious days,
Erect the Christian's hope, the Statesman's useful praise.

And God has bless'd the ardent vow:
And wealth, and peace, and wide renown,
And science, calmly flourish now
O'er many a peopled field and town.
Forget not, 'midst the plenty giv'n,
That human virtue springs from heav'n.
Your fathers were the wise and good,
And let their sons maintain an undegen'rate blood.

FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

London dates to the 29th of 9th month have been received. The intelligence from Spain increases in interest. Ferdinand has suddenly left his capital to visit the revolted districts in Catalonia, and the Paris editors anticipate that he will have sufficient influence to restore tranquillity. No information is yet received of the final resolves of the Ottoman Porte, concerning the Greek war. But the object of the Allied Powers being to avert and not to precipitate a war, it is probable that they will not hastily adopt hostile measures, unless the Ottoman Government directs the departure of their ambassador, or commits some act of avowed hostility.

It appears to be determined that Don Miguel shall return to Portugal. If he shall be animated by an honest and sincere desire to restore peace and confidence, his task, though not an easy, will probably be a practicable one. On the other hand, if he permits himself to become the instrument of that party which is always exulting in the anticipation of his arrival, he will only prepare for his subjects a series of calamities. From the tenor of the account received for some time past from this kingdom, it is rather to be expected that England will not interfere in the contentions of the two parties, to prevent their plunging their country into the same dreadful state of anarchy that prevails in Spain, unless some other power should attempt to exercise an influence in her counsel.

A. Gallatin, the American Minister, and his family, were to embark for New York, in the Packet Ship of the 8th October, the Silvanus, Jenkins.

An interesting incident has occurred in London, from which it would seem that a change is taking place in the sentiments of military men, on the subject of duelling. General Barry and Captain Smith, being fellow passengers in a steam-boat from Ireland—the latter took offence at the General's refusing to drink wine with him, and required an explanation, threatening that if it was not given he must send a friend to him, and "they must meet." The general therefore made application to the police magistrate for a warrant, and on the appearance of the parties before this officer, after some conversation between them, the matter was settled by Capt. Smith giving his word of honour, to take no further notice of it. The tone and temper and general deportment of the superior Irish officer are worthy of high praise.

From the following account of Captain Parry's unsuccessful attempt to advance on the ice towards the Pole, we fear some philosophers will think that he has been "within the verge of the great opening."

FROM THE INVERNESS COURIER.

Return of Captain Parry.—On Wednesday morning, Captain Parry, and his surgeon, Dr. Beverly, arrived at the Caledonia Hotel here, after another arduous but unsuccessful attempt to accomplish the Polar voyage. Captain Parry came to Inverness by the Chichester revenue cutter, commanded by Captain John Steward, having fortunately fallen in with Captain S. in the Orkneys, on being driven in there on the 22d ult. The history of the present enterprise is brief; and while we have to communicate the agreeable news of the safe return of Captain Parry to his country and friends, we are able, at the same time, to vouch for the accuracy of the following particulars. Captain Parry, on leaving the discovery ship at the appointed place, off the Spitzbergen coast, betook himself to the sledge boats prepared for his conveyance over the ice, in pursuance of his original intentions and instructions, and was out for the space of sixty-one days: one of the boats being under his own charge, and the other under that of Lieutenant Ross. These two boats were hauled over the ice by the crew of the ship, twelve men to each, and after undergoing incredible fatigue, they felt, that for a great part of the time, they were on floating icebergs, which carried them southward, while they were stretching every nerve to proceed northward; and thus, of necessity, they were compelled to abandon the enterprise. To establish this important fact in the clearest point of view, we have to mention that during the last three days of the expedition, and on taking his observations by the chronometer, Captain Parry found that his boats had gained two miles only.—The expedition arrived at latitude 82, 45; and had it proceeded but fifteen miles farther, Captain Parry and his men would have obtained the pecuniary remuneration to which they were entitled on reaching 83; but even this short distance was found to be unattainable by any physical effort. Nearly in the same line proceeded, to the Hecla. Immediately on reaching the ship, the expedition proceeded homeward. We are happy to add, that Captain Parry, his officers and men, are all in good health.

Monrovia.—This infant settlement appears to flourish beyond the expectations of its most sanguine friends. The population exceeds one thousand, and is rapidly increasing. Schools, trade, and industry appear to flourish, and the colonists have ingratiated themselves with the native tribes. Accounts of its situation have been received, dated in the latter of the eighth month.

The African Repository for October, contains a letter from Francis Devany, formerly of Philadelphia. He remits to his correspondent the money for a year's subscription to the National Intelligencer, and adds—"We are all going on with some elegant improvements on our farms, and with no less than six elegant mansions, principally stone buildings, which no one would have thought could be erected here in so short a time as since your departure from Liberia. Monrovia now looks like many little towns in America, with nice stone or frame buildings, well painted or whitewashed, and can be seen to a considerable distance from sea, and I must say, is as happy a little community as any town you will find of its size in America or Europe."

The Pennsylvania Canal.—The celebration of the breaking of ground on the Delaware division of the Pennsylvania Canal, took place at Bristol on the 27th ult. The assemblage, composed of persons from the neighbouring parts of the state, from the city and New Jersey, was exceedingly large and respectable. At twelve o'clock the procession was formed and moved to the spot for breaking the ground, outside of the borough, and at about a quarter of a mile distant. On arriving at the place an address was delivered by Peter A. Browne, of this city, into which was introduced an interesting review of the former situation and history of Pennsylvania, and which concluded with an eloquent appeal to the present generation. It embodied much accurate information on the resources of Pennsylvania, together with a judicious account of her internal improvements. The address is to be published. A portion of the ground was levelled, measured, and staked off. We were glad to see the name of Thomas Eddy pre-eminently mentioned in relation to the projection of the Erie Canal; he and Simon Dewitt were announced at the dinner which succeeded the labours of the day as the projectors of that great work. The name of Dewitt Clinton was mentioned simply without comment. The following interesting fact was mentioned by the orator of the day.

"The superior mildness of the climate of this route, over that of the New York Erie Canal, will give it a decided preference in the early part of the season. A gentleman who lived in New York State, north of the line of the Erie Canal, last season transported a quantity of wheat to Newton on the Tioga; he there put it in arks, and sent it through the Susquehanna to Baltimore. Thence he shipped it to Charleston and sold it. He returned to New York; and at Albany he met the first boat which had navigated the New York Erie Canal that spring."

The Legislature of New Jersey, it appears, assembled at Trenton, the 23d ult. both Houses forming quorums. In the Assembly, the work of incipient legislation has begun, with an application for a canal to connect Newark Bay with New York Bay, by a cut across a neck of land that forms an interposing barrier—by another for a turnpike road in Bergen county—by an inquiry into the propriety and expediency of amending the militia laws of the state—and by an application for the incorporation of a company to prosecute a search for mineral coal, appearances of which, by a partial search already made, have been discovered beneath the surface of the earth, on the margin of the Raritan river, within a short distance of New York, and specimens of which, of an excellent quality, are in possession of the applicants. A committee of seven has also been appointed, to inquire into the expediency of making a canal to unite the waters of the Delaware and Raritan at the expense of the state, thereby making it a state concern. From the well known talents of the committee, an able report may be expected on the subject. A joint meeting took place yesterday, when Isaac H. Williamson, Esq. was re-elected Governor, Gabriel H. Ford, Judge of the Supreme Court, Theodore Freelinghuysen, Attorney General, Zachariah Rossell, Clerk of the Supreme Court, and Charles Parker, State Librarian, all without opposition.

MARRIED.

At Friends' Meeting-house, Mulberry-street, on fifth day last, Isaac Lloyd, Jr. to Hannah S. Bolton.

OBITUARY.

Died, on seventh day, the 27th ult., at 6 o'clock in the morning, at Peel Hall, in the county of Philadelphia, in the seventieth year of his age, JESSE PARKER, late of this city, merchant.

On the 13th ult., at her son's residence in Blockley, REBECCA GEORGE, widow of the late Amos George, of the same Township, in the 76th year of her age. An exemplary life, marked by many and severe afflictions, terminated in a peaceful death—the happy prelude to a joyful immortality.

At his farm near Burlington, (N. J.) on the 11th ult., DANIEL SMITH, in the 62d year of his age, proprietor and conductor of one of the most extensive and best selected Nurseries of Fruit Trees in the United States. With abilities above the ordinary standard, and religiously inclined from his youth, his latter moments were in accordance with the meekness, gentleness, humility and integrity which characterized him through life, leaving the consoling impression that he is now realizing the joys of that salvation which came by Jesus Christ, in the efficacy of whose atoning sacrifice he most surely believed.

The following tribute to the memory of Hannah Elton, a notice of whose death was given in our last number, came too late for insertion then.

Of this truly amiable woman it may perhaps safely be said, that she was one of the few who neglected none of the talents committed to her charge. A native of Burlington, but for many years a resident in this city, she was an exemplary and useful member of the Society of Friends, and though peculiarly modest and unassuming in her deportment, she was, from an early period of her life, scrupulously faithful in the discharge of all her religious and social duties, and from the unshaken confidence which she uniformly maintained to the latest hour of her life, in the atoning merits of her blessed Redeemer as the only means of salvation, and the tranquillity in which she was favoured to retire from this scene of tribulation, there is ground to hope she has been permitted to enter the mansions prepared for the righteous.

CHIEF JUSTICE TILGHMAN.

An Eulogium, upon the Hon. William Tilghman, late Chief Justice of Pennsylvania. By HORACE BERRY.

The admirable qualities of the late Chief Justice of Pennsylvania, so happily tempered each other—his modesty threw so beautiful a drapery over his virtues—his judgment so controlled his faculties—his exquisite sense of propriety so kept him from every unbecoming action; that his cotemporaries, excepting those to whom he was intimately known, were inclined perhaps to undervalue his powers.

It required an acquaintance with the dignity and purity of his domestic life, and with the impartiality and wisdom of his judicial career, to appreciate the rare virtues which adorned him. In the discourse before us, his character is delineated in a masterly and inimitable portrait—equally worthy, as has been justly remarked of the profession, the subject, and the author.

The Eulogium is a performance of exquisite beauty—chaste, terse, appropriate, dignified,—placing in the happiest lights, the public and private character of the deceased, and glowing with a warmth of moral and religious feeling, without which no eulogium upon such a man, could adequately impress the mind.

WILLIAM TILGHMAN, was born in Talbot county, Maryland, in the year 1756, and removed with his father, when about 6 years old, to Philadelphia, where he received his education and studied the law. From 1776, to 1793, he resided chiefly in Maryland, and was for several years a member of the legislature of that state. In the latter year, he returned to Philadelphia, and made this city his residence during the remainder of his life. He was appointed Chief Justice of Pennsylvania, in 1806, and held the office until his death, which occurred in the early part of the present year, in the 71st year of his age.

The extracts which follow, will charm all who can relish the sublime and the beautiful in the human character; and will prove that we have not overrated the literary excellence of this admirable discourse.

But its literary merits are the least praise of the Eulogium. It will perpetuate the memory of a great and good man, whose character, as here delineated, will become “an imperishable example of virtue.” The purified and exalted fame of Judge Tilghman, will be shared by his biographer; for the noble enthusiasm—the comprehensive views—the sincere piety which pervade the discourse, bespeak a kindred spirit.

We are the more inclined to dwell upon these characteristics, as indicating, in some measure, the state of morals and sentiment in a large and influential class of our community. It is well for a people, when the men whose station and intellectual endowments enable them to guide the public taste, and mould in a great degree the public opinions, when such men are not ashamed to proclaim to their fellow citizens, and to the world, “the reason of the hope that is in them,” when they give the whole weight of their persuasion and example to the cause of sound principles and pure morality—when they are willing to hold up to the rising and to every future generation, “the sublime principles which ought to be infused into persons of exalted situations.”

For, it is indeed true, in the language of the great master spirit of the last age, “that all who administer in the government of men, in which they stand in the person of God himself, should have high and worthy notions of their function and destination; that their hope should be full of immortality; that they should not look to the paltry pelf of the moment, nor to the temporary and transient praise of the vulgar, but to a solid, permanent existence, in the permanent part of their nature, and to a permanent fame and glory, in the example they leave, as a rich inheritance to the world.”

Gentlemen of the Bar of Philadelphia:

If the reputation of the living were the only source from which the honour of our race is derived, the death of an eminent man would be a subject of immitigable grief. It is the lot of few to attain great distinction, before death has placed them above the distorting medium, through which men are seen by their cotemporaries. It is the lot of still fewer, to attain it by qualities which exalt the character of our species. Envy denies the capacity of some, slander stigmatizes the principles of others, fashion gives an occasional currency to false pretensions, and the men by whom the age is hereafter to be known, are often too much in advance of it to be discernible by the common eye. All these causes combine to reduce the stock of living reputation, as much below the real merits of the age, as it is below the proper dignity of man; and he who should wish to elevate his spirit by great examples of wisdom, of genius, and of patriotism, if he could not derive them from the illustrious dead, would have better reason than the son of Philip, to weep at the limits which confined him. To part with the great and good from a world which thus wants them, and not to receive thereafter the refreshing influence of their purified and exalted fame, would be to make death almost the master of our virtue, as he appears to be of our perishable bodies.

The living and the dead are, however, but one family, and the moral and intellectual affluence of those who have gone before, remains to enrich their posterity. The great fountain of human character lies beyond the confines of life, where the passions cannot invade it. It is in that region, that among innumerable proofs of man's nothingness, are preserved the records of his immortal descent and destiny. It is there that the spirits of all ages, after their sun is set, are gathered into one firmament, to shed their unquenchable lights upon us. It is in the great assembly of the dead, that the philosopher and the patriot, who have passed from life, complete their benefaction to mankind, by becoming imperishable examples of virtue.

Beyond the circle of these private affections which cannot choose but shrink from the inroads of death, there is no grief then for the departure of the eminently good and wise. No tears but those of gratitude should fall into the graves of such as are gathered in honour to their forefathers. By their own unenvied virtues and talents, they have become a new possession to their posterity, and when we commemorate them, and pay the debt which is there due, we increase and confirm our own inheritance.

We are assembled, my brethren, to pay a part of this debt to one, to whom we shall be greatly in arrear, after we have exhausted all our terms of respect and endearment. We come to honour one who, during a long life, was an honour to his profession and his country. We come to lay claim to his reputation as part of our own, and as an accession to that invaluable estate, which is to pass from generation to generation of this commonwealth, to all future time. It is in obedience to your call, that I shall endeavour to show the value of this claim, by a sketch of the life and character of the late Chief Justice Tilghman.

From the moment of the late Chief Justice's appointment, to that of his death, most of us, my brethren, have stood around him, and have witnessed the great work upon which his reputation rests. His life has been on the bench,—his family has been the bar,—his children are now before me. So obvious have been his walks to all,—so radiant with that light which is reflected from the path of the just, that no part of them is unknown to you; and I shall but revive the impressions and assist the recollections of each, while I endeavour to sketch the extent of his labours, the character of his judgment and of his mind, his temper and disposition, social, moral, and religious.

The higher judicial offices in our country, are posts of great distinction, and they owe it to their attendant exertion and responsibility. They put in requisition the noblest faculties of the mind, the finest properties of the temper, and not unfre-quently they task to the utmost the vigour of an unbroken constitution. Very few, if any, of their duties are mechanical. There is no routine by which their business is performed without the expenditure of thought. The cases which come before the judges are new either in principle or in circumstance; and not seldom the facts which ask for the application of different principles, are in the same cause, nearly in equipoise. There is consequently an interminable call upon the judge to compare, discriminate, weigh, adopt, reject, in fine to bring into intense exercise his whole understanding. Where the profession is candid and well instructed, nothing that is obvious, and little that can be made so without deep consideration, is referred to the decision of the judges. For them the universal intelligence of the world is at work to complicate the contracts and the duties of men. For them are reserved those Gordian knots, which, although others may cut, they must at least appear to untie. Every judgment is made under great responsibility to the science;—it must be a rule for the future, as well as for the past. It is made under an equal responsibility to the parties;—the judge is the defaulter, when through his means the defaulter escapes. It is under a higher responsibility to heaven;—the malediction of an unjust sentence is heavier upon him that gives, than upon him that receives it.

He who, through a large portion of the short life of man, properly sustains such an office, studying all his causes with the intenseness of personal interest,—improving the science by adding daily confirmation to the defences of liberty, reputation and property,—and at the last standing clear in his great account of justice impartially administered to the poor and the rich, the guilty and the innocent,—he that does this is entitled to all the homage which man ought to render to man, and may claim, but not till then, to stand by the side of our venerated Tilghman.

FALLS OF KAKABIKKA.

The following account of the Falls of Kakabikka, is extracted from "Major Long's Second Expedition." These falls are on Dog River, one of the most considerable tributaries of Lake Superior; and are highly interesting, not only in themselves, but as belonging to that great chain of waters, which is already so remarkable for the variety, beauty, and grandeur of its numerous cascades and cataracts. Montmorenci and Niagara are more celebrated than any in America; and to the latter only, which is altogether unrivalled, would the Falls of Kakabikka seem to be inferior.

"The splendid waterfalls which we observed we did not attempt to describe. On of them, however, we cannot pass over without particular mention, as it may, probably, rank among the finest that are known; from the Indians it has received the beautiful appellation of Falls of Kakabikka, and as no attempt has yet been made to give it an European name, we hope that its original appellation will be retained, as that of Niagara has been. In the Chippewa language, Kakabikka signifies the 'cleft rock.' This fall is remarkable on account of the volume of water which it presents, the great height from which it falls, the picturesque appearance of the rocks which surround it, the wildness of the vegetation that accompanies it, and finally, on account of the very great noise which it produces, and which we believe to be far greater than that of Niagara. It yields to the latter in one respect, however, which is in point of breadth, but in this perhaps it acquires an additional beauty; for the immense breadth of Niagara certainly takes away from the effect which its great height would otherwise produce; while the falls of Kakabikka, restricted by the rocks to a breadth of fifty yards, present a height apparently more imposing. The rock was measured by Lieutenants Scott and Denny, who found the perpendicular pitch to be about one hundred and thirty feet. The edge of the rock is placed obliquely to the bed of the river; its surface is entirely covered, but is probably rough, so that the water is broken before it leaves the rock, and forms an uniformly white and nearly vertical sheet of water descending into the abyss below, where it meets with a rocky bed which produces a considerable spray; the stream continues foaming for a long distance. The hand of art has as yet done nothing to modify the appearance of this beautiful spot, so that we saw it in all its wild beauties; no ladders have been erected to facilitate the descent; no trees felled to clear the prospect; we were therefore obliged to satisfy ourselves with that view of it which the rock naturally presents. The finest prospect is one taken at a short distance below, but nearly on the same level with the upper channel of the river.

"The chasm, into which the water falls, is bounded for several miles by bluffs of rocks which rise to a height of upwards of one hundred and fifty feet. They are of a dark colour, that contrasts strongly with the white foam of the waters."

FRANCKFORT FAIRS.

Two great Fairs are annually held at Franckfort, one in the spring of the year, the other in the autumnal season. The chiming of bells announces the commencement of the Fair, and it generally continues for three weeks. The first, is called the week of acceptance, the second, is the week of payment. The situation of Franckfort on the Mayne, and its proximity to the Rhine, render it the magazine of all the merchandize conveyed by these rivers to different parts of Germany. The quantity and variety of wares exhibited, exceed that of any other market in Europe—but they are especially famous for the immense collections of curious and valuable books, in all languages, and collected from all countries where the art of book-making is known. The literati and booksellers from all parts of Europe resort thither, either to gratify their curiosity or purchase supplies. Catalogues of the books to be sold are printed and distributed abroad, sometime before the fair commences. Besides the number of traders, and purchasers, by whom the fairs are frequented, multitudes are attracted by the love of gaiety and amusement; and during their continuance, the city becomes as much a scene of dissipation, as a mart of business. The following description of a recent fair is from the pen of a late traveller.

"A farther drive of fourteen miles, (from Darmstadt,) through a country more sandy than any part of the plain on the upper Rhine, leads to the bank of the Mayne; the well-bred listlessness and courtly demeanour of Darmstadt are exchanged for the noise and bustle of Franckfort. Long before reaching the city, the increasing host of carriages and wagons announced the vicinity of this great emporium. On passing the bridge across the Mayne, the confusion became inextricable, for it was the Michaelmas Fair. The narrow streets, sunk beneath tall old fashioned piles of buildings, seemed too small for the busy crowd that swarmed through them, examining and bargaining about all the productions of Europe, in all its languages. The outside walls of the shops, and in many instances, of the stories above them, were entirely covered with large pieces of cloth, generally of some glaring colour, proclaiming the name and wares of the foreigner who had there pitched his tent, in French and Italian, German, Russian, Polish, and Bohemian; rarely in English, but very often in Hebrew. The last, however, being a language somewhat inconvenient for sign posts, was generally accompanied with a translation in some known tongue. Not only the public squares, but every spot that could be protected against the encroachments of wheels and horses, groined beneath capacious booths, gaudily ornamented, which displayed in the most outré juxtaposition, all that convenience or luxury has ever invented, from wooden platters, Manchester cottons, or Vienna pipe-heads, to the bijouterie of the Palais Royal, or the China of Meissen, silks from Lyons, or chandeliers from the mountains of Bohemia. Every fair presents on a smaller scale, the same ludicrous variety and confusion, but the assemblage of men from all quarters of the globe, and these too, men of business in search of bargains, not amusement, collected in the streets and crowded in the inns of Franckfort, is to be found no where else, except perhaps at Leipzig on a similar occasion. If the traveller who happens to arrive at the occasion, can rest satisfied with a cellar or a garret, he will find that the hotels are not the least animated part of the scene. Butler and cook have been employed for weeks, in preparing for the campaign—larder and servants are put upon a war establishment—the large hall, reserved in general, for civic feasts or civic balls, is thrown open for the daily 'table d'hôte.' In one hotel above one hundred and fifty persons daily surrounded the table, chattering all languages "from Indus to the pole." The newly decked walls displayed in fresco, all the famed landscapes of the Rhine, from Manheim to Cologne; the stuccoed ceiling and gilt cornices far outshone in splendour the hall on the opposite side of the street, in which the heads of the holy Roman Empire used to be elected and anointed. From a gallery at either end, a full orchestra accompanied each morsel of sausage with a sounding march, or when Hock and Rüdesheimer began to glow in the veins, attuned the company by repeated waltzes to the amusements of the evening. The merchants who flock down from every quarter, are not always allowed to make their journey alone. Their wives and daughters know full well that business is not the sole occupation of a Franckfort fair—that if there be bills and balances for the gentlemen, there are balls and plays and concerts for the ladies, and that a gentleman, on such occasions, is never so safe as when he has his own good ladies by his side. Though in general, neither well-informed nor elegantly bred, they are pretty, affable, and quite willing to be amused—they give variety and elegance to the promenades, and afford agreeable society and pleasing conversation at the table or in the drawing room." THE STRAITS OF MAGELLAN.

The British government, which is pursuing its geographical researches in every region of the globe, has lately made a survey of these Straits. From an account published in the Literary Gazette, it appears that letters have been received from Monte Video, dated the 12th of 5th month (May) last, which state the return of the Adventure and Beagle to this port, from this duty. The letter states that—

"These vessels sailed from Monte Video about the middle of November, and, after encountering very severe weather, reached the Straits of Magellan on the 23d of December. They anchored in Port Famine early in January, where the Adventure, Captain King, remained until the first week of April, employed in the examination of the eastern side of the strait; while the Beagle, under the orders of Captain Stokes, proceeded to survey the western entrance, from which she returned early in March.

"All the bays and sounds, which are numerous throughout the strait, are in fact merely holes or chasms in the land, and from the great depth of water (50 to 60 fathoms,) afford no anchorage, except in coves, or close to the shore, under the land, which is elevated to the height of from 1000 to 3000 feet, and in some parts of almost perpendicular ascent. For a large ship there is great difficulty in approaching the shore, as it is at one moment a dead calm, and at the next so violent a hurricane that it is impossible to carry any sail. The destructive effects of these sudden gusts were observed in many parts of the strait. Nothing can exceed their violence: trees are torn up by the roots, from the summit to the base of the hills, where they lie piled at the water's edge in the greatest confusion.

"On the shores of these straits were found two distinct races of men—the famous Patagonians, who inhabit that part of the northern shore which lies to the eastward of Cape Negro, and those wandering tribes called 'Indians' and 'Fuegians,' which are met with in small numbers, and at considerable intervals, throughout the extensive tracts comprehended between the Capes Negro and Victory on the one hand, and the whole range of the coast del Fuego on the other.

"The Patagonians were first seen upon horseback, and consisted of a party of about twenty, among whom were three or four women: the oldest of these women was about forty, and had four or five children; the others were girls of about fifteen. The males were chiefly young men and boys, excepting the husband of the old lady, who was probably about her own age. They were clothed in the skins of animals, principally of the guanaco and morillo, the latter is a species of the pole-cat, of a most offensive smell. In these skins they were completely enveloped."

Captain King accounts in some degree for the vulgar error respecting the extraordinary height of the Patagonians. They appeared to him on landing to be a very large race, yet the tallest man he met measured six feet in height. They are not well proportioned, and when seated, the gigantic size of their bodies and heads rendered them apparently much taller than ordinary men. Those navigators who saw them at a distance, and on horseback, naturally overrated their height, and gave rise to the popular error. We are glad, for the sake of the veracity of man, to have misrepresentations of this nature explained. For the assertion was made by men of character, who had no inducement to falsify, and we should be loath to give up our belief, that the love of truth is inherent in our nature.

"Of the 150 Patagonians who were seen at Gregory Bay, about half were men. Few of these exceeded the height of six feet, and only one was found to measure six feet one inch and three-quarters. The generality were of immense bulk, particularly one of noble and commanding aspect, who, wrapped in his mantle, bore a most dignified appearance. Captain Stokes measured the circumference of the chest, which was of a very large size (four feet one inch and one-eighth;) this measurement confirmed the opinion previously formed of the want of symmetry in their persons, and of the great disproportion of their head and body to their arms and legs. The hands and feet of the Patagonians are remarkably small, but the size of the head and body of the greater number is sufficient for men of seven or eight feet high."

The inhabitants of the Terra del Fuego, a kind of Southern Esquimaux, resembling the northern in their degenerate size—their love of rancid fat, and their implements and arms, offer little to interest any but the inquirer into that great problem of the dispersion and varieties of our species.

"The intercourse of Captain Stokes was chiefly with the Fuegians or Indians. Neither male nor female exhibited indications of strength, activity or beauty. Their average height was under five feet and a half, their habit of body generally spare, with limbs badly turned, and they daubed themselves, after no particular mode or pattern, with red earth. The hair of the head is black, straight and coarse, which they comb with the jaw-bone of the porpoise, and anoint with seal, whale, or porpoise blubber. The beard and whiskers, naturally scanty, are carefully plucked out by a very primitive kind of tweezers—namely, two muscle-shells. The eyes dark, and of a moderate size; nose inclining to be prominent, with dilated nostrils; mouth large, the under lip thick, the teeth small and regular, but of a bad colour. Their complexion is a dirty copper colour, and the whole countenance dull and void of expression.

"Their only covering is the skin of a seal or sea otter thrown over the shoulders, the hairy side outermost, in the mode of a mantle, the two upper corners of which are tied together with a thong, and a girdle of thong secures it round the waist.

"The tracts the Fuegians inhabit are altogether destitute of four footed animals; and they have neither domesticated the geese and ducks which abound, nor do they use them as an article of food in their wild state. Of tillage of any kind they are utterly ignorant; the only vegetable productions they eat are a few wild berries (arbutus and berberis) and a kind of sea-weed. The staple of their food is the muscle, the limpet, and echinus or sea-egg; but they occasionally regale on the porpoise, the sea-otter, and the seal, and seem to consider any thing of a fat and greasy nature as a delicacy.

"Of their dwellings, which have been called in different books of voyages, huts, wigwams, &c., the term 'arbours,' used by old Sir John Narborough, will convey the best idea. This 'arbour' is formed of a couple of dozen boughs of the birch tree, the large ends of which are pointed and stuck into the ground, around a circular or elliptical space, about ten feet diameter at the most, and these branches are brought together in a point. In the centre is the fire-place, and around it, on the bare earth, the family stow themselves as they may. The only household goods are two or three large shells, which are used as drinking cups; a water-tight bucket, made of the bark of the birch, and a basket or two woven of grass, the work of the women, in which they collect the shell fish along the shore. They kindle their fires by the collision of two pieces of mundic; using as tinder very fine scrapings of the boughs of the berberis bush. To cut through or split up a large piece of timber is, with the implements they possess, a very laborious and tedious process—so, when they can find no billets of wood of a convenient size for fuel, they avail themselves of the drift-wood. Over their fires they are constantly cowering, stirring out of their huts as seldom as possible; hence, when they are seen abroad, instead of being, as might be expected from their scanty clothing and inclement climate, a hardy savage, fit to brave every vicissitude of the weather, a miserable creature is seen shivering in every breeze.

"Their dwellings are found sometimes seven or eight together, only a few feet apart; sometimes a solitary one is seen many miles remote from even the trace of another.

"They migrate from point to point, and from one side of the strait to the other, by means of canoes formed of the bark of the birch tree; and the bark used in the construction of those canoes is much broader than any that could be stripped from the trees found near the coast. The usual length of the canoe is from 14 to 16 feet, the pieces of the bark of which it is constructed, (three in number—one forming the bottom, the other two the sides,) are sewed together by thongs of seal skin, or strong shreds of the birch bark; the timbers are the boughs of the pliant birch: along the bottom is a platform of clay, which serves at once for ballast for the vessel and as a hearth for the fire, which, as in their dwellings, is kept constantly burning.

"Their language is, in its pronunciation, exceedingly harsh and guttural. The words most commonly used were 'sheroo' and 'petit.' 'Sheroo' signifies a ship or barque of any kind; and 'petit' a child. Of this last word, (singular enough) not only is the pronunciation strictly French, but (what is still more surprising) that pronunciation varies with every change of gender and number precisely as it does in French. This is one of those philological coincidences for which it were in vain to attempt satisfactorily to account. They have a wonderful facility in imitating the combinations of sounds of strange languages. They will instantly repeat a sentence of many words, if distinctly pronounced, with the greatest precision.

"At Cape Gallant some papers were discovered by Capt. Stokes, at the top of one of the lofty mountains which surrounded the harbour; fragments of a glass bottle, in which they had been originally deposited, were lying on the spot where they were found, which had been most likely burst by the frost. The papers had suffered somewhat from the weather, but were legible, and proved to be two Latin inscriptions, one by Bougainville, in 1767, the other by Cordoba,* in 1789, stating the objects of their respective voyages, and the names of the principal officers of the ships.

"Between St. Jerome's channel and Cape Gallant, the northern shore of the Straits presents a very agreeable landscape. In the distance are lofty peaks and craggy mountains covered with snow; in the foreground are pleasing combinations of mountains, hills, and valleys, with green sloping sides, well grassed plains, woods, and copses, water falls, rivers and little streams. This part affords good anchorage, and seems to be the favourite haunt of the various water-fowl of the Straits. But this description only applies to the northern shore; for the opposite coasts, as well as the islands that lie between, are rocky, and in general devoid of verdure.

"The weather which the Beagle experienced was exceedingly tempestuous, with heavy and continued rains. On Captain Stokes' arrival in the Pacific Ocean, vast numbers of the black whale were seen; and the labyrinth of islands and rocks, situated on the western side of the Straits of Magellan, were completely covered with the fur seal and brant goose, apparently in very friendly joint occupancy.

"On the whole, it appears that a westerly wind, strong and squally, reigning throughout the western division of the Straits, with the unvarying constancy of a trade, and the difficulties of the navigation, from the thick and misty weather, as well as the insalubrity of the heavy rains, will cause few vessels to prefer the passage of the Straits of Magellan to rounding Cape Horn."

FOR THE FRIEND.

There are in the present day, empirics in Theology, as well as in Philosophy;—some of whom might, profitably to themselves, and greatly for the benefit of those who look up to them as oracular, take a lesson of humility from the following concise, but just, energetic and beautiful observations;—they are likewise especially worthy the attention of the youthful adventurer in the pursuit of knowledge:—

"With the same view, I cannot help taking notice of a prevailing, but very mistaken idea, that the formation of a hypothetical system is a stronger proof of inventive genius, than the patient investigation of nature in the way of induction. To form a system, appears to the young and inexperienced understanding, a species of creation; to ascend slowly to general conclusions from the observation and comparison of particular facts, is to comment servilely, on the works of another.

"No opinion surely, can be more groundless. To fix a few principles, or even on a single principle as the foundation of a theory, and by an artful statement of supposed facts, to give a plausible explanation, by means of it, to an immense number of phenomena, is within the reach of most men, whose talents have been a little exercised in the subtleties of the schools: whereas, to follow Nature through all her varieties with a quick, yet an exact eye;—to record faithfully, what she exhibits, and to record nothing more;—to trace amidst

* Cordoba commanded two expeditions, at different periods, for the survey of the Straits, in neither of which did he ever reach to the westward of Cape Gallant.

According to Captain Stokes' observations, the easternmost point of Cape Gallant is in latitude 53 deg. 42 min. 11 sec. south, and in longitude 1 deg. 5 min. 5 sec. west of Cape Virgin Mary, the north-easternmost headland of the Straits. Variation of the compass, 23 deg. 32 min. easterly.

the diversities of her operations, the simple and comprehensive laws by which they are regulated, and sometimes to guess at the beneficent purposes to which they are subservient, may be safely pronounced to be the highest effort of a created intelligence. And, accordingly, the number of ingenious theorists has, in every age, been great, that of sound philosophers has been wonderfully small;—or, rather they are only beginning now to have a glimpse of their way, in consequence of the combined light furnished by their predecessors.”—Stewart's Life of Reid.

“Our profession is high and holy, and let us be increasingly concerned to walk consistently therewith. The patient sufferings of our faithful predecessors finally established for them an excellent name, even amongst their persecutors. They held up with practical clearness, a peaceable testimony against wars and fightings, and by a scrupulous adherence to the principles of justice, became proverbial for their integrity.”—Green street Epistle of the 10th month.

COMMENTARY.

In watching the progress of the disturbance in the Society of Friends, which has now nearly eventuated within the limits of the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia, in a separation of the followers of Elias Hicks from the Society,—the above declaration of our Saviour, has frequently presented itself, and has induced a degree of astonishment that more individuals were not convinced by this safe test, that the course pursued by the separatists, is in its immediate operation wrong, and in its tendency, calculated to lay waste all order, and to dissipate those feelings of reverence towards the cause of religion, which are absolutely requisite as a bond and covering for civil and religious society. This can only be accounted for, on the ground, that these individuals, before they have had an opportunity of calmly judging for themselves, have had their feelings worked up to a high pitch of excitement, by statements which have been made by designing persons, and which, (to say the least of them,) have been highly coloured. With the view of exhibiting the inconsistency of their actions, with their avowed sentiments, and by this means, if possible, to open the eyes of some, who have not yet adopted directly erroneous religious principles, but who have been induced by artful representations, to feel a partiality towards the disturbers of order as a party, I have thought proper to make the foregoing remarks, and to accompany them by an account of proceedings which took place at Frankford Monthly Meeting, on the 25th of 10th month. The meeting assembled as usual, and after it was pretty much settled, two individuals from Philadelphia, who had been regularly disowned by the Monthly Meeting of the southern district, and who were known to be warm partizans of Elias Hicks, entered and took their seats. After the close of the meeting for worship, (which had proved a time of deep and solemn feeling with many,) the shutters being closed, and the opening minutes of the meeting being prepared and read by the clerk, it was mentioned by a friend, that “if there were persons present, who had not a right to attend, it would be kind if they would withdraw.” The persons alluded to, took no notice of the request, and some members of the meeting pretending ignorance of any persons in the situation mentioned, being present,—a friend from the city, (being one of the Yearly Meeting’s committee,) stated the names of the individuals, and confirmed their being disowned from the society. One of these disqualified persons then said, that he denied having been disowned. When he was under dealing, considering himself harshly treated, he applied to a meeting in the country and was there received. He was now a member of Abington Quarterly Meeting,—had a right to stay in the meeting, and would maintain his rights.

Several of our members supported them in keeping their seats, and used very intemperate language, in reply to those who maintained an adherence to the ancient discipline and order of the society. After setting for between two and three hours, and finding that they would not yield to persuasion, it was decided to adjourn, (on account of the meeting not being select,) to the next day, for the transaction of the business. The first proposition relative to the adjourned meeting, was, that it should be held at the same place, (the meeting-house at Frankford,) but the key being in possession of the advocates of disorder, one of them, high in profession, soon gave us to understand, that we should not have admittance, in which he was supported by the person employed to have charge of the house, &c.—It was, therefore, agreed to adjourn to Germantown.

It is here important for a right understanding of the matter, that the attention of the reader should be called to several facts, connected with the occurrence. First, Considerably the larger number of Friends present, were of the class who felt bound to support the good order, and ancient discipline and doctrines of the society, and would have had strength to have transacted the business of the meeting, if these persons had not, by a preconcerted plan, (of which there is strong presumptive evidence,) placed us in such a situation, that we could not consistently proceed. Second, The meeting had previously (excepting in one instance, where individuals similarly situated, had imposed themselves on it, occasioning an adjournment,) passed along in a good degree of harmony, and nothing connected with this unhappy division had evidenced itself amongst us. And, thirdly,—a very important circumstance, when we come to judge by “fruits.” Some of the principal movers in this business, and in the threat to exclude us from the meeting-house, were individuals, who have been active in crying out against “persecution,”—claiming a “quiet retreat from the scene of confusion,” and in issuing Epistles, declaring to the world, desires for the maintenance of a lamb-like spirit,—discountenancing every thing like contention,—when they were “reviled, revile not again,” &c. &c.

After the meeting had regularly adjourned, the followers of E. H. proceeded to hold, what they assumed to be, a “Monthly Meeting,” in which, amongst other things, (as I have been informed,) they immediately quashed a report that had been prepared in writing, by a committee appointed at a previous Monthly Meeting, to investigate the circumstances connected with the insolvency of a member, and reinstated him, although this report contained such charges, as, according to the uniform practice of the society, would have required close dealing with the individual. But he was known to be one of their active supporters.

The writer of this, is a member of said Monthly Meeting, and was an immediate witness to what took place previous to the adjournment of the regular meeting,—he is, therefore, prepared to substantiate the statements made. The notice of the proceedings of the followers of E. H. afterwards, it is believed, can be equally well established.

THE EFFECTS OF DISBELIEF.

New Court—Old Bailey.

John Grace was indicted for stealing two books, the property of John Brooks.

Previous to the prosecutor being sworn, Mr. C. Phillips said he wished to put a few questions. The prosecutor then stood up in the witnesses’ box, when the following dialogue ensued:

Mr. Phillips—Are you the secretary of the Christian Evidence Society?

Witness—I am.

Mr. Phillips—Do you believe in the Book on which you are about to be sworn?

Witness—I don’t know what book you allude to—I believe that I am bound to speak the truth.

Mr. Phillips—Do you believe in the Holy Scriptures?

Witness—I believe in some parts of them.

Mr. Phillips—Do you believe in the doctrines of Christianity?

Witness—I think an oath binding on my conscience.

Mr. Phillips—Are you not a Deist?

Witness—I admit that I am—but is a man to escape with impunity, who has been in the constant habit of robbing me for the last twelve months, on account of my belief.

Mr. Phillips—The doctrines inculcated by you are sufficient to inundate the whole country with robbers.

Witness—I am certainly a Deist, but I am entitled to the protection of the laws.

Mr. Sergeant Arabin—Do you believe the Gospels to be true, and confide in the Christian faith? If you do not, what religious hold have we upon you?

Witness—I bear a moral character.

Mr. Phillips—Do you believe Christ to be the Son of God?

Witness—I certainly do not.

Judge—Then I cannot allow you to be sworn.

The prisoner was consequently released.

The application of the term JACOBIN, has been complained of. It may be misapplied. People must not be condemned for what they are called. But is there no such thing as Jacobinism? Are there no persons whose labours tend to prostrate our political institutions—to bring all regular civil authority into contempt—to annihilate that confidence with which a common man might do good—and substitute that jealousy under which no man could give satisfaction or render service?

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH, 10, 1827.

As an additional item, relative to the transactions at the late Yearly Meeting of Indiana, our readers will be gratified in learning, that it authorized a subscription to be opened throughout its constituent branches, for the purpose of aiding our Brethren of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, in removing, to free governments, the slaves held by them in guardianship, in consequence of the obstacles imposed by the laws of the state, to manumission. Thus, with the amount already received from other Yearly Meetings, on this continent—from the Yearly Meeting in London, and that raised among themselves, it appears likely that Friends of North Carolina, will be relieved from a burden under which they have long been oppressed, and enjoy the satisfaction of having placed the objects of their benevolent solicitude, in situations where their freedom will be fully secured.

In consideration of the interesting and highly important nature of the Indiana Yearly Meeting Epistle, an extensive circulation of which is in our opinion desirable, we have concluded to print 1000 extra copies of our present No., and for the information of such of our friends who may wish to obtain them for distribution, we mention that they may be had of the publisher, at the rate of 25 for a dollar.

We desire it to be distinctly understood, that in every thing which may be introduced into the columns of this paper, relative to the conduct and proceedings, either of the Society of Friends, or of the New Sect, it is our intention to be governed by the most scrupulous regard to truth,—we therefore deem it right to say, that in the article respecting Abington Quarterly Meeting of our 2d No., an error did occur—the paper produced by the person appointed to the care of the meeting-house, as his authority for refusing Friends admission, it is stated, was signed by three Trustees—whereas, as we have since been told, it had the signature but of one of them, though sanctioned by two others.

It seems also, we were wrong, though certainly under that impression, in stating, that the author of the Stanzas, in our last, headed "The gathering round the Oak Tree," was present on the occasion.

They who suppose, they may have the Spirit of Truth, independently of a Mediator, must also imagine themselves to be so different by nature from common men, that the connexion between them and their Creator was never interrupted.—Dillwyn's Reflections.

In our present number will be found, the Epistle from the late Yearly Meeting of Indiana, a notice of which was given in our last. It is an interesting and important document, worthy of the serious perusal of every member of the Society of Friends, as well as those of the New Sect.

It clearly sets forth the wide difference in fundamental points, between the doctrines of the religious Society of Friends, and those of Elias Hicks, and his adherents; and attributes the separation of the latter to its real cause, viz. a dissent from the long established discipline and faith of Friends.—The Address of the 4th month last, issued by the new sect, from their separate meeting at Green street, acknowledges fully the correctness of this position.—"Doctrines, say they, held by one part of society, and which we believe to be sound and edifying, are pronounced by the other part to be unsound and spurious. From this has resulted a state of things, that has proved destructive of peace and tranquillity, and in which the fruits of love and condescension have been blasted, and the comforts and enjoyments even of social intercourse greatly diminished.

In this sentence, the great secret of their separation from Friends, is fully couched. What those doctrines are, which the seceders hold, and "believe to be sound and edifying," the following Epistle will in part show, by the extracts from the Berean, and the Sermons and Letters of Elias Hicks. That the Society of Friends should "pronounce" these doctrines "to be unsound and spurious," is both reasonable and proper, since they are not only repugnant to their established faith, but subversive of the christian religion.

The following short extracts from the late Sermons of E. H., published in the Quaker, will confirm fully, the views we have expressed, and show his unqualified denial of the divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Darby Sermon—speaking of Christ, he says.

"The apostle says, that he is our example, that we should follow his steps. But if he had any more power than we have, how could he be an example to us? He had no more power than would enable him to do the will of God, and he had it in its fullness, and of this every rational creature has his proportion. He had more, because he had a much greater work to perform, as he who hath five talents must be faithful, according to the knowledge received, and so must they who have but one talent. And what astonishing ignorance it must be, to suppose, that material blood, made of the dust of the earth, can be considered a satisfactory offering for a spiritual being that is all spirit, and no flesh. I say, what astonishing ignorance." Quaker, vol. I, p. 16, 17.

"And we derive a portion of the same [spirit] which is able to save the soul, if properly obeyed. Here now he [Jesus Christ] was put upon a level—and for this reason, Jesus called the children of God, his brethren." P. 7.

Chester Sermon—speaking of the pilot that could save the soul, he says—

"We read in the few expressions of Jesus of Nazareth, who is the pilot that can do this for us. He told his followers, that he was not the one that could do it—that it was expedient for them, that he should go away;"—"he could not save them, otherwise than to relieve them from their outward afflictions and perils."—28.

"Did Jesus Christ, the Saviour, ever have any material blood? Not a drop of it, my friends—not a drop of it." P. 41.

"Every christian must come up under the influence of the same light that guided Jesus Christ—that Christ that was His SAVIOUR, and preserver; and that power which enabled him to do his work, will enable us to come on in the same path." Ib. p. 44.

"The apostle had allusion to that perfect righteousness, which is the immediate saviour in the soul, 'Christ within the hope of glory,' but it was not that outward Jesus Christ that was the hope of glory." P. 164.

"It is truly God in man; for as he fills all things, he cannot be located in any thing which is capable of being located—because, to suppose that all the fulness of God was in Christ, is to take him out of every other part of the world." P. 166.

We can scarcely conceive any expressions which could convey greater irreverence or impiety toward our blessed Lord and Saviour, than some of these, or which more openly and positively deny his divinity, and degrade him to the level of a mere man. It is cause of thankfulness, that the Society is rising up in different places, to bear their christian testimony against such blasphemy, imposed upon the public in their name.

A TESTIMONY, AND EPISTLE OF ADVICE, ISSUED BY INDIANA YEARLY MEETING.

The meeting, taking into consideration, that certain books and papers of different descriptions have been put in circulation, purporting to set forth the doctrines of our Society, yet containing sentiments wholly repugnant to our religious profession, and subversive of the principles of the Christian religion, and that these views and principles have not only been injurious to the reputation of the Society, but have produced, and are at this time producing, much difficulty and distress among Friends—was introduced into deep exercise. And under the weight of this exercise, we have believed it right to issue a Testimony on the occasion, for the information of the honest-hearted of our own members, and serious inquirers of other denominations; and for the strengthening of the hands of those who feel themselves bound to the defence of the gospel.

Our discipline, in strong and emphatic terms, has recorded the standing testimony of the Society against such as "blaspheme or speak profanely of ALMIGHTY GOD, CHRIST JESUS, or the HOLY SPIRIT, or deny the divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; the immediate revelation of the Holy Spirit, or the authenticity of the scriptures," testifying that it is manifest they are not one in faith with us, and that if they persist in such errors, they ought to be disowned.

This portion of our discipline is clearly founded upon the fundamental doctrines of the Christian Religion, as held by our primitive Friends, and by the substantial part of the Society down to the present day.

Our worthy predecessor George Fox, in a declaration of Faith, which he, with some other Friends presented to the governor and council of Barbadoes, says: "Whereas, many scandalous lies and slanders have been cast upon us to render us odious: as that we deny God, Christ Jesus, and the Scriptures of Truth, &c. This is to inform you that all our books and declarations which, for these many years have been published to the world, clearly testify the contrary; yet for your satisfaction we now plainly declare,—

"That we own and believe in the only wise, omnipotent, and everlasting God, the Creator of all things in heaven and earth, and the Preserver of all that he hath made, who is God over all, blessed for ever; to whom be all honour, glory, dominion, praise, and thanksgiving, both now and for evermore.

"And we own and believe in Jesus Christ his beloved and only begotten Son, in whom he is well pleased; who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary; in whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins; who is the express image of the invisible God, the first born of every creature, by whom were all things created, that are in heaven and in earth, visible and invisible; whether they be thrones, dominions, principalities, or powers; all things were created by him.

"And we own and believe that he was made a sacrifice for sin, who knew no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth; that he was crucified for us in the flesh, without the gates of Jerusalem, and that he was buried and rose again the third day, by the power of his Father, for our justification; and that he ascended up into heaven, and now sitteth at the right hand of God. This Jesus, who was the foundation of the holy prophets and apostles, is our foundation: and we believe there is no other foundation to be laid but that which is laid, even Christ Jesus: who tasted death for every man, shed his blood for all men, is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world; according as John the Baptist testified of him, when he said, 'Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world.'—John i. 29.

"He is now come in Spirit, 'and hath given us an understanding, that we know him that is true.' He rules in our hearts by his law of love and life, and makes us free from the law of sin and death. We have no life, but by him; for he is the quickening Spirit, the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, by whose blood we are cleansed, and our consciences sprinkled from dead works to serve the living God. He is our Mediator, who makes peace and reconciliation between God offended, and us offending, he being the oath of God, the new covenant of light, life, grace, and peace, the author and finisher of our faith.

"This Lord Jesus Christ, the heavenly Man, the Emanuel, God with us, we all own and believe in; he whom the high-priest raged against, and said he had spoken blasphemy; whom the priests and elders of the Jews took counsel together against and put to death; the same whom Judas betrayed for thirty pieces of silver, which the priests gave him as a reward for his treason, who also gave large money to the soldiers to broach a horrible lie, namely, 'That his disciples came and stole him away by night whilst they slept.' After he was risen from the dead, the history of the acts of the apostles sets forth how the chief priests and elders persecuted the disciples of this Jesus, for preaching Christ and his resurrection. This, we say, is that Lord Jesus Christ, whom we own to be our life and salvation."

In this declaration of Faith, in our Lord Jesus Christ, we desire it may be observed that he is acknowledged both in his outward and inward appearance, agreeably to the testimony of the Evangelist, "AND THE WORD WAS MADE FLESH AND DWELT AMONG US, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father) full of grace and truth."—John i. 14. And again the same Evangelist, after recording many miracles which were wrought by our Lord, said, "And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book: but these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through his name."—John xx. 30, 31.

William Penn, in speaking of the efficacy and benefits of the coming, and the sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ on the cross, declared,

"We do believe that Jesus Christ was our holy sacrifice, atonement and propitiation, that he bore our iniquities, and that by his stripes we are healed of the wounds Adam gave us in his fall, and that God is just in forgiving true penitents, upon the credit of that holy offering Christ made of himself to God for us; and that what he did and suffered, satisfied and pleased God, and was for the sake of fallen man, that had displeased God, and that through the offering up of himself, once for all, through the Eternal Spirit he hath for ever perfected those (in all times) that were sanctified, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit.

"In short, Justification consists of two parts, or hath a two-fold consideration. The first part of justification, we do reverently and humbly acknowledge, is only for the sake of the death and sufferings of Christ; nothing we can do, though by the operation of the Holy Spirit, being able to cancel old debts, and wipe out old scores. It is the power and efficacy of that propitiatory offering upon faith and repentance, that justifies us from the sins that are past; and it is the power of Christ's Spirit in our hearts, that purifies and makes us acceptable before God."—Penn's Select Works, 799.

Robert Barclay presents the subject in the same point of view, viz: "We consider then our redemption in a two-fold respect or state, both which in their own nature are perfect, though in their application to us the one is not, nor cannot be, without respect to the other.

"The first, is the redemption performed and accomplished by Christ for us in his crucified body without us: the other is the redemption wrought by Christ in us, which no less properly is called and accounted a redemption than the former. The first then is that whereby a man, as he stands in the fall, is put into a capacity of salvation, and hath conveyed unto him a measure of that power, virtue, spirit, life, and grace that was in Christ Jesus, which, as the free gift of God, is able to counterbalance, overcome, and root out the evil seed, wherewith we are naturally, as in the fall, leavened.

"The second, is that whereby we witness and know this pure and perfect redemption in ourselves, purifying, cleansing, and redeeming us from the power of corruption, and bringing us into unity, favour and friendship with God. By the first of these two, we that were lost in Adam, plunged into the bitter and corrupt seed, unable of ourselves to do any good thing, but naturally joined and united to evil, forward and propense to all iniquity, servants and slaves to the power and spirit of darkness, are, notwithstanding all this, so far reconciled to God by the death of his Son, while enemies, that we are put into a capacity of salvation, having the glad tidings of the gospel of peace offered unto us, and God is reconciled unto us in Christ, calls and invites us to himself, in which respect we understand these scriptures; He slew the enmity in himself. He loved us first; seeing us in our blood he said unto us live; he who did not sin his own self, bare our sins in his own body on the tree; and he died for our sins, the just for the unjust.

"By the second, we witness this capacity brought into act, whereby receiving and not resisting the purchase of his death, to wit, the light, spirit, and grace of Christ revealed in us, we witness and possess a real, true, and inward redemption from the power and prevalence of sin, and so come to be truly and really redeemed, justified and made righteous, and to a sensible union and friendship with God. Thus he died for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity; and thus we know him and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable to his death. This last follows the first in order, and is a consequence of it, proceeding from it, as an effect from its cause; so as none could have enjoyed the last without the first had been, such being the will of God; so also can none now partake of the first, but as he witnesseth the last. Wherefore as to us, they are both causes of our justification: the first the procuring efficient, the other the formal cause."—Barclay's Apol. Phil. ed. pp. 218, 219.

Such are the clear and forcible testimonies borne by our early Friends to these important doctrines of the Gospel; doctrines which cannot be abandoned without striking at the very foundation of the Christian religion.

And in support of these and other principles of our profession, they did not fail to refer to the Holy Scriptures, as an acknowledged authority. Robert Barclay, in his Apology, says: "In this respect above mentioned, then, we have shown what service and use the Holy Scriptures as managed in and by the Spirit are of to the church of God, wherefore we do account them a secondary rule. Moreover, because they are commonly acknowledged by all, to have been written by the dictates of the Holy Spirit, and that the errors which may be supposed by the injury of time to have slipped in, are not such but that there is sufficient clear testimony left to all the essentials of the Christian faith: we do look upon them as the only fit outward judge of controversies among Christians, and that whatsoever doctrine is contrary unto their testimony, may therefore, justly be rejected as false. And for our parts, we are very willing that all our doctrines and practices be tried by them, which we never refused, nor ever shall in all our controversies with our adversaries, as the judge and test. We shall also be very willing to admit it as a positive, certain maxim, that whatsoever any do, pretending to the Spirit, which is contrary to the Scriptures, be accounted and reckoned a delusion of the Devil."—Barclay's Apol. Phil. ed. pp. 99, 100.

We have observed with deep regret and concern, that sundry phamphlets, periodical publications, and books of sermons attributed to ministers of the Society, have been latterly put in circulation, and represented as setting forth the principles of our profession, but containing sentiments wholly repugnant to the testimonies of scripture, to the doctrines of our early Friends, and to the discipline: publications which evidently come within the description of "pernicious books."

In a periodical paper called "The Berean," and which has been much read by the members of our society, it is declared:—"In vain does any man quote the scriptures as authority to maintain his opinions;" "that they were adapted to other times, and other states, and not to us;" and that we have no "right to appeal" even to the words of Jesus Christ "as authority to maintain" our "opinions."

And again: "Will it be presumed that God, whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain—whose presence fills the universe—abode in his fulness literally in the man Jesus? Can it be supposed that he, of whom it was declared that he was limited in knowledge, power, and action, possessed absolutely the Spirit of God without measure. I believe not. The doctrine thereof contained in the chapter under review,* ascribing a proper divinity to Jesus Christ, making him the foundation of every Christian doctrine, asserting that the divine nature essentially belonged to him, and constituting him a distinct object of faith and worship, is not only anti-scriptural, but opposed to the simplest principles of reason, and is in short among the darkest doctrines that has ever been introduced into the Christian Church."—Berean, p. 259.

In a printed letter bearing the name of Elias Hicks, and addressed to Dr. N. Shoemaker, it is said:—"I do not consider that the crucifixion of the outward body of flesh and blood of Jesus on the cross was an atonement for any sins, but the legal sins of the Jews." And again, in the same letter, in allusion to this subject it is said: "Surely it is possible that any rational being, that has any right sense of justice or mercy, would be willing to accept forgiveness of sins on such terms?"

And in a volume of Sermons attributed to the same individual, in speaking of our Lord Jesus Christ it is said: "He was only an outward Saviour,

* Doctrines of Friends, chapter IV.

† This word is not used in this sense by the author against whom the Berean was writing.

that healed their outward diseases, and gave them strength of body to enjoy that outward good land: it was the soul that wanted salvation; but this no outward Saviour could do,—no external Saviour could have any hand in it." In another place it is said: "If we believe that God is equal and righteous in all his ways, that he has made of one blood all the families that dwell upon the earth, it is impossible that he should be partial; and therefore, he has been as willing to reveal his will to every creature as he was to our first parents, to Moses and the prophets, to Jesus Christ and his apostles. He never can set any of these above us, because if he did he would be partial." Many other quotations of a character equally objectionable, in relation to these and other doctrines of the Christian religion, might be made from the same work, and several other publications, supporting the same views, might be mentioned; but these are sufficient to show the discordance there is between the publications to which we have alluded, and the writings of our early friends.

We believe it right to bear our testimony against all such doctrines, and the publications containing them, as subversive of the Christian Religion, and the Discipline of our Society. We are aware that some have professed a belief in the Divinity of Christ, who nevertheless, confined their application of these terms exclusively to the divine principle, in the hearts of men; which is a virtual denial that "Jesus is the Christ," contrary to the clearest testimony of Scriptures. Or if they make any application to Jesus of Nazareth, they allow him to be no more than a good man, which Pagans and Infidels have done; while our early friends, in accordance with Scripture testimony, positively denied this doctrine, acknowledged his humanity and Eternal Deity,* that he was both true God and true man.† The word made flesh,‡ the Emanuel, God with us.

In the progress of those principles, against which we feel bound to bear testimony, a separation of a number of individuals has taken place within the limits of a neighbouring Yearly Meeting. In this separation, the connexion with the Yearly Meeting to which they have belonged, has been dissolved, and meetings of their own set up, contrary to the ancient and clearly established order of our Religious Society. This state of things, we believe, demands that it should be understood, that we cannot acknowledge a connexion with these separate meetings, nor religious fellowship with the individuals who compose them.

We earnestly recommend to all our members to hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering—for other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ; neither is there salvation in any other—for there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we may be saved.

Our Lord Jesus Christ, in speaking of the Comforter, the Spirit of Truth, whom the Father would send in his name, told his disciples:—"He shall glorify me, for he shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you." The prophets, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, were led to testify beforehand of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow:—those who were under this influence when he came, acknowledged him to be the Christ, the Son of the living God, and paid "great adoration and honour" unto him; and the apostles and primitive believers, after his resurrection, under the powerful influence of the Holy Ghost, bore testimony to his divine character—that "in him dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily"—that he is "the head of all principality and power"—and that unto him "every knee shall bow," and "every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." And in relation to the one great offering which he made when he offered up himself, and in which ended all the typical offerings of the legal dispensation;—they testified that "If when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son; much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life."—"That he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again."

"Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the High Priest entereth into the holy place every year with the blood of others; for then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world,—but now, once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." And having spoiled principalities and powers, and led captivity captive, he hath entered into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us. Thus we have an advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ the righteous. As the Lord Jesus Christ was prophesied of by all the prophets since the foundation of the world—was pointed to in the law—acknowledged by the righteous when he came in the flesh, and after his resurrection powerfully preached by those who were eye-witnesses of his glory and qualified by the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven; so in all subsequent ages, the influence of the Holy Spirit, has led to a harmonizing accordance with the record which God gave of his Son. We earnestly desire that all would humbly and reverently seek to be clothed with this divine influence—then would they be no more as children, tossed to and fro with every wind of doctrine, nor moved away from the hope of the Gospel.

And we are engaged to revive a concern which has often been felt by the Society, and clearly expressed; to recommend to parents, in an especial manner, to guard with christian solicitude the tender minds of their dear offspring against the dangers of corrupt conversation and pernicious publications; and to encourage them, by precept and example, frequently to read the Holy Scriptures. Great is the influence of parental care under the direction of divine wisdom, and sweet the consolation of having an evidence within ourselves of resembling those of old, who brought little children to Christ. And on the other hand, great is the responsibility of parents, and awful the consequences of turning them aside from the one sure foundation, and instilling into their tender, yet receptive minds, principles which tend to "subvert the Gospel of Christ."

The daily reading of the Holy Scriptures, with minds humbly turned for instruction to that divine Source of Light and Intelligence, from which they proceeded, is a practice recommended by our worthy predecessors, who were confirmed from living experience, in the belief that they were not only adapted to the instruction of those of the respective ages in which they were given forth, but were also "written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures, might have hope" in that salvation which comes by Jesus Christ.

Read, approved, and signed, in and on behalf of Indiana Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at White-Water, by adjournments, from the 8th of the Tenth month, to the 13th of the same, inclusive; 1827.

STANZAS.

A guardian spirit looks abroad,
Upon the ways of erring man;
The all-pervading power of God
Directs and rules in every plan.

Thro' light and darkness, good and ill,
His still ordaining hand I see,
My lot he guides and governs still,
Whate'er that varied lot may be.

Then shall I not, tho' tempests frown,
Take what his hand of love bestows,
And drink the offered chalice down,
E'en tho' its draught be dregg'd with woes!

Lord! grant us, when our souls are tried,
To own and bless thy heavenly way—
Let peace around our footsteps glide,
And resignation light the way.

FROM THE ATLANTIC SOUVENIR FOR 1828.

BIRDS.—By CHARLES W. THOMSON.

Ye birds that fly thro' the fields of air,
What lessons of wisdom and truth ye bear;
Ye would teach our souls from earth to rise,
Ye would bid us its grovelling scenes to despise.
Ye would tell us that all its pursuits are vain,
That pleasure is toil—ambition is pain,
That its bliss is touched with a poisoning leaven,
Ye would teach us to fix our aim on Heaven.

Beautiful birds of the azure wing,
Bright creatures that come with the voice of Spring;
We see you arranged in the hues of the morn,
Yet ye dream not of pride, and ye wist not of scorn!
Tho' rainbow splendour around you glows,
Ye vaunt not the beauty which nature bestows;
Oh! what a lesson for glory are ye,
How ye preach of the grace of humility.

Swift birds that skim o'er the stormy deep,
Who steadily onward your journey keep,
Who neither for rest nor slumber stay,
But press still forward, by night or day—
And in your unwearying course yet fly
Beneath the clear and the clouded sky;
Oh! may we without delay, like you,
The path of duty and right pursue.

Sweet birds, that breathe the spirit of song,
And surround Heaven's gate in melodious throng,
Who rise with the earliest beams of day,
Your morning tribute of thanks to pay.
You remind us that we alike should raise
The voice of devotion and song of praise;
There's something about you that points, on high,
Ye beautiful tenants of earth and sky.

HARVEST HYMN.

Written after the peace—1816.

Again to Nature's bounteous God,
Let Earth her annual tribute bring—
Sound from her mountain tops abroad,
His praise, and through her valleys ring.

For, at his voice the fruitful year,
Has every vernal pledge redeemed,
And joyous plenty triumph'd there,
Where death was rife and falchions gleamed.

Lord of the harvest! from thy throne
What countless blessings hourly part;
These unearn'd gifts are all thy own,
And thine, to give the grateful heart.

Thee, over ocean's farthest shores,
The meanest herb proclaims divine;
Thine are brown autumn's garner'd stores,
And Summer's lavish'd glories thine.

Thy praise exulting nature sings,
In wood-notes wild from every tree,
And the green Earth her incense flings,
From thousand odorous flowers to thee.

Nor less—for plenty's sister band,
White banner'd Peace and toiling health,
Shall grateful man adore the hand,
That crowns him Lord of Nature's wealth.

Then bring the Harp, the timbrel bring,
And pour the thrilling cadence forth,
Ye realms—the Almighty's goodness sing,
Clap thy glad hands, thou teeming Earth.

It is a certain sign men want restraints, when they are impatient under any.—Seed.

The Legislature of New-Jersey, it appears, was expected to adjourn on the 7th instant, to meet again in the first month next. During its sitting, three applications for canals had been presented, and two for rail roads. The subject of the Delaware and Raritan canal, engrosses much attention, and one of the rail roads talked of, is from Trenton to New Brunswick. The bill to extend the Morris canal to the Hudson, has passed to a third reading.

A daring highway robbery was committed by two men near Belleville, Washington county, in this state, on the 1st instant, upon the person of Mr. William Griffey. Mr. Griffey was on horseback. The villains seized the bridle, drew him from the horse to the ground, and stabbed him several times with a knife. They finally tied his hands, and bound him round the neck to a tree. They then robbed him of 25 dollars, and made off, leaving him bound. He was found about an hour and a half afterwards. One hundred dollars reward is offered for their apprehension.—Penn. Gazette.

Boston, Oct. 3.

As an instance of commendable honesty and generosity, we mention that a lad, son of Mr. Benjamin Tilden, of this city, was so fortunate yesterday as to find a wallet, containing $1100, which had been lost by a young man, son of Mr. Jacob Barstow. As soon as the loss of the latter became known to young Tilden, he repaired directly to Mr. Barstow, and restored the wallet with its contents untouched. In reward for his honesty, Mr. B. presented young Tilden with fifty dollars.—Though we doubt not there are many such sons, yet so excellent an example deserves to be made public, for the influence it may have on others.

Reward of Ingenuity.—Mr. Thornton, of the Patent Office, Washington, relates the following anecdote.

Mr. Gilbert Brewster, a very ingenious artist, from Connecticut, came to the Patent Office about the middle of October, 1823, and requested permission to examine the models. I informed him they were deposited for public inspection, and that he was at liberty to see and examine them as often and as long as he pleased. Instead of spending a few hours, he visited them daily for about six weeks—then thanked me for the gratification he had enjoyed, declaring them worth millions of dollars, or that they were of incalculable value to a real mechanic. He said he saw movements and combinations, of which before he had no idea, and that he was now enabled so to improve the machinery for spinning wool, as to reduce the price of spinning from eight cents to one cent per pound. He went away, and returned in about three months with two models, declaring, on his return, that he had perfected what he had contemplated, and that he could then spin wool at a lower price than the English, who could not effect it for less than four cents per pound. I issued three patents for his machines, and a gentleman who accompanied him from New York, and who engaged to buy those machines for a manufacturing company in Connecticut, laid him down ten thousand dollars in my presence.—Pawtucket Chronicle.

Berwick, Sept. 8.

John Chisholm, apprentice to a butcher in this town, was sent to the Magdalen-fields to bring in a sheep for slaughter. He caught it near the Redoubt, where the beach is very precipitous. The animal feeling a dislike at being deprived of its liberty, began struggling, and being on the verge of the precipice, not less than 40 or 50 feet high, both tumbled over. Fortunately for the lad, the sheep was undermost, and was killed on the spot. The lad was completely stunned by the fall, and received some severe contusions. He was carried home in a state of insensibility by some soldiers who happened to be near the spot. For the first two or three days little hope was entertained that his life could be preserved, but he is now in a fair way of recovery.—Edinburgh paper.

Covering for Roofs.—A new substitute for slates has been adopted in England, and introduced extensively into use. A quantity of lime is slacked in tar, in which sheets of the largest and thickest brown paper are dipped, and then laid on in the manner of slating. This is said to make a durable covering, answering every purpose of shingles or slates, and will effectually resist the weather for a great number of years.

"During my stay at St. Petersburg," says Mr. Holman, "the following singular story was spoken of as having occurred at this place:—Two gentlemen had contracted a bitter and irreconcilable enmity against each other. A servant of one happening to die, was buried within 24 hours, after the Russian custom, when the other determined to gratify his revenge upon his adversary, by accusing him of the murder of this man. To give a colour to this accusation, accompanied by some of his confidential servants, he proceeded to disinter the corpse, with a view of inflicting marks of violence upon it. The body was removed from the coffin, and held erect, that it might undergo a severe flogging; when, to the astonishment and dismay of the party, after a few blows had been inflicted, animation returned, and the affrighted resurrection men ran off with the utmost precipitation. The corpse at length recovering its animation, was able to move off in its shroud, and regain its master's habitation, which it entered, to the great terror of its inhabitants. At length, however, his reality becoming certain, they were reassured, and the supposed ghost communicated all that he could remember of the state he had been in; which was, that his senses had not left him, notwithstanding he had felt so cold and torpid as to be incapable of speech or motion, till the blows had restored him. This led to the detection of the diabolical plan against his master's life and character."

From a Paris Letter in the Waterford Chronicle.

The finest library, at the present day, in the world, is the Royal Library in Paris (Bibliothèque du Roi.) The building is of immense extent—an oblong square, with a court-yard in the centre. It consists of two floors, divided into suites of spacious apartments, in which the books are classified according to the different branches of Literature or Science to which they belong. The principal divisions are—1st, the Printed books; 2d, the Manuscripts; 3d, Engravings; 4th, the Medals and Antiques of different ages, and from all nations. In this library are to be found the best works that have ever appeared, upon every possible subject, and in every known language, living and dead, ancient and modern. It has been the work of ages—one upon which the French nation justly prides itself, and upon which the kings of France for generations, have spared no expense in procuring the richest and most valuable collections from every part of the world. It was commenced under the reign of King John of France, and, during his life, did not exceed ten volumes—six volumes on profane literature, and four on religion. From this period so rapid has been its increase, that it now ranks, beyond all comparison, the first and greatest library in the world, consisting of the following prodigious number of volumes:

Five thousand volumes of engravings;

Seventy-two thousand volumes of manuscripts; and

Eight hundred thousand volumes of printed books.

Besides the richest collection of Medals and Antiquities in existence.

It has been justly observed, that on looking through this great depot of literature, one cannot help feeling astonished at the fertility of the human mind, which has been able to produce such a multitude of ideas as are contained in the piles of ponderous volumes which the eye surveys, without being able to reach to the end.

The saloons are in succession, and open wide into each other. In the centre of one of these saloons is a miniature of the classic mount "Parnassus," beautifully executed by the artist Fiton. It represents a round rugged mountain, shaded with the emblematic myrtle and laurel trees. On this mountain are numerous small figures in bronze, of the most celebrated poets and eminent learned men who have adorned France, placed at various heights, according to the estimated literary rank of the individual whom each figure is meant to represent. At another end of the building is seen a representation of the sandy deserts of Africa—the Pyramids—groves of palm trees—and caravans of travellers—all executed in the most exact proportion, according to a scale which is given. Adjoining this is a saloon dedicated to works on geography and astronomy. Here are to be seen the two largest globes in the world—celestial and terrestrial. Their size is so great, that, in order to place them it was necessary to cut two large circular openings in the upper floor; the frame work rests on the ground floor, and the globes are situated in the centre, half in the upper, and half in the lower rooms—so that by merely turning them, they can be seen from either; they are both the same size, measuring (each) twelve feet in diameter, and about thirty five feet in circumference.

In the Cabinet of Antiquities are shown the finest collection in existence, of gold, silver, and bronze medals of all ages and nations; a large silver shield, supposed to be that used by Scipio; the brazen chair of King Dagobert; the armour of Francis I.; a beautiful vase, in the shape of a chalice, made of ivory, formed out of the single tooth of an elephant; various and valuable specimens of Egyptian antiquities; several Egyptian mummies, and an Egyptian bird, called the Ibis, with its plumage fresh, and in the highest state of preservation, supposed to be upwards of 3000 years old.

The Manuscripts occupy five saloons. Thirty thousand volumes of the manuscripts are connected with the history of France; the remaining 42,000 volumes consist of foreign languages, ancient literature, and the correspondence of eminent individuals; amongst them are some letters from Henry VIII. King of England, in his own hand writing (and a very bad hand he wrote); letters from Henry IV. of France; the manuscripts of Telemachus in the hand-writing of Fenelon; an ancient manuscript of Homer, and Petrarch's manuscript of Virgil.

In fact, any description of this splendid institution can give but a very imperfect idea. It would take a week to see it as it ought to be seen; and any person whose taste lies that way, will see it with increased pleasure every time.

Reason cannot show itself more reasonable, than to leave reasoning on things above reason.—Aphorisms, by Sir Philip Sidney.

Man's reason is so far from being the measurer of religious faith, which far exceedeth nature, that it is not so much as the measurer of nature, and of the least creatures which lie far beneath man.—Id.

Reason! how many eyes thou hast to see evils, and how dim, nay blind, thou art in preventing them!—Id.

True politeness is the genuine offspring of true religion. A sullen severity of manners is no where inculcated in the gospel. Meekness, humility, and condescension, are there marked out as fundamental graces.—And where these reign in the heart, they will surely dictate such a sweet and amiable conduct, as is only mimicked by the common forms of what is called good-breeding.—T. Duchée.

But the character of his mind as it shines forth in his judgments, is a subject of much livelier interest.

The first great property which they disclose, is his veneration of the law, and above all, of the fundamental Common Law. There is not a line from his pen, that trifles with the sacred deposit in his hands, by claiming to fashion it according to a private opinion of what it ought to be. Judicial legislation he abhorred, I should rather say, dreaded, as an implication of his conscience. His first inquiry in every case was of the oracles of the law for their response; and when he obtained it, notwithstanding his clear perception of the justice of the cause, and his intense desire to reach it, if it was not the justice of the law, he dared not to administer it. He acted upon the sentiment of Lord Bacon, that it is the foulest injustice to remove landmarks, and that to corrupt the law, is to poison the very fountain of justice. With a consciousness that to the errors of the science there are some limits, but none to the evils of a licentious invasion of it, he left it to our annual legislatures to correct such defects in the system, as time either created or exposed: and better foundation in the law can no man lay.

Those who study his opinions, while they may remark that he was unusually sparing of references to authority, will find that it was the result of selection and not of penury. He was not, however, what is sometimes termed a great case-lawyer.—His memory did not appear to be tenacious of insulated decisions; nor is it usual for men of philosophical minds, who arrange the learning of their profession by the aid of general principles, to be distinguished by their recollection of particular facts. With the leading cases under every head, those which may be called the light-houses of the law, he was familiar, and knew their bearings upon every passage into this deeply indented territory; but for the minor points, the soundings that are marked so profusely upon modern charts of the law, he trusted too much to the length and employment of his own line, to oppress his memory with them. It was not his practice to bring into his judgments, an historical account of the legal doctrine on which they turned, nor to illustrate them by frequent references to other codes, to which, nevertheless, he was perfectly competent by the variety as well as by the extent of his studies. His preference was rather to deduce the sentence he was about to pronounce, as a logical consequence from some proposition of law which he had previously stated and settled with great brevity. No judge was ever more free both in mind and style from every thing like technicality. He never assigned a technical reason for any thing, if another were at command, or if not, without sustaining the artificial reason by an explanation of its grounds. At the same time his knowledge embraced all the refinements of the law, and he took an obvious satisfaction in showing their connexion with substantial justice.

His judgments are further distinguished by perspicuity, precision and singleness.

No careful reader was ever at a loss for the meaning of the Chief Justice, and his whole meaning. His language is transparent; you see through it, instantly, the purpose of the writer. There is no involution, no parenthesis, no complication. Every thing is direct, natural, and explicit. His style without being dry, and possessing upon proper occasions such embellishments even, as a severe and critical taste would permit, is made up, in general, of terms and phrases so entirely ascertained in their meaning, as to defy the extraction of a double sense,—an excellence of the very first order in judicial compositions. This precision, was the result of an accurate adjustment of the argument before he committed it to paper. His opinions, such as they appear in the earliest reports of them, and I presume the same of the whole, were published from the first draught, in which it was rare to find either erasure or interlineation; and I recollect no instance in which he was asked by counsel, or induced by his own review, to give an explanation of them.

All his opinions, are, moreover, remarkable for their admirable common sense, and their adaptation to the common understanding. There is no reaching after what is recondite, or abstruse—no affectation of science. The language of the law, as he uses it, is vernacular, and his arguments are the most simple that the case will bear. They are not an intricate web, in which filaments separately weak obtain strength by their union, but a chain, whose firmness arises from the solidity of its links, and not from the artifice of their connexion.

But that quality which exalts his judgments the most in the estimation of the public, is the ardent love of justice which runs through them all. His appetite for it was keen and constant; and nothing could rouse his kind and courteous temper into resentment, more than a deliberate effort to entangle justice in the meshes of chicanery. The law was his master; he yielded implicit obedience to its behests. Justice was the object of his affections; he defended her with the devotion of a lover. It is the high praise of his administration, and of the profession too, that the occasions were rare in which his efforts did not bring them into harmonious co-operation.

Is it not worthy of remark, that judgments such as these, which enjoyed universal respect, were nevertheless, free from every thing like pretension? Chief Justice Tilghman could have done as much with this Bar, by the force of his authority, as any Judge that ever sat in his seat. His investigations were known to be so faithful, his reasonings so just, and his convictions so impartial, that there would have been a ready acceptance of his conclusions, without a knowledge of the steps which led to them. He asked however, for submission to no authority, so rarely as to his own. You may search his opinions in vain, for any thing like personal assertion. He never threw the weight of his office into the scale, which the weight of his argument did not turn. He spoke and wrote as the minister of reason, claiming obedience to her, and selecting with scrupulous modesty such language, as while it sustained the dignity of his office, kept down from the relief, in which he might well have appeared, the individual who filled it. Look over the judgments of more than twenty years, many of them rendered by this excellent magistrate after his title to unlimited deference was established by a right more divine than that of Kings,—there is not to be found one arrogant, one supercilious expression, turned against the opinions of other judges, one vain glorious regard toward himself. He does not write as if it occurred to him, that his writings would be examined to fix his measure, when compared with the standard of great men, but as if their exclusive use was to assist in fixing a standard of the law.

His own exemption from moral infirmity, might be supposed to have made him severe in his reckonings with the guilty; but it is the quality of minds as pure as his, to look with compassion upon those who have fallen from virtue. He could not but pronounce the sentence of the law upon such as were condemned to hear it; but the calmness, the dignity, the impartiality, with which he ordered their trials, the deep attention which he gave to such as involved life, and the touching manner of his last office to the convicted, demonstrated his sense of the peculiar responsibility, which belonged to this part of his functions. In civil controversies, such excepted, as by some feature of injustice demanded a notice of the parties, he reduced the issue pretty much to an abstract form, and solved it as if it had been an algebraic problem. But in criminal cases, there was a constant reference to the wretched persons whose fate was suspended before him; and in the very celerity with which he endeavoured to dispose of the accusation, he evinced his sympathy. It was his invariable effort, without regard to his own health, to finish a capital case at one sitting, if any portion of the night would suffice for the object; and one of his declared motives was to terminate, as soon as possible, that harrowing solicitude, worse even than the worst certainty, which a protracted trial brings to the unhappy prisoner. He never pronounced the sentence of death without severe pain; in the first instance it was the occasion of anguish. In this, as in many other points, he bore a strong resemblance to Sir Matthew Hale. His awful reverence of the great Judge of all mankind, and the humility with which he habitually walked in that presence, made him uplift the sword of justice, as if it scarcely belonged to man, himself a suppliant, to let it fall on the neck of his fellow man.

Upon the whole, his character as a Judge, was a combination of some of the finest elements that have been united in that office. Among those which may be regarded as primary or fundamental, were a reverential love of the Common Law, and a fervent zeal for justice, as the end and intended fruit of all law. The former was enlightened by laborious study in early life, the latter was purified, like the constitution of his whole mind, by a ceaseless endeavour to ascertain the truth. In the service of these exalted affections, he never faltered. His effort in every cause was to satisfy them both; and by attention to the researches of others, patient inquiry for himself, and a judgment singularly free from disturbance of every kind, he rarely failed to attain his object. Other judges may have had more learning at immediate command,—none have had their learning under better discipline, or in a condition more effective for the duty on which it was employed. His mind did not flow through his opinions in a stream of exuberant richness, but its current was transparently clear, and its depth was never less than the subject required, however profound. He was moreover equal to all the exigencies of his office, and many of them were great; without any such exertion as appeared to disturb the harmony, or even the repose, of his faculties; and he has finally laid down his great charge, with the praise of being second to none who have preceded him in it, and of leaving his countrymen without the expectation or the desire of seeing him surpassed by those who shall follow him.

The judicial faculties and virtues which I have thus endeavoured to sketch, could never have been the companions of disorder in the mind, the affections, or the life of the individual. My Lord Coke has made to the aspiring student of the Law, this striking appeal, too flattering perhaps, except while the venerable portrait of the late Chief Justice is still before us: "Cast thine eye upon the sages of the law that have been before thee, and never shalt thou find any one that hath excelled in the knowledge of these laws, but hath drawn from that divine knowledge, gravity, and integrity." He pronounces this knowledge to be irreconcilable with a loose and lawless life, and gives the result of his large experience, that he had never seen any man of excellent judgment in the Common Law of England, "but was withal, being taught by such a master, honest, faithful, and virtuous." The Chief Justice was not only thoroughly taught by this master, but he came into the school accomplished in elegant learning; and long before he left it, there was associated the training of another school, worthier far than the Common Law, of the exalted eulogy of Sir Edward Coke.

His early education, it has been remarked, was excellent. He was an accomplished Latin scholar, but to his own regret, had suffered his Greek to fall away by desuetude. The literature of the former language, he kept constantly fresh in his mind. His memory was stored with beautiful Latin, which he has been heard to repeat as it were to himself, when the occasion recalled it, and his modesty did not care to pronounce it aloud. On all his Circuits and journeys into the districts of the Supreme Court, his companions were the BRAE, a Latin author, and some recent treatise of distinction in the law. Upon the last that he ever made, he refreshed his recollections of the Pharsalia. It is perhaps no idle fancy to suppose that he may have then read, with almost a personal application, the prophetic appeal of the Spectre to the race of Pompey:

— veniet quæ misceat omnes
Horo duces. Præparate mori —

Such a name and such an example, are of great efficacy in the inquiry concerning the fittest basis of liberal education. All the faculties of his mind were thoroughly developed,—he accumulated large stores of knowledge,—he brought them into daily use,—he reasoned accurately,—he conversed elegantly,—his taste was refined,—the pleasures which it brought to him were pure,—his imagination was replete with the beautiful forms of ancient poetry,—he was adequate to the functions of one of the most exalted offices,—he knew little of the natural sciences,—and his education was such as has been described. It would be unjust to him, however, to say that he undervalued knowledge of any kind, and least of all that knowledge which is opening every day to the world, and to this part of the world especially, new sources of wealth, and new proofs of the wisdom and beneficence of Deity. On the contrary, with that diffusive liberality, for which he was conspicuous, he gave his counsel and his money to every plan for increasing this species of knowledge; but it cannot be asserted of him, that he recommended it in any of its branches, as an instrument for unfolding the faculties of youth. He regarded these sciences as treasure for accumulation, after education had performed its office. For the great work of training the minds of young men to liberal pursuits, and to the learned professions, his opinion was anchored upon the system, by which he had been reared himself,—the system of the American Colleges.

intervals of office, for the literature of his own language, in which he was extensively versed, and for which he possessed the keenest relish; and it is to these two sources that he owed the purity of his style, where nothing coarse or vulgar ever appeared, and which, without being affected or elaborate, was remarkable for the absence of all words of questionable authority.

His moral qualities were of the highest order. It has been said, that the panegyrist of great men can rarely direct the eye with safety to their early years, for fear of lighting upon the traces of some irregular passion. But to the subject of this discourse, may with justice be applied, the praise of the Chancellor D'Aguesseau, that he was never known to take a single step out of the narrow path of wisdom, and that although it was sometimes remarked he had been young, it was for the purpose not of palliating a defect, but of doing greater honour to his virtues. Of his early life, few of his contemporaries remain to speak; but those few attest, what the harmony of his whole character in later years would infer, that his youth gave presage by its sobriety and exemplary rectitude, of all that we witnessed and admired in the maturity of his character. It is great praise to say of so excellent a Judge, that there was no contrariety between his judgments and his life,—that there was a perfect consent between his public and his private manners,—that he was an engaging example of all he taught,—and that no reproach which, in his multifarious employment, he was compelled to utter against all the forms of injustice, public and private, social and domestic,—against all violations of law, from crime down to those irregularities at which, from general infirmity, there is a general connivance,—in no instance, did the sting of his reproach wound his own bosom. Yet it was in his life only, and not in his pretensions, that you discerned this his fortunate superiority to others. In his private walks he was the most unpretending of men. He bore constantly about him those characteristics of true greatness, simplicity and modesty. Shall I add, that the memory of all his acquaintance may be challenged to repeat from his most unrestrained conversation, one word or allusion, that might not have fallen with propriety upon the ear of the most fastidious delicacy.

LORD CHATHAM.

We recommend to the particular attention of our young readers, the following extract from the letters of this great statesman, to his nephew, Lord Camelford. The correspondence from which it is taken, and of which it is one of the finest passages—"exhibits," to use the words of Lord Grenville, "a great orator, statesman and patriot, in one of the most interesting relations of private society, not, as in the cabinet or the senate, enforcing by a vigorous and commanding eloquence, those counsels to which his country owed her pre-eminence and glory; but implanting with parental kindness into the mind of an ingenious youth, seeds of wisdom and virtue, which ripened into full maturity in the character of a most accomplished man: directing him to the acquisition of knowledge, as the best instrument of action; teaching him by the cultivation of his reason, to strengthen and establish in his heart those principles of moral rectitude which were congenial to it; and, above all, exhorting him to regulate the whole conduct of his life by the predominant influence of gratitude, and obedience to God, as the only sure groundwork of every human duty!"

"What parent, anxious for the character and success of a son, born to any liberal station in this great and free country, would not, in all that related to his education, gladly have resorted to the advice of such a man? What youthful spirit animated by any desire of future excellence, and looking for the gratification of that desire, in the pursuits of honourable ambition, or in the consciousness of an upright, active, and useful life, would not embrace with transport, any opportunity of listening on such a subject to the lessons of Lord Chatham? They are here before him. Not delivered with the authority of a preceptor, or a parent, but tempered by the affection of a friend towards a disposition and character well entitled to such regard."

"Pythagoras enjoined his scholars an absolute silence for a long noviciate. I am far from approving such a taciturnity: but I highly recommend the end and intent of Pythagoras's injunction; which is to dedicate the first parts of life more to hear and learn, in order to collect materials, out of which to form opinions founded on proper lights, and well examined sound principles, than to be presuming, prompt, and flippant in hazarding one's own slight crude notions of things; and thereby exposing the nakedness and emptiness of the mind, like a house opened to company before it is fitted either with necessities, or any ornaments for their reception and entertainment. And not only will this disgrace follow from such temerity and presumption, but a more serious danger is sure to ensue, that is, the embracing errors for truths, prejudices for principles; and when that is once done, (no matter how vainly and weakly,) the adhering perhaps to false and dangerous notions, only because one has declared for them, and submitting, for life, the understanding and conscience to a yoke of base and servile prejudices, vainly taken up and obstinately retained. This will never be your danger; but I thought it not amiss to offer these reflections to your thoughts. As to your manner of behaving towards these unhappy young gentlemen you describe, let it be manly and easy; decline their parties with civility; retort their raillery with raillery, always tempered with good breeding: if they banter your regularity, order, decency, and love of study, banter in return their neglect of them; and venture to own frankly, that you came to Cambridge to learn what you can, not to follow what they are pleased to call pleasure. In short, let your external behaviour to them be as full of politeness and ease as your inward estimation of them is full of pity, mixed with contempt. I come now to the part of the advice I have to offer to you, which most nearly concerns your welfare, and upon which every good and honourable purpose of your life will assuredly turn; I mean the keeping up in your heart the true sentiments of religion. If you are not right towards God, you can never be so towards man: the noblest sentiment of the human breast is here brought to the test. Is gratitude in the number of a man's virtues? If it be, the highest benefactor demands the warmest returns of gratitude, love, and praise: Ingratum qui dixerit, omnia dixit. If a man wants this virtue where there are infinite obligations to excite and quicken it, he will be likely to want all others towards his fellow-creatures, whose utmost gifts are poor compared to those he daily receives at the hands of his never-failing Almighty Friend. Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth, is big with the deepest wisdom: The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; and, an upright heart, that is understanding. This is eternally true, whether the wits and rakes of Cambridge allow it or not: nay, I must add of this religious wisdom, Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace, whatever your young gentlemen of pleasure think of a frolic and a bottle, a tainted health and battered constitution. Hold fast therefore by this sheet-

* The hour draws near when all alike must yield,
And death shall mix the fame of every field.
Haste then—&c. Rome's Pharsalia.

anchor of happiness, Religion; you will often want it in the times of most danger; the storms and tempests of life. Cherish true religion as preciously as you will fly with abhorrence and contempt superstition and enthusiasm. The first is the perfection and glory of the human nature; the two last the deprivation and disgrace of it. Remember the essence of religion is, a heart void of offence towards God and man; not subtle speculative opinions, but an active vital principle of faith."

The intimate connexion between a healthy state of the brain, and the power of the mind over the body, was probably one of the earliest established facts in the history of man. In a late French journal, an account is given of a person who was otherwise in perfect health, but who had lost his command of language. If you said tambour, (drum) and asked him to repeat it, he said, fromage (cheese), but wrote it very well when asked so to do. He could copy very exactly, feuille medicale, but could not read it after he had copied it; he would say, sequicale, fenicale, fecorale, and when sequicale was written for him, he called it jardait. Various objects being presented to him, he designated them in general, with correctness, but if he happened to make one mistake, he would go on and call a pen a cloth, a spitting-box a pen, a hand a cup, a string a hand, &c.

This curious account reminds us of a very touching narrative of a loss of power somewhat similar, although the mind and body do not appear to have been so completely disjointed, as in the above instance. It is contained in Hennen's Military Surgery, and is as follows.

Captain B—, a particular friend of mine, was wounded by a musket ball in the head at Waterloo, on the 18th June. On the 19th, he was brought into the city of Brussels, in charge of a medical officer, who gave me a most melancholy account of this case. On approaching the wagon in which he was conveyed, I was insensibly attracted to that part of it where he was stretched, by a low protracted moan, as of a person in extreme pain, but very weak. On calling him by name, he sat up, caught me by the hand, which he kissed most fervently, pointed to his head, and then to the site of another wound, which he had received at the storming of Badajos, from the effects of which, I had the good fortune to relieve him. He then burst into tears, but without having the power of uttering a distinct word. His countenance was pale and ghastly, and his mouth somewhat distorted; his eye languid and suffused with blood; his skin dry, but cool; his pulse about 90, soft and compressible. As I found that he had been bled on the field, I contented myself with providing him with a billet, and giving him in charge of his medical attendant. The wounded being now pouring in by hundreds, I was unable to see him before the 21st; his case, however, was reported to me daily. Much coagulated blood, and some particles of sand, on which he had fallen, together with a thin scale of lead, obviously a bit of a split musket ball, had been removed. On my visit, I found his countenance pale, expressive of great pain, referrible more to mental, than corporeal suffering; mouth still distorted; eye sunk, but its pupil dilatable; the power of articulating any distinct sound lost, but the desire obviously strong. A bullet and a large piece of the skull bone were extracted from the wound, and, when I next saw him, his whole appearance indicated the most extreme danger. He lay coiled up in the bottom of his bed; the right arm stretched out, and occasionally convulsed; no exertion could get a sight of his eyes or his tongue; the mouth was more distorted than usual; the skin was nearly as on the day of the operation, except that the partial sweating over the hepatic region was increased in profuseness, and he seemed to wince more on pressure at that part; indeed, all the sympathies seemed to be entirely merged in those connecting the brain and liver. The stomach participated remarkably little, for he had scarcely any vomiting. His pulse alone gave me some hopes; it was nearly natural. On addressing him, he made an effort to rouse himself, but almost immediately relapsed into his former stupor. I directed a strict watch to be kept over him; and as my duties called me again to that part of the city where he lodged, I visited him about midnight. He made an attempt to articulate, and pronounced audibly, the letter T. once or twice. The next morning, being the fifth from the receipt of his wound, his general appearance was amazingly altered for the better; and his efforts to speak were continual. On the sixth day, he grasped my hand with great fervour, looked piteously in my face, and, to my inquiries as to his feelings, he uttered audibly, though with much labour, the monosyllable "THER," to which, in the course of the day, he added, "O;" and for the three next days, whenever addressed, he slowly, distinctly, and in a most pathetic tone, repeated the words, "O; THER: O; THER;" as if to prove the powers of his pronunciation. His general appearance, during all this time, amended considerably, and my hopes now began to revive. I therefore resolved to write to his family, and before doing so, I printed in large characters on a sheet of paper, the following words: "Shall I write to your mother?" that being the wish which it appeared to me he so long and ardently had laboured to utter. It is impossible to describe the illumination of his countenance on reading these talismanic words; he grasped and pressed my hand with warmth, burst into tears, and gave every demonstration of having obtained the boon which he had endeavoured to solicit. From this period, his mental faculties gradually developed themselves; he regained a consciousness of the circumstances immediately preceding his wound, and, in succession, of those of a more remote period. The power of speech was the last which he perfectly regained, and for which he usually substituted the communication of his thoughts and wishes in writing. Throughout the whole of his convalescent state, melancholy ideas constantly predominated, although, previous to the accident, he had been remarkable for his flow of spirits. He returned to England, nearly recovered, on the 29th September, or 103d day from the wound.—Hennen on Military Surgery.

FOR THE FRIEND. PALESTINE, NO. I.

The following abstract of some interesting particulars, respecting that eventful land, will serve to illustrate many expressions and allusions in the Scriptures. The chief authority from whence it is derived, is "Horne's Introduction to the critical study and knowledge of the Holy Scriptures," a work which is not so generally known in the Society, as it deserves to be. To such readers of the Friend, as have not access to this rather expensive work, the following information, it is believed, will prove instructive, as well as entertaining. M.

The country formerly occupied by the Hebrews, Israelites, and Jews, is to this day, denominated by Christians, the Holy Land, because it was chosen by God, to be the immediate seat of his worship—was the residence of the Patriarchs and Prophets—and was consecrated by the presence, actions, miracles, discourses, and sufferings of the Lord Jesus Christ. This name does not appear to have been used by the Hebrews themselves, until after the Babylonish captivity, when we find the prophet Zechariah applying it to his country. But though the whole land of Israel was regarded as holy, yet the Jews imagined particular parts to be vested with more than ordinary sanctity, according to their respective situations. Thus the parts situated beyond Jordan, were considered to be less holy than those on this side: walled towns were supposed to be more clean and holy than other places, because no lepers were admissible into them, and the dead were not allowed to be buried there. Even the very dust of the land of Israel was reputed to possess such a peculiar degree of sanctity, that when the Jews returned from any heathen country, they stopped at its borders, and wiped the dust of it from their shoes, lest the sacred inheritance should be polluted with it. To this notion, our Lord unquestionably alluded, when he commanded his disciples to shake off the dust of their feet, (Matt. x. 14.) on returning from any house or city, that would neither receive nor hear them; thereby intimating to them, that when the Jews had rejected the Gospel, they were no longer to be regarded as the people of God.

The appellation of Palestine, by which the whole land appears to have been called in the days of Moses, is derived from the Philistines, a people who migrated from Egypt, and having expelled the aboriginal inhabitants, settled on the borders of the Mediterranean. From the latest and most accurate maps, it appears to have extended two hundred miles in length, and from 10 to 80 miles in breadth.

Jerusalem was the metropolis of the land of Israel, during the reigns of David and Solomon—after the secession of the ten tribes, it was the capital of the kingdom of Judah, but during the time of our Saviour, and until the subversion of the Jewish polity, it was the metropolis of Palestine. It was captured four times, without being demolished—and it was first entirely destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, and again by the emperor Titus, the repeated insurrections of the turbulent Jews having filled up the measure of their iniquities, and drawn down upon them the implacable vengeance of the Romans. His camp was pitched upon the mount of Olives,—the very spot from which its destruction had been foretold by our Saviour, when he stood and wept over it. Titus ineffectually endeavoured to save the temple: it was involved in the same ruin with the rest of the city, and after it had been reduced to ashes, its foundations were ploughed up by the Roman soldiers.—Thus, literally was fulfilled the prediction, that not one stone should be left upon another that should not be thrown down. The emperor Adrian, erected a city on a part of the former site of Jerusalem, which he called Aelia Capitolina—it was afterwards greatly enlarged by Constantine the Great, who restored its ancient name. During his reign, the Jews made various efforts to rebuild their temple, which, however, were always frustrated: nor did better success attend the attempt of the apostate emperor Julian. An earthquake, a whirlwind, and a fiery eruption, compelled the workmen to abandon their design.

From the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, to the present time, that city has remained for the most part, in a state of ruin and desolation, "and has never been under the government of the Jews themselves, but oppressed and broken down by a succession of foreign masters—the Romans, the Saracens, the Franks, the Mamelukes, and last by the Turks. It is not, therefore, only in the history of Josephus, and in other ancient writers, that we are to look for the accomplishment of our Lord's predictions;—we see them verified at this moment before our eyes, in the desolate state of the once celebrated city and temple of Jerusalem, and in the present condition of the Jewish people, not collected together into any one country, into one political society, and under one form of government, but dispersed over every region of the globe, and every where treated with contumely and scorn."—(Porteus.)

Imposing as the appearance of Jerusalem is, when viewed from the mount of Olives, by which it is commanded at the distance of a gun-shot,—and exhibiting a compactness of structure, like that alluded to by the Psalmist—the illusion vanishes on entering the town. No “streets of palaces and walks of state”—no high raised arches of triumph—no fountains to cool the air, or porticoes—not a single vestige meets the traveller, to announce its former greatness or opulence—but in place of these, he finds himself encompassed by walls of rude masonry, the dull uniformity of which is only broken by the occasional protrusion of a small grated window—“From the daughter of Zion all her beauty is departed.”

The population is, at present, estimated at 8 to 15,000.

FOR THE FRIEND.

TO BELIEVE—TO UNDERSTAND.

The perfection of good writing consists in arranging proper words in their proper places. This fitness of language and manner to the subject is the highest finish of composition, and must be studied by all who wish to make a lasting impression upon their readers. We are, therefore, very much indebted to those writers who have devoted themselves to studying the nice shades of meaning, which distinguish words nearly resembling each other. By analyzing the signification of these, bringing together the exact points of resemblance and exemplifying their distinctive use, these authors have rendered a great service to the student of language.

We have several such works in our own tongue, of which the most complete, is Crabb's English Synonyms, a book which should be in the study and at the side of all who aim at writing English with grace and precision.

But it is not merely for the sake of the finer shades and beauties of composition, that these researches are important to us.—They are essential to the acquirement of clear ideas upon some of the most important of human concerns. Many an angry controversy would have been avoided if the disputants had understood each other's definitions. Many a mighty fabric of theory would never have been built, had the theorist been aware, that clear ideas would have destroyed the very foundation on which it rests.

I have fallen into this train of thought from having accidentally turned in the book I have cited to the words prefixed to this essay.* The clear distinction which is there

* Belief, Credit, Trust, Faith.

Belief is the generic term, the others specific. Every thing is the subject of belief which produces one's assent; the events of human life are credited upon the authority of the narrator; the words, promises, or integrity of individuals, are trusted; the power of persons and the virtue of things are objects of faith.

Belief, trust, and faith have a religious application which credit has not. Belief is simply an act of the understanding; trust and faith are active moving principles of the mind in which the heart is concerned. Belief does not extend beyond the assent of the mind to any given proposition; trust and faith are lively sentiments, which impel to action. Belief is to trust and faith, as cause to effect; there may be belief without either trust or faith; but there can be no trust or faith without belief; we believe drawn between them, furnishes a complete refutation of one of the most popular maxims of the present day—“that we are not bound to believe—that we cannot believe what we do not understand.”

The readers of the Friend will not, I hope, think a column or two badly occupied in discussing this subject.

Belief is the assent of the mind, founded upon evidence—either of our own senses or of competent witnesses. In order to induce a belief of any statement, nothing more is required than full proof of the competency of the witness; for the mind can then do no other than receive his testimony. For although evidence of the highest degree of probability may deceive us; yet that which is clearly indubitable, cannot vary in its testimony from the true nature of things, and must therefore be implicitly received.

The evidence of the senses, subject to certain well understood and defined limitations, is of this kind. Facts repeatedly observed—such for instance as the polarity of the magnet, can never be doubted, and it would be absurd in us to suspend our belief in them, until we should be able to understand them. To say that we understand the science of magnetism, means simply, that having observed certain invariable facts in relation to magnets, we apply them to the explanation of other facts more complicated or remote; and thus by bringing our observations of separate detached facts together, we perceive certain general laws and relations which subsist: but, which are, as to their nature, cause, and mode of operation, as incomprehensible as the single insulated fact of the polarity of the magnet.

We understand the mechanism of a watch, because we perceive the manner in which the tension of the main spring on the one hand, and of the hair spring of the balance wheel on the other, sets the wheels in motion, and how that motion is communicated, accelerated, or retarded from wheel to wheel, till it is given to the hour and minute hand of the instrument, and the purpose for which the whole was constructed is answered. Of the ultimate laws of motion, which govern this mechanism, we have a full and perfect belief, founded upon the evidence of our sen-that there is a God, who is the Creator and preserver of all his creatures; we therefore trust in him for his protection of ourselves: we believe that Jesus Christ died for the sins of men; we have therefore faith in his redeeming grace to save us from our sins. True faith must be grounded on a right belief and accompanied with a right practice.

To Conceive, Understand, Comprehend.

Conception is the simplest operation of the three; when we conceive we may have but one idea; when we understand or comprehend we have all the ideas which this subject is capable of presenting.

So long as we have reasons sufficient to conceive a thing as possible or probable, it is not necessary either to understand or comprehend them, in order to authorize our belief. The mysteries of our holy religion are objects of conception, not of comprehension. We conceive that a thing may be done without understanding how it is done; we conceive that a thing may exist, without comprehending the nature of its existence. We conceive clearly, understand fully, comprehend minutely.

Crabb's Synonyms.

ses. Why, or how they are, what they are, we must for ever remain ignorant. Of the mechanism of the watch itself, constructed upon the faith that those ultimate laws will continue to operate, we have a full and perfect understanding; for we know why and how, it is what it is.

This is the clear and unerring line of distinction between belief and understanding. They are different operations or states of the mind, as distinct from each other as memory from imagination. The conclusion at which we thus arrive, is, that in strict philosophical language, the terms belief and understanding refer to objects widely differing from each other; and that all human knowledge being the result of observation and experiment, rests upon certain ultimate facts of which we have a full and perfect belief without the slightest possibility of ever understanding them.

If the false position which I have cited, were a mere play upon words, it would be unworthy of a serious refutation; but it has been brought to bear upon theological controversy, with the design of overturning certain doctrines; and among others those of the divinity of Christ and the efficacy of his atoning sacrifice. The argument—ex absurdo—from the absurdity of the thing has been used: how could the fulness of the Infinite Divinity dwell in Christ? how could the offering upon the cross propitiate for sin? the death of the one righteous for the whole world? How can the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit be the one God?

These doctrine are no more within the reach of the human comprehension than the nature of magnetism or of animal life. They are, like the ultimate facts of the sciences I have enumerated, the proper objects of belief; and if the evidence which we have for their reality is indubitable, we may, as I have said before, rest assured, that they are conformable to the true nature of things, however incompetent our finite faculties may be to comprehend them in their various relations to other truths.

This train of reasoning will enable us satisfactorily to settle the true boundaries of the province of human reason in matters of faith. These are the same as in natural and physical science. All our knowledge of the physical world is drawn from the evidence of the senses. All our knowledge of the spiritual world—of the ways of God with man, is drawn from the Revelation of his Holy Spirit. The one and the other constitute the basis of all that men can know, and his great business in both is, carefully to examine if the witness be true, and then, humbly and faithfully to receive its report. We believe that this revelation is vouchsafed in degree to all who came to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Christ Jesus. Of the same revelation the Holy Scriptures are an authentic and indubitable record. What they clearly testify, is as justly and properly, as fully and perfectly an object of belief, as any of the great truths in physical science; as the mysterious sympathy of the magnet or the perpetual miracle of animal life. When philosophers leave this, the only safe and certain path of knowledge, they may form theories and build up systems, but they are making no advances in the acquisition of truth. If men, instead of searching the Holy Scriptures for proofs, each one, of his own system—would proceed like sound philosophers—lay aside every previous theory and prejudice—consult the volume with an humble and willing heart, and an open ear; the points of belief to which I have alluded, instead of being as now the objects of bitter contention and attack, would become the most settled articles of faith. For, assuredly, if there are any great truths more than others, sealed in the conviction of all true believers—if there are any doctrines, more than others, written as it were in sunbeams on every page of Scripture, they are these, "The word was made flesh and dwelt amongst men."—"Christ died for our sins;" "who his own self bare our sins in his body on the tree, that we being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness." **

FOR THE FRIEND.

The primitive Quakers were distinguished for the consistency of their lives and doctrine; and in no part of the society was this more apparent than amongst the members in Ireland. Animated with an ardent zeal for the diffusion of evangelical righteousness, they illustrated their christian principles, not only in patiently enduring cruelty and reproach, but also by their strict integrity and regard to truth—by their simple habits, their contempt of all worldly aggrandizement, and in the fervency of their devotion to God and love to their fellow men. Their respect, for the advice of their brethren, and their earnest desire to act conformably with the sanctity and simplicity of their religion, as exhibited in the subjoined extract from an epistle issued by Leinster Province Meeting in 1698, presents an affecting contrast with the love of wealth and grandeur, and that independency of counsel too much existing in the society at the present day.

"Now we being at our Province Meeting, and great appearance of Friends, both men and women, and the mighty power of the Lord amongst us; under a weighty sense thereof, the affairs of the Church were managed in great unity, peace and concord. And under this heavenly canopy of the Lord's ancient goodness, a weighty concern came upon our spirits, as at other times on the like occasion, concerning the bounds and limits of getting and the right using the lawful things of this world, and how far friends might safely go into them. Much time being spent in church affairs to good purpose and satisfaction, the meeting adjourned till the next day; and after the meeting for the worship of God was over, then men friends and ancient concerned women, met to consider of this weighty matter. And accordingly, friends met and sat down in great silence, retired to the Lord for his aid and counsel, and the Lord was pleased to appear, and his power was great through his Spirit to our comfort; and many hearts were melted before him, because of the weight of his goodness which bowed all spirits. And many heavenly things were opened in the testimony of Jesus, concerning the bounds and right use of the lawful things of this world; and the demonstration of the spirit and power of Christ then abounding amongst us, and governing our assembly and guiding our hearts and understanding, unanimously it was agreed and adjudged, that a competency of the lawful things of this world is sufficient for every one, and is the right bounds, with a due consideration of every one's charge, station, place, and service. And that mind which will not be content with this, bears the character of covetousness, and renders such unfit to rule in the church of Christ. And there was an unanimous consent, one by one, to offer up ourselves to the judgment of the Province Meeting, or other approved elders, as the Province Meeting shall think fit; if in any thing we do exceed these bounds, that Truth may bound in us, that hath all power in heaven and earth. And in subjection one to another in our possessions, holdings, callings, trading and dealing amongst men, not to be our own judges, or walk in the light of our own eyes, considering the wise man's saying, That every man's cause is good in his own eyes; but his neighbour finds him out, and in the multitude of counsel is safety.

"Not that we intend to deprive any of the moderate and lawful use of the things of this world, or to take from any man his possessions, or to invade and take away property, but to bring all things into right bounds, and set them in their right places, that so none may be guilty of the great sin of abusing the Lord's mercies, but might use and enjoy them to his honour; that in so doing, they may have his peace and blessing, which, indeed, is the true comfort of all enjoyments. Thus shall we give evident testimony to the world by our moderation, even in the lawful things, that we are true followers of the Lord Jesus Christ in a self-denying life. And thus as help-meets together in the Lord Jesus, we may be as saviours on Mount Zion, building up one another in our most precious faith, and in our heavenly possession in Christ Jesus, over our greedy gain, greatness, and vain glory of the world, and perishing fading things thereof, that soon come to an end. Here the rich man will not glory in his riches, but see the danger of them, and not lay hold of opportunities to heap up more, to make himself and posterity great in the world; but rather endeavour to lessen, that with more ease and cheerfulness, he may serve God and his generation with what he hath, with all his might; being glad of every opportunity that presents, that he may do good, and be rich in good works, considering he is a steward, and his time uncertain in what he enjoys, and that he must be accountable to the Lord of all, for all things he possesses under him. Under the like consideration, the mean man will be glad that he is free from any temptations and snares, that the rich in this world are liable to fall into, and pierce themselves with many sorrows and hurtful lusts; and bless the Lord for what he enjoys, not wanting food and raiment, with which he is well content and easy in his mind, that is towards the Lord; and seeks not from place to place, and from one country to another, in a covetous mind to heap up riches; but looks to the Lord with an eye of faith, to receive counsel from him in his undertakings, and dare not go beyond his limits, nor without his countenance; and all murmuring, repining and unbelief is kept out of the camp."

Rutley's Rise and Progress.

FOR THE FRIEND.

I am greatly mistaken if the short article in the third number of "The Friend," respecting W. Savery, had not the effect to awaken sensations and recollections of a very tender nature, in the minds of many, in and near this city, with whom his memory is yet precious,—associated as it is, with much of all that is good, amiable and attractive in the man—with humility and fervent charity—pious zeal, tempered by liberality in the Christian. Even now, after a lapse of more than twenty years, since his being numbered with "the generations of the just," I can distinctly call to mind his manly and engaging exterior—his expressive countenance, in which was blended in rare assemblage, whatever is interesting, bland, and conciliatory in the human physiognomy—his simple and unaffected, yet courteous and dignified manners, exhibiting to the best advantage, conversational powers, at once instructive and fascinating to the young, and listened to with deference by those of riper years. I can almost fancy that I now see him, in the exercise of his high functions as "legate of the skies," his bosom warmed and expanded with the love of the gospel, and with hands stretched out, pleading the cause of the Redeemer. Now expatiating "large and high," on themes of deepest import to man, and with a power of persuasion, seldom surpassed, producing in the minds of those who, with Pilate, inquire "what is truth?" a similar acknowledgment to that of king Agrippa to Paul, "thou almost persuadest me to be a Christian."—Now in language touching and solemnizing, holding forth the promises of the gospel—the fleeting and unsubstantial nature of the things of time, and the transcendent excellency and glories of eternity, contriting the hearts of the humble, and melting into tenderness the youthful and the gay. So truly catholic were his views—so diffusive his benevolence—his ardour for the good of souls so unbounded, that they were not limited by any regard to nation or colour, sect or condition; and in return, such was the endearing estimation in which he was held by all classes of the community, in this his native city, and more especially within the Northern Liberties, where, during the greater part of his useful life, was the place of his residence, that it would not be easy to refer to a case, in application to which, this might be said to an equal extent.

At a time, therefore, like the present, of so much unsettlement in opinion, on points of the greatest moment, one might reasonably conclude, that the ascertained opinions of such a man, on the great leading doctrines of christianity, would be listened to with particular interest. The allusion to Dr. Priestly, in the article to which I have referred, and to his well known Socinian principles—and in the appended extract of a letter from W. Savery, the reference made to H. Barnard; taking also into consideration, the manner in which the latter individual was connected, with events of that period in relation to Friends of England and Ireland, clearly evince, that the sentiments therein expressed, have as forcible an application to the unhappy state of things existing among Friends here, as to the circumstances to which they particularly allude—for it is susceptible of an easy demonstration, that the opinions of Elias Hicks, and his adherents, with the exception of some wild and anomalous notions, in which they decidedly go beyond their prototypes, approximate very nearly to those of Priestly—of H. Barnard, and her coadjutors.

But if, 'as was certainly the truth, W. Savery possessed an expansive and liberal mind,—it is equally certain, from the affecting, solemn, clear, and unequivocal language of both the extracts, that he was sound in the faith—he was no Arian, and that his doctrinal views were totally at variance with the opinions inculcated then by H. Barnard, and now by Elias Hicks.

I would, therefore, recommend that the extracts be read together and compared:—may they be deeply pondered. S. R.

Extract of a letter from William Savery, to a Friend near London.—1801.

Many of my friends in an about London, are very often sweetly in my remembrance, and of latter times you have had my near sympathy, under your divers trials. But nothing has been more exercising to me than the concern my countrywoman, Hannah Barnard, has occasioned in the church. I look forward to your Yearly Meeting, as a time that will require the whole armour of light to be sought for, as much as at almost any preceding period. Yet cannot doubt of the kind care of the Shepherd of Israel over you, who has long blessed Friends of your nation many ways, and will be in every needful time, a spirit of judgment to those that sit in judgment, and strength to those that turn the battle to the gate. The longer I live, the more unshaken confidence I think I obtain, that the doctrines laid down by Robert Barclay and our first friends, founded on the New Testament, and still maintained by the society at large, are invulnerable to the efforts of vain philosophy, sophistry, and curious speculation, so long as we retain a belief in that most excellent of Books, and am of the mind, that all such as depart from the foundation, will wither and be confounded.

To the Editor of the Friend.

“DOCTRINES held by one part of the Society, and which we believe to be sound and edifying, are pronounced by the other part, to be unsound and spurious. FROM THIS has resulted a state of things that has proved destructive of peace and tranquillity, and in which the fruits of love and condescension have been blasted, and the comforts and enjoyments even of social intercourse, greatly diminished.”—Green-street Epistle of the 4th month.

I have been much gratified and instructed by the perusal of the valuable and interesting document, inserted in the last number of the Friend, entitled “A testimony and Epistle of Indiana Yearly Meeting.”—This portion of the society have done a noble act—praiseworthy to themselves, and beneficial to the cause of pure christianity—they certainly deserve well of their brethren in every part of the world; and also of the christian community generally, inasmuch as they subserve a cause which is common to all denominations of believers, and precious to every sincere and humble disciple of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

From the time that my attention was first turned to inquire into the nature of the controversy which for some time past, has existed in the Society of Friends, I have been fully satisfied, that whatever attempts might be made to conceal it, the true cause of all the existing difficulties, is a radical difference of opinion on the fundamental doctrines of the christian religion. Many other questions have been agitated, and discussed with much warmth and zeal, and loud complaints made, of bigotry, intolerance, oppression, and assumed prerogative; but a little examination must convince every dispassionate observer, that all these spring from the same root—they are all collateral branches arising from one common stock—and owing their existence to doctrinal differences. In like manner, whatever means might be resorted to, in order to sound the opinions of a friend, relative to the existing dispute, they finally and invariably resulted in the query, “Dost thou unite with Elias Hicks and his doctrines?”

The initiated members of the new sect, (for their recent separation from the original stock, entitles them to this appellation) are fully aware of the truth of this statement; and some of the more candid among them are frank enough to avow the fact. This is obvious from the quotation from their epistle of the 4th month, placed at the head of this article, as well as from verbal acknowledgments which they sometimes make.

It being admitted therefore on all hands, that Doctrines form the subject matter of the controversy, which has now eventuated in the separation and formation of a new sect; it becomes highly important to ascertain correctly what the disputed doctrines are, and to point out with clearness the difference which exists between the sentiments held by the society of Friends, from the beginning down to the present period; and those which Elias Hicks and his followers advocate. In this view, I consider the Indiana Epistle highly important.

In conducting an examination of the kind I allude to, it is certainly a favourable circumstance that so many of the sermons of Elias Hicks and his followers, have been brought before the public in a printed form; however we may regret that the erroneous opinions they contain, should thus be perpetuated, and spread among the reading part of the community. These sermons have all been published under the avowed patronage and approbation of his adherents. The first two volumes of them, and the periodical work miscalled “The Quaker,” have received their cordial support and sanction—have been widely disseminated by them, and their pages defended by some of their preachers. It will, therefore, be entirely fair, I apprehend, to assume these works, as a true exposition of their doctrines and belief. The epistle from Indiana, and the extracts from the sermons prefixed to it, exhibit some of the opinions of Elias Hicks in a clear light; and the evidence in support of them might be multiplied almost to a volume.

In perusing the pages of the Quaker, I have been struck with the coincidence of sentiment and design, which is apparent throughout all the sermons. The preachers of the new sect, all aim at the same object. Some of the sermons, it is true, are more guarded in the avowal of their peculiar tenets—and some evince a wily cautiousness of expression, as though the speaker wished to test the feeling and tone of his audience, and ascertain how far it would be safe to go. One great object, however, is clearly apparent in them all; this is to lessen Christ Jesus in his outward appearance at Jerusalem; to preach up the light within, in opposition to the proper divinity of our blessed Lord, and to the entire seclusion of all that he did and suffered for us in the flesh;—and to lessen the authority and importance of the Holy Scriptures.

I am aware that some of the preachers display much ingenuity in disguising these views; and wrap them in a garb of mysticism and scriptural phraseology, which may easily deceive the unwary and credulous; but strip them of gloss and embellishment, and it will be found that their printed discourses all bear upon the same point, and tend to the same conclusion. They are predicted upon the same notion, that the outward manifestation of the adorable Son of God, and the revelation contained in the sacred records, belong to other times and concern other generations, long since passed way;—that they affect us in no other way, than as they afford an example of sound moral principles, and consistent and virtuous lives; to equal or transcend which, (according to the new school) it is only necessary for us to follow the guidance of the light within.

The doctrine of the universality and efficacy of the grace of God, has always been believed by the Society of Friends, and continues to be unspeakably precious to every consistent and faithful member of it. But there is a remarkable difference between the doctrine as held and preached by Friends, and the new modification of it promulgated by E. Hicks and his followers. Fox, Penn, Barclay, and their worthy coadjutors declared, that the Spirit of Christ which they obeyed and preached, taught them to believe in his outward coming, and to acknowledge with humble gratitude all that he had done for us in the flesh, as well as sincerely to believe all that is recorded in the Holy Scripture. It taught them to own Jesus Christ who was conceived by the Holy Ghost and born of the Virgin Mary, as their Redeemer and Saviour, and to have living faith in Him, both as he is God, and as he is man. They declared, moreover, that the manifestation of the Spirit was given to them only mediately and by measure; whereas the Holy Ghost dwelt in the Lord Jesus, immediately and in all the glorious fulness of the eternal Godhead. Thus Barclay, after speaking of the indwelling grace, remarks—

“By this as we do not at all intend to equal ourselves to that holy man the Lord Jesus Christ, who was born of the Virgin Mary, in whom all the fullness of the Godhead dwelt bodily; so neither do we destroy the reality of his present existence, as some have falsely calumniated us. For though we affirm that Christ dwells in us, yet not immediately but mediately, as he is in that seed which is in us, whereas He, to wit, the Eternal Word, which was with God and was God, dwelt immediately in that holy man. He then is as the head and we as the members—he the vine, and we the branches.”

“Hence he is fitly called the Mediator betwixt God and man: for having been with God from all eternity, being himself God, and also in time partaking of the nature of man; through him, is the goodness and love of God conveyed to mankind, and by him again, man receiveth and partaketh of these mercies.”

“We do not hereby intend any ways, to lessen or derogate from the atonement and sacrifice of Jesus Christ, but, on the contrary, do magnify and exalt it. For, as we believe all these things to have been certainly transacted, which are recorded in the Holy Scriptures, concerning the birth, life, miracles, sufferings, resurrection, and ascension, of Christ, so we do also believe that it is the duty of every one to believe it, to whom it pleases God to reveal the same, and to bring to them the knowledge of it: yea, we believe it were damnable unbelief not to believe it, when so declared; but to resist that holy seed, which as minded, would lead and incline every one to believe it, as it is offered unto them, though it revealeth not in every one, the outward and explicit knowledge of it, nevertheless, it always assevereth to it, where it is declared."

These sentiments are fully confirmed by the principal early writers in the society, who also positively asserted, to use the language of Penn, that "they never said, that every divine illumination or manifestation of Christ in the hearts of men, was whole God, Christ or the Spirit—which might render them guilty of that gross and blasphemous absurdity, some would fasten upon them."

The doctrine of the light within, as it is held by Elias Hicks and his followers, is totally different from this—and leads to consequences destructive of some of the primary articles of Christian faith. In my future communications, I shall prove these positions, by extracts from the sermons and the Berean, and, I trust, shall be able to show clearly, that the true cause of the separation is a dissent from the doctrines of Friends; and that the complaint which some of the new sect so often reiterate of being deprived of their liberties, means only that liberty which Barclay alludes to, where he speaks of "giving a liberty to the inconstant and giddy will of man, to innovate, alter and overturn the doctrine of Christ and his apostles, at his pleasure."

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH, 17, 1827.

It has been intimated to us, that some of the more cautious among our subscribers, have expressed themselves not entirely satisfied with those parts of our sentiments, respecting the conduct of the separatists, in which certain rough expressions are quoted. We respect the spirit of forbearance, in which, no doubt, this timidity has its origin, and hope to be governed by it ourselves, so far as that it may not interfere with the development of facts necessary to a full exposition of the points at issue. Instead of the statements given, being liable to the charge of exaggeration, we can assure our readers, that much has been suppressed, partly within the compass of our own observation, and in part founded upon authority the most unquestionable, a narrative of which we should regret to see publicly exhibited. "The tree is known by its fruit," remains to be a safe and standard criterion. So far as is expedient to show the character and complexion of the present secession, we propose to proceed honestly in the promulgation of facts. Beyond this, having no motive, and it being altogether repugnant to our feelings to engage in it, we shall forbear. At the same time, we are free to say, that in the exhibition of the disorderly conduct which has marked the progress of this dividing spirit, we are by no means inclined to involve all the adherents of Elias Hicks, in one indiscriminate censure;—among them are some with whom we have been united in bonds of sweetest amity, and for whom we have still a very particular regard, and there are many that must have revolted at the gross infringement of all that is due to courtesy—of the respect we owe to age—and must we add—at the irreverence, approaching to profanity, displayed on various occasions. But in granting this exemption, we may be permitted to remark, that it is among the many problems presented by the existing state of things, which we have found extremely difficult of solution, that persons of the description last referred to, can so readily resign themselves to an amalgamation with a mass of so much incongruity and misrule.

It may be proper for a right understanding of the case, that in the account of proceedings at Darby, reference was had to two meetings.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Of the "Lines on my Birth-day," inserted in the present No., an apology is due for an attempt to alter, in two or three places, which had the author have taken time for revision, would no doubt have been better done. We shall be pleased to have further contributions from the same quarter.

Marian has met with a welcome reception, but came too late for the present No.

Several other communications have been recently received, which will be duly attended to. We wish it to be considered as a rule, that whatever is offered to us for publication, relative to the present differences, the name of the writer be intimated, confidentially, to the Editor; and generally, in reference to contributions for this paper, it may be proper to observe, that the materials for the current week, are chiefly arranged and placed in the hands of the printer, in the early part of it.

FOR THE FRIEND.

LINES ON MY BIRTH-DAY.—1827.

Another year has fled—and Time
Another tally gives my score;
Let Retrospection then incline
Her glass, and by-gone scenes explore,
And sketch the memory of the dead,
The character of days now fled!
How pass'd the fleeting year? Can trace
Of good be found for good bestow'd?
Have I improv'd in works of grace,
And travell'd in the heavenly road?
Or has the earthly part had away,
And did I Passion's will obey?

As from this eminence I look,
How many errors rise to view!
Yonder, I duty's path forsook,
And, there, I from the Cross withdrew,—
Here, I but granted half my heart,
Like Ananias, kept a part!

How 'scap'd I the enticing snares,
That ev'ry hour beset the road?
The adder's nest—the lions' lairs—
The ravenous vulture's dread abode?
How, weak and feeble, pass'd I through Dangers, that sicken in review?

A hand invisible uprais'd,
When weak and faint I else had fell:—
Strength came when, troubled and amaz'd,
My bosom did with anguish swell,—
And, as my feet approach'd the snare,
A viewless something sigh'd, beware!

But oh! how often have I strove
To drown this "still small voice's" sway;
To hear not messages of love;
Or, hearing, dar'd to disobey!
And yet—my soul abased be—
Mercy has interfer'd for thee!

Had Justice held alone the sword,
Nor Mercy rais'd the suppliant eye—
Had He, of Calvary ador'd,
Not deign'd for sinful man to die—
Had I on self-wrought deeds have stood—
(A feather to withstand a flood,)

Lost in the overwhelming charge,
To ruin dread I had been driven,
Cloud-tost had been my fragile barge,
Or on the hidden rocks been riven,
And every hope, and every care,
Had been engulf'd in black despair!

But He who gave himself for all,
A light athwart the gloom appear'd;
He bade the angry billows fall,
And darkness into promise cheer'd:—
And I, poor worm, am left to own
His goodness sav'd—and that alone!

Then let me on my natal day,
Cautious, henceforth resolve to tread
Within the Christian's "narrow way,"
Where Christ supplies the "daily bread:"
Life's gilded toys not worth the strife,
He has alone "eternal life."

SELECTED POETRY.

The two following beautiful productions we copy from the first number of the "Religious Magazine, or Spirit of the Foreign Theological Journals and Reviews," a new periodical, published by E. Littell, of this city.

HEAVEN.

Heaven is the land where troubles cease,
Where toils and tears are o'er;
The sunny clime of rest and peace,
Where cares distract no more,
And not the shadow of distress
Dims its unsullied blessedness.

Heaven is the home where spirits dwell
Who wander'd here awhile,
And "seeing things invisible,"
Departed with a smile
To hail, amid æpulchral night,
The morning of eternal light.

Heaven is the everlasting throne,
Where angels veil their sight;
Whence He—the high and holy One
Throughout those realms of light
Diffuses by one thrilling glance
The glory of his countenance.

Heaven is the place where Jesus lives
To plead his dying blood,
While to his prayers the Father gives
An unknown multitude,
Whose harps and tongues, through endless days,
Shall crown his head with songs of praise.

Heaven is the temple whither prayer
From saints on earth ascends;
The dwelling of the Spirit, whence
His influence descends
Like heavenly dew, to cheer and bless
His children in the wilderness.

Heaven is the dwelling-place of joy,
The home of light and love,
Where faith and hope in rapture die,
—And ransomed souls, above
Drink in, beside the eternal throne,
Bliss everlasting and unknown. W. S. M.

CHRIST STILLING THE TEMPEST.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

"But the ship was now in the midst of the sea, tossed with waves, for the wind was contrary."
St. Matthew, Chap. xiv. ver. 24.

Fear was within the tossing bark,
When stormy winds grew loud,
And waves came rolling high and dark,
And the tall mast was bowed.

And men stood breathless in their dread,
And baffled in their skill—
But One was there, who rose and said
To the wild sea, be still!

And the wind ceased—it ceased—that word
Passed through the gloomy sky;
The troubled billows knew their Lord,
And sank beneath his eye.

And slumber settled on the deep,
And silence on the blast,
As when the righteous falls asleep,
When death's fierce throes are past.

Thou that didst rule the angry hour,
And tame the tempest's mood,
Oh! send thy Spirit forth in power,
O'er our dark souls to brood!

Thou that didst bow the billow's pride,
Thy mandates to fulfil,—
So speak to passion's raging tide,
Speak and say,—Peace, be still!

United States' Circuit Court, Nov. 12.

Reuben Moses, convicted of counterfeiting the notes of the United States Bank, was sentenced to an imprisonment of thirteen years; and his accomplice, John W. Craig, to an imprisonment of sixteen years.

A Cincinnati account of the 2d inst. mentions, that nearly forty miles of the Miami canal are now navigable. Boats had commenced running from Middletown to Howell's basin, within four miles of that city. The line is completed to Cincinnati, but it is not expected it will be opened for navigation, until spring.

A convention was held at New Lisbon (Ohio,) on the 2d day of October last, to take into consideration such means as may be found practicable to construct a canal by the route of Little Beaver and Sandy creeks, to connect the Ohio canal with the Pennsylvania canal—a large and respectable delegation appeared and took their seats. Among other measures adopted, a committee was appointed to draft memorials to the legislatures of Ohio and Pennsylvania, for an act of incorporation, with such powers and privileges as may be deemed necessary.

A singular trial took place at the late term of the supreme court of Burke county, (N. C.) A man, estimated to be worth two hundred thousand dollars, was indicted and convicted, for the crime of forgery; and what renders it more remarkable, the amount for which he thus made shipwreck of reputation, was only thirty dollars.

Good Example.—The citizens of Hagerstown, in Maryland, held a meeting on the 3d inst. for the purpose of making arrangements for planting trees on the sides of the turnpike road, from that place to Funkstown. This is a proof of good taste, as well as attention to the comfort of travellers, that deserves imitation.

From the New-York Courier.

Physic.—Doctor Wadd mentions a case of one Samuel Jessup, who died at the age of 65, in 1817. This man, in the course of 21 years, took 226,934 pills, and 40,000 bottles of mixture! He must have taken his pills instead of peas, with his dinner, by the spoonful, and swallowed his mixtures from champagne glasses. We never heard of so complete a walking apothecary's shop, as this same Samuel Jessup.

The American minister, A. Gallatin, had an interview with the Earl of Dudley, at the Foreign Office, on the 1st of October, whence the late rumour that he had embarked for the United States.

It is stated in Hamburg papers of 9mo. 29th, that the loss sustained by the town of Abo, by the late dreadful catastrophe, is estimated at no less than thirteen millions of rix dollars. A dreadful fire took place at Shevelin, near Elberfeld, on the 22d, forty houses were destroyed.

Union of the Atlantic and the Sea.—The project of uniting the Rhine and the Danube, which was conceived and even commenced by Charlemagne, and submitted by General Dessoles to the attention of Bonaparte, when First Consul, is now reviving on the Continent. By the assistance of canals, a water communication would be opened, by the accomplishment of this project, between the countries of France, Germany, Holland, &c. and Persia, by means of canals between the Black Sea and the Caspian.—New Literary Gazette.

Rivalry.—The competition between the rival steam-boats, which ply between England and Ireland, is so great, that recently numbers of Irish labourers, returning from the great harvest, were conveyed from Liverpool to Newry, a distance of two hundred miles, for three pence each, and in some cases, three were taken for six pence.

A late manifesto of the Emperor of Russia, orders a general levy of recruits in the whole empire of two in every 500 inhabitants, not excepting the Jews, who have formerly been exempt on payment of a pecuniary tax. This levy, it is supposed, will produce a force of at least 150,000 men.

Horticulture.—In perusing some late Horticultural productions from England, a friend selected the following items for the National Intelligencer:

Mr. Johnson, of Essex, has experienced the most decided advantage in using salt as an horticultural manure, particularly for bulbous flowers generally, and all kinds of Cape bulbs. He has proved that seedling tulip bulbs acquire their perfect colour sooner by the application of salt, which he also invariably uses as an ingredient in carnation compost, for the beauty of which flowers he is unrivalled. He uses a cubic inch of common salt to a square yard.

Conrad Loddige & Sons, nursery men, have, in their collection of plants, 1459 kinds of roses.

At Lawrence's tulip bed at Hampton, four bulbs of the Polyphemus tulip were sold for 50 guineas; and another gentleman was offered 100*l.* for one called Louis XVI. in May last.

If he who suffered to save us, had been in the smallest degree actuated by a vindictive spirit, it is difficult to conceive, how he could have wrung out the dregs of the cup of trembling, which he drank for our sakes; or, in the hour of extremity, have pleaded, as he did, for the forgiveness of his crucifiers.—Dilwyn's Reflections.

Minds deeply employed in metaphysical researches, may be compared to venturesome watermen, who sometimes try how much wind their skiffs will bear on the ocean, without oversetting.—Ibid.

Importunity in prayer may be too much mixed with impatience, for the mind to retain the distinction ever necessary to be made, between the suppliant, the boon requested, the benefactor, and the grant. A watchful, patient, filial dependence on the source of blessing, is of the nature of prayer; and cannot but be more acceptable to Him who seeth in secret, than the best form of words without it.—Ibid.

Those afflictions which have their proper effect, and humble us into true resignation, are like storms which drive, rightly directed vessels, onward to their designed port.—Ibid.

The great, in affliction, bear a countenance more princely than they were wont; for it is the temper of highest hearts, like the palm-tree, to strive upward, when it is most burdened.—Aphorisms, by Sir Philip Sidney.

A humble mind seldom exercises itself in great matters: its attention is to real requireing; and these relate, for the most part, to the day of small things.—Dilwyn's Reflections.

Much talk on religious subjects may be compared to great auctions, which are pretty sure indications of approaching bankruptcy.—Ibid.

As every degree of hatred, envy, or contempt, entertained in the mind, must unavoidably cut off its communication with Divine good; surely no one in that state can be a fit instrument or channel of conveying it to another.—Ibid.

We may be convinced by what passes in our minds, if we will but closely and dispassionately examine our motives to action, that mankind, in a state of nature, are universally governed by self-will; and this is not only in the gratification of their corrupt appetites, but even in the coercive restraints which, for mutual preservation, they impose upon each other. The perversity of the will is, indeed, the primary cause of defection and degeneracy in all moral agents: it is the strong man armed, that keeps the house; and, while he continues to possess it, all our endeavours are too much perverted by passion and prejudice, ever to reach the object we aim at; for, whatever our rational discoveries of religious and moral truth may be, it is the will that determines us to action—the resignation of the will is, therefore, the first step in true devotion:—hereby we escape from the influence of the passions, commend ourselves to Divine mercy, and enjoy peace; the presentations of good and evil are then distinguishable, and strength is received to reject the one, and cleave to the other.—Ibid.

Writings on religious subjects, serve the Christian traveller rather for the conviction of his understanding, than for the direction of his steps, and confirmation of his faith. They may promote outward fellowship and conformity, but a vital union of spirit, is only attained by attention and faithfulness to the principle of truth itself; hereby the members of the true Church, like the stones of the typical Temple, being prepared apart, exactly fit each other when brought together, and unite without jarring or noise.—Ibid.

CHIEF JUSTICE TILGHMAN.

Concluded.

The temper of the Chief Justice was singularly placable and benevolent. It was not in his power to remember an injury. A few days before his death, he said to two of his friends, attendant upon that scene, "I am at peace with all the world. I bear no ill-will to any human being; and there is no person in existence, to whom I would not do good, and render a service, if it were in my power. No man can be happy who does not forgive injuries which he may have received from his fellow-creatures." How suitable was this noble conclusion to his exemplary life! What a grace did this spirit impart to his own supplications! This was not a counterfeit virtue, assumed when the power to retaliate was wasted by disease. It was not the mere overflow of a kindly nature, unschooled by that divine science which teaches benevolence as a duty. It was the virtue of one, who, in his eulogium upon his eminent friend Dr. Wistar, who had filled the chair of the Philosophical Society, thus made known the foundation on which his benevolence was built. "Vain is the splendour of genius, without the virtues of the heart. No man who is not good, deserves the name of wise. In the language of Scripture, folly and wickedness are the same; not only because vicious habits do really corrupt and darken the understanding, but because it is no small degree of folly to be ignorant, that the chief good of man is to know the will of his Creator, and to do it."

It was under the influence of this sentiment, that his fortune became a refuge to the unfortunate, far more extensively than his unostentatious manners imported. Notwithstanding the panoply which protected him from the assaults of this world, he was like the feeblest of his race, naked and defenceless against the dispensations of heaven. His bosom suffered many and deep lacerations; but they had the propitious effect of opening his heart to mankind, instead of withering and drying up its affections. He was gentle, compassionate, charitable in many of the senses that make charity the first of virtues; and long after his leaves and branches were all torn away, there was more than one that reposed in the shade of his venerable trunk. His closing years finely illustrated the remark, that the heart of a good man is like a good soil, which is made more fertile by the ploughshare, that tears it and lays it open—or like those plants which give out their best odours when they are broken and crushed.

An interesting record which this venerable man has left behind him, acquaints us with many of his most private thoughts, and presents him in a relation which no man can renounce, and which, when duly observed, is the appropriate light wherein to behold an eminent judge—the relation of man to his Creator.

His birth day, the 12th of August, was habitually appropriated to the review of the past year, to self-examination, and to intercourse with God; and it will not be deemed irreverent in us, the only children he has left, to cast an affectionate eye upon this record, and to draw encouragement and counsel, as well as increased veneration for his character, from the touching disclosure it makes of his fortitude, resignation, and piety.

The first of the series which has been found, begins on the 12th of August, 1804, when he completed his forty-eighth year. He says—"My health is good, my constitution unimpaired, but I am deeply impressed with the uncertainty of life. Let me prepare to follow the numerous friends who have left this world before me."—"The last stage of my residence on earth is approaching. Time is precious. I must not suffer it to be wasted in indolence, or thrown away on light amusements. I have endeavoured during the course of this day to strengthen my mind with virtuous resolutions, and I hope my endeavours have not been useless." He then repeats the resolutions he had formed for the government of his life, among which is that of "letting no day pass without prostrating himself before the Supreme Being, in meditation, thanksgiving, and prayer;" and he concludes his memorial, by offering, as he expresses it, "with a grateful heart, his unworthy thanks to the almighty and merciful God, for past favours, far exceeding his merits," and by "imploping, with all humility, that he would graciously assist his weak endeavours to keep the resolutions he had made."

He continues this review for several years, during which his strain is that of gratitude for constant benefactions: but in the year 1817, the clouds gathered around him, the countenance of his beneficent Creator seemed to be withdrawn, and the night of his old age was approaching, with the promise of but one feeble and ill-assured ray to relieve it from total darkness. He had been one of ten brothers and sisters, to all of whom he had borne the tenderest affection. He had been a husband, enjoying for a short time the happiness of that sacred relation. He had been the father of one child, devotedly loved for her intelligence, filial affection, and piety. Mark with what a celestial temper, if I may so speak, he records the flight of all these blessings. "I have now attained the age of sixty-one, and have survived parents, brothers, sisters, wife, and child. But few of my dearest connexions remain in this world. May this reflection induce me so to use the short remainder of my life, as may recommend me to thy favour, and procure me the happiness of once more meeting my departed friends, according to my confident hope. Lord, thou hast taken away the child which thou hadst given me. I murmur not. Blessed be thy name."

Before the 12th of August, 1820, that feeble ray which was promised to his declining days, was extinguished. The only child of his only daughter was taken from him. Yet observe, how the light of the divine philosophy shone inward, and dispelled the gloom in which unassisted man would have sunk to despair. "Great God, during the last year, thou hast thrown me on the bed of sickness, and raised me up from it. Thou hast taken from me my last earthly hope. I submit to thy providence, and pray that thou wilt grant me fortitude under all my afflictions. I am sure that whatever is ordained by thee is right. May I never forget that thou art always present, the witness and judge of my actions and thoughts. My life is hastening to an end. May I, by thy gracious assistance, so employ the remainder of it, as not to be altogether unworthy of thy favour."

On the last anniversary that he ever saw, he begins his paper with the prophetic declaration, "this day completes my seventieth year, the period which is said to bound the life of man. My constitution is impaired, but I cannot sufficiently thank God, that my intellects are sound, that I am afflicted with no painful disease, and that sufficient health remains to make life comfortable. I pray for the grace of the Almighty, to enable me to walk during the short remnant of life in his ways. Without his aid, I am sensible that my efforts are unavailing. May I submit with gratitude to all his dispensations, never forget that he is the witness of my actions and even of my thoughts, and endeavour to honour, love, and obey him, with all my heart, soul, and strength."

It is no longer wonderful that this venerated man performed his duties to universal acceptance, when we discern the spirit, better far than the genius of Socrates, from which he asked counsel. The ancients would have said of him, that he lived in the presence of all the deities, since prudence was never absent from him. The holders of a better faith must say, that it was to no poetical deity, nor to the counsels of his own mind, but to that "grace" which his supplications invoked, that he owed his protection from most of the lapses to which fallible man is subject.

That "remnant of life" to which his last memorial refers, unfortunately for us, was short as he had predicted; but he walked it as he had done all that went before, according to his devout aspiration. He continued to preside in the supreme court with his accustomed dignity and effect, until the succeeding winter, when his constitution finally gave way, and after a short confinement, on Monday, the 30th of April, 1827, he closed his eyes for ever. It will be long, very long, before we shall open ours, upon a wiser judge, a sounder lawyer, a riper scholar, a purer man, or a truer gentleman.

The private life of this eminent man, was the reflection of an unclouded mind, and of a conscience void of offence; and such external vicissitudes as marked it, did but ripen his virtues for their appropriate scene hereafter. The praise of his public career, is that it has been barren of those incidents which arrest the attention, by agitating the passions, of mankind. If it has grown into an unquestioned truth, that the poorest annals belong to those epochs which have been the richest in virtue and happiness, it may well be admitted that the best Judge for the people, is he who imperceptibly maintains them in their rights, and leaves few striking events for biography.

His course does not exhibit the magnificent variety of the ocean, sometimes uplifted to the skies, at others retiring into its darkest caves,—at one moment gay with the ensigns of power and wealth, and at another strewn its shores with the melancholy fragments of shipwreck;—but it is the equal current of a majestic river, which safely bears upon its bosom the riches of the land, and reads its history in the smiling cities and villages, that are reflected from its unvarying surface.

Such is the praise of the late Chief Justice Tilghman. He merited, by his public works and by his private virtues, the respect and affection of his countrymen; and the best wish for his country and his office is, that his mantle may have fallen upon his successor.

FOR THE FRIEND.

FIRST VOYAGE OF COLUMBUS.

In the year 1789, the King of Spain caused an examination to be made into all the public and private libraries in the kingdom, for materials from which to form a public library at Cadiz, relating to the Marine. In the course of this inquiry, the original manuscripts of the first and third voyages of Columbus were found in the archives of the Duke del Infantado.

Owing to the disturbed state of the kingdom, they were not made public till the year 1825, when they were printed at Madrid, with many other documents, in two volumes.

A translation of the narrative of the first voyage has just been printed in Boston, from which we have made the following extracts. Every thing relating to such a man and such a voyage, must interest Americans; and the more so, as this narrative enables us to correct the commonly received account of the voyage in several particulars. I shall take occasion to make further extracts and remarks hereafter upon this curious volume.

Columbus, as is well known, sailed from Cadiz on the 3d of the 8th month, 1492. I shall commence my extracts from the journal with the 9th of the following month. They had been obliged to put into the harbour of Gomera, in one of the Canary Islands, to repair, and sailed from there on the 6th. The manuscript is in the hand writing of Bartolome de las Casas, and is evidently an abridgment of the original journal of Columbus.

N.

"Sunday, Sept. 9th. Sailed this day nineteen leagues, and determined to count less than the true number, that the crew might not be dismayed if the voyage should prove long. In the night sailed one hundred and twenty miles, at the rate of ten miles an hour, which make thirty leagues. The sailors steered badly, causing the vessels to fall to leeward toward the Northeast, for which the Admiral reprimanded them repeatedly.

"Tuesday, Sept. 11th. Steered their course W. and sailed above twenty leagues; saw a large fragment of the mast of a vessel, apparently of a hundred and twenty tons, but could not pick it up. In the night sailed about twenty leagues, and reckoned only sixteen, for the cause above stated.

"Thursday, Sept. 13th. This day and night sailed W. thirty-three leagues, and reckoned three or four less. The currents were against them. At the first of the evening this day, the needles varied to the N. W. and the next morning about as much in the same direction.

"Saturday, Sept. 15th. Sailed day and night, W. twenty-seven leagues and more. In the beginning of the night saw a remarkable bolt of fire fall into the sea at the distance of four or five leagues.

"Sunday, Sept. 16th. Sailed day and night W. thirty-nine leagues, and reckoned only thirty-six. Some clouds arose and it drizzled. The Admiral here says that from this time they experienced very pleasant weather, and that the mornings were most delightful, wanting nothing but the melody of the nightingales. He compares the weather to that of Andalusia in April. Here they began to meet with large patches of weeds very green, and which appeared to have been recently washed away from the land; on which account they all judged themselves to be near some island,* though not a continent, according to the opinion of the Admiral, who says, 'the continent we shall find further ahead.'

"Monday, Sept. 17th. Steered W. and sailed day and night, above fifty leagues; wrote down only forty-seven; the current favoured them. They saw a great deal of weed, which proved to be rock-weed; it came from the W. and they met with it very frequently. They were of opinion that land was near. The pilots took the sun's amplitude, and found that the needles varied to the N. W. a whole point of the compass; the seamen were terrified and dismayed, without saying why. The Admiral discovered the cause, and ordered them to take the amplitude again the next morning, when they found that the needles were true; the cause was, that the star moved from its place, while the needles remained stationary.* At dawn they saw many more weeds, apparently river weeds, and among them a live crab, which the Admiral kept, and says that these are sure signs of land, being never found eighty leagues out at sea. They found the sea-water less salt since they left the Canaries, and the air more mild. They were all very cheerful, and strove which vessel should out sail the others, and be the first to discover land; they saw many tunnies, and the crew of the Nina killed one. The Admiral here says that these signs were from the west, 'where I hope that high God in whose hand is all victory, will speedily direct us to land.' This morning he says he saw a white bird called a water-wagtail, or tropic bird, which does not sleep at sea.

"Thursday, Sept. 20th. Steered W. by N. varying with alternate changes of the wind and calms; made seven or eight leagues progress. Two pelicans came on board, and afterwards another—a sign of the neighbourhood of land. Saw large quantities of weeds to day, though none were observed yesterday. Caught a bird similar to a grajao; it was a river and not a marine bird, with feet like those of a gull. Towards night two or three land birds came to the ship singing; they disappeared before sunrise. Afterwards saw a pelican coming from W. N. W. and flying to the S. W., an evidence of land to the westward, as these birds sleep on shore, and go to sea in the morning in search of food, never proceeding twenty leagues from the land.

"Friday, Sept. 21st. Most of the day calm, afterwards a little wind. Steered their course day and night, sailing less than thirteen leagues. In the morning found such abundance of weeds, that the ocean seemed to be covered with them; they came from the west. Saw a pelican; the sea smooth as a river, and the finest air in the world. Saw a whale, an indication of land, as they always keep near the coast.

"Saturday, Sept. 22d. Steered about W. N. W. varying their course, and making thirty leagues progress. Saw few weeds. Some pardelars† were seen, and another bird. The Admiral here says, 'this head wind was very necessary to me, for my crew had grown much alarmed, dreading that they never should meet in these seas with a fair wind to return to Spain.' Part of the day saw no weeds, afterwards great plenty of it.

"Sunday, Sept. 30th. Continued their course W. and sailed day and night in calms, fourteen leagues; reckoned eleven. Four tropic birds came to the ship, which is a very clear sign of land, for so many birds of one sort together, show that they are not straying about, having lost themselves. Twice, saw two pelicans; many weeds. The constellation called Las Guardias‡, which at evening appeared in a westerly direction, was seen in the N. E. the next morning, making no more progress in a night of nine hours; this was the case every night, as says the Admiral. At night the needles varied a point towards the N. W.; in the morning they were true, by which it appears that the polar star moves, like the others, and that the needles are always right.

"Monday, Oct. 1st. Continued their course W. and sailed twenty-five leagues; reckoned to the crew twenty. Experienced a heavy shower. The pilot of the Admiral began to fear this morning that they were five hundred and seventy-eight leagues West of the Island of Ferro. The short reckoning which the Admiral showed his crew, gave five hundred and eighty-four, but the true one which he kept to himself, was seven hundred and seven leagues.

"Sunday, Oct. 7th. Continued their course W. and sailed twelve miles an hour, for two hours, then eight miles an hour. Sailed till an hour after sunrise, twenty-three leagues; reckoned to the crew eighteen. At sunrise the caravel Nina, who kept ahead on account of her swiftness in sailing, while all the vessels were striving to outsail one another, and gain the reward promised by the King and Queen by first discovering land—hoisted a flag at her mast head, and fired a lombarda, as a signal that she had discovered land, for the Admiral had given orders to that effect. He had also ordered that the ships should keep in close company at sunrise and sunset, as the air was more favourable at those times for seeing at a distance. Towards evening seeing nothing of the land which the Nina had made signals for, and observing large flocks of birds coming from the N. and making for the SW. whereby it was rendered probable that they were either going to land to pass the night, or abandoning the countries of the North, on account of the approaching winter, he determined to alter his course, knowing also that the Portuguese had discovered most of the islands they possessed by attending to the flight of birds. The Admiral accordingly shifted his course from W. to WSW. with a resolution to continue two days in that direction. This was done about an hour after sunset. Sailed in the night nearly five leagues, and twenty-three in the day. In all twenty-eight.

"Monday, Oct. 8th. Steered WSW. and sailed day and night eleven or twelve leagues; at times during the night, fifteen miles an hour, if the account can be depended upon. Found the sea like the river at Seville, 'thanks to God,' says the Admiral. The air soft as that of Seville in April, and so fragrant that it was delicious to breathe it. The weeds appeared very fresh. Many land birds, one of which they took, flying towards the SW. also *grajao*s, ducks, and a pelican were seen.

"Tuesday, Oct. 9th. Sailed SW. five leagues when the wind changed, and they stood W. by N. four leagues. Sailed in the whole, day and night, twenty leagues and a half; reckoned to the crew seventeen. All night heard birds passing.

"Wednesday, Oct. 10th. Steered WSW. and sailed at times ten miles an hour, at others twelve, and at others, seven; day and night made fifty-nine leagues progress; reckoned to the crew forty-four. Here the men lost all patience, and complained of the length of the voyage, but the Admiral encouraged them in the best manner he could, representing the profits they were about to acquire, and adding that it was to no purpose to complain, having come so far, they had nothing to do but continue on to the Indies, till with the help of our Lord, they should arrive there.*

"Thursday, Oct. 11th. Steered WSW. and encountered a heavier sea than they had met with before on the whole voyage. Saw pardelas and a green rush near the vessel. The crew of the Pinta saw a cane and a log; they also picked up a stick which appeared to have been carved with an iron tool, a piece of cane, a plant which grows on land, and a board. The crew of the Nina saw other signs of land, and a stalk loaded with roseberries. These signs encouraged them, and they all grew cheerful. Sailed this day till sunset, twenty-seven leagues.

"After sunset steered their original course W. and sailed twelve miles an hour till two hours after mid-

* This period is near the date of the occurrence, which, on the authority of Oviedo, has been related in most of the modern accounts of the discovery—namely, that Columbus found himself so embarrassed and pressed by the mutiny of his crew, who were terrified at the length of the voyage, that he was obliged to enter into an agreement with them, that in case land should not be discovered within three days, he would abandon the enterprise, and return to Spain. Not the slightest hint of such a circumstance is to be found in this journal, nor is there any imaginable reason for the suppression of the fact by Columbus, had it really occurred. Las Casas certainly would not have omitted so important an item in making his abstract, and this was evidently drawn up from the diary of Columbus, written from day to day, and not from a narrative executed after his return to Spain, in which an omission of this sort might be more easily accounted for. Neither Herrera nor Don Fernando, who give very minute relations of the occurrences of the voyage, make any mention of it. Munoz adverts to the circumstance, but appears evidently inclined to disbelieve it. Robertson has admitted the account into his History, but it seems, upon the whole, not to be entitled to credit.

night, going ninety miles, which are twenty-two leagues and a half; and as the Pinta was the swiftest sailor, and kept ahead of the Admiral, she discovered land and made the signals which had been ordered. The land was first seen by a sailor called Rodrigo de Triana, although the Admiral at ten o'clock that evening standing on the quarter-deck saw a light, but so small a body that he could not affirm it to be land; calling to Pero Gutierrez, groom of the King's wardrobe, he told him he saw a light, and bid him look that way, which he did and saw it; he did the same to Rodrigo Sanchez of Segovia, whom the King and Queen had sent with the squadron as comptroller, but he was unable to see it from his situation. The Admiral again perceived it once or twice, appearing like the light of a wax candle moving up and down, which some thought an indication of land. But the Admiral held it for certain that land was near; for which reason, after they had said the Salve which the seamen are accustomed to repeat and chant after their fashion, the Admiral directed them to keep a strict watch upon the fore-castle and look out diligently for land, and to him who should first discover it he promised a silken jacket, besides the reward which the King and Queen had offered, which was an annuity of ten thousand maravedis.* At two o'clock in the morning, the land was discovered, at two leagues distance; they took in sail and remained under the square-sail lying to till day, which was Friday, when they found themselves near a small island, one of the Lucayos, called in the Indian language Guanahani. Presently they described people, naked, and the Admiral landed in the boat, which was armed, along with Martin Alonso Pinzon, and Vincent Yanez his brother, captain of the Nina.

* The reward for the discovery was adjudged by the king and queen to be justly due to Columbus, as he was the first who saw the light. The annuity of 10,000 maravedis was therefore punctually paid him through the rest of his life.

THE DEAD SOLDIER.

Voila la piece finie; allons souper.—CHARLES XII.

Thine was the death that many meet,
That many deem the best;
To lay them down at glory's feet
To their eternal rest—
For glory's glittering toy to rave,
And find the bauble in the grave!

What 'vails it were we barter life?
Whether upon the plain,
Amid the spirit-stirring strife,
Or on the stormy main?
On land or sea it is the same,
We die; and what to us is fame?

Why liest thou stiff and idle there,
Thy hand upon thy sword,
While rapine shouts upon the air
His fearful signal word?
Up, up! and join the gathering clan
Of human fiends that prey on man.

Up and away! the squadron'd horse
Approach in fierce array;
They'll mar thy poor dishonour'd corse,
And tread thy form away;
Madly o'er faint and dead they pour,
And hoof and fetlock smoke with gore.

Thou heed'st me not; thou hearest not
The trumpet echoing near;
And even the roaring cannon shot
Flies soundless by thine ear.
Thy leader shouts—away, away!
Ah, soldier! thou canst not obey!

An hour ago, thou wert all life,
With fiery soul and eye,

Rushing amid the kindling strife,
To do thy best, and die—
And now a gory mass of clay
Is stretch'd upon the warrior's way.

Why are those trappings on thy form?
The harness could not shield
Thy bosom from the iron storm
That hurtled o'er the field.
Men fled the terrors of thy brow—
The vulture does not fear thee now!

A thousand like thyself, ah me!
Are stretch'd upon the ground;
While the glad trump of victory
Is pealing round and round;
Hark, how the victors shout and cheer!
It matters not—the dead are here!

Arise! the Pzan rings aloud,
The battle field is won;
Up, up, and join the eager crowd,
Before the booty's done:
What—wilt not take the meed of toil,
Thy share of glory and of spoil?

Silent and grim, and sad to view,
Thou liest upon the plain;
To bleach or fester in the dew,
The sun, the winds, the rain:
What art thou now, poor luckless tool?
A murderer's mark, a tyrant's fool. H. D. B.

THE ALPS—A Reverie.

PART I.—DAY.

The mountains of this glorious land
Are conscious beings to mine eye,
When at the break of day they stand
Like giants, looking through the sky,
To hail the sun's unrisen car,
That gilds their diadems of snow;
While one by one, as star by star,
Their peaks in ether glow.

Their silent presence fills my soul,
When to the horizontal ray
The many-tinctured vapours roll
In evanescent wreaths away,
And leave them naked on the scene,
The emblems of eternity,
The same as they have ever been,
And shall for ever be.

Yet through the valley while I range,
Their cliffs, like images in dreams,
Colour, and shape, and station change;
Here crags and caverns, woods and streams,
And seas of adamant ice,
With gardens, vineyards, fields embraced,
Open a way to Paradise,
Through all the splendid waste.

The goats are hanging on the rocks,
Wide through their pastures roam the herds;
Peace on the uplands feeds her flocks,
Till suddenly the king of birds
Pouncing a lamb, they start for fear;
He bears his bleating prize on high;
The well known plaint his nestlings hear,
And raise a ravening cry.

The sun in morning freshness shines;
At noon behold his orb o'er-cast;
Hollow and dreary o'er the pines,
Like distant ocean, moans the blast;
The mountains darken at the sound,
Put on their armour, and anon,
In panoply of clouds wrapt round,
Their forms from sight are gone.

Hark! war in heaven!—the battle-shout
Of thunder rends the echoing air;
Lo! war in heaven!—thick flashing out
Through torrent-rains red lightnings glare;
As though the Alps, with mortal ire,
At once a thousand voices raised;
And with a thousand swords of fire
At once in conflict blazed.

PART II.—NIGHT.

Come, golden Evening, in the west
Enthroned the storm-dispelling sun,
And let the triple rainbow rest
O'er all the mountain tops;—'tis done;
The deluge ceases; bold and bright,
The rainbow shoots from hill to hill;
Down sinks the sun; on presses night;
—Mont Blanc is lovely still.

There take thy stand, my spirit;—spread
The world of shadows at thy feet;
And mark how calmly, over head,
The stars, like saints in glory, meet:
While hid in solitude sublime,
Methinks I muse on Nature's tomb,
And hear the passing foot of Time
Step through the gloom.

All in a moment, crash on crash,
From precipice to precipice,
An avalanche's ruins dash
Down to the nethermost abyss;
Invisible, the ear alone
Follows the uproar till it dies;
Echo on echo, groan for groan,
From deep to deep replies.

Silence again the darkness seals,—
Darkness that may be felt;—but soon
The silver-clouded east reveals
The midnight spectre of the moon;
In half-eclipse she lifts her horn,
Yet, o'er the host of heaven supreme,
Brings the faint semblance of a morn
With her awakening beam.

Ha! at her touch, these Alpine heights
Unreal mockeries appear;
With blacker shadows, ghastlier lights,
Enlarging as she climbs the sphere;
A crowd of apparitions pale!
I hold my breath in chill suspense,
—They seem so exquisitely frail,—
Lest they should vanish hence.

I breathe again, I freely breathe;
Lake of Geneva! thee I trace,
Like Dian's crescent, far beneath,
And beautiful as Dian's face:
Pride of this land of liberty!
All that thy waves reflect I love;
Where heaven itself, brought down to thee,
Looks fairer than above.

Safe on thy bank again I stray,
The trance of poesy is o'er,
And I am here at dawn of day,
Gazing on mountains as before;
For all the strange mutations wrought
Where magic feats of my own mind;
Thus, in the fairy-land of thought,
Whate'er I seek I find.

Yet, O ye everlasting hills!
Buildings of God, not made with hands,
Whose word performs whate'er He wills,
Whose word, though ye shall perish, stands;
Can there be eyes that look on you,
Till tears of rapture make them dim,
Nor in his works the Maker view,
Then lose his works in Him?

By me, when I behold Him not,
Or love Him not when I behold,
Be all I ever knew forgot;
My pulse stand still, my heart grow cold;

Transform'd to ice, 'twixt earth and sky,
On yonder cliff my form be seen,
That all may ask and none reply,
What my offence hath been.

FOR THE FRIEND.

AUTHENTICITY OF MOSAIC HISTORY.

As I think that every observation which may tend to confirm our belief in the authenticity of the Mosaic history, will be acceptable to the readers of the Friend, I am willing to offer the following remarks, which were made to me by a pious and learned friend, with whom I was lately conversing on the subject. They are not new, but will not on that account perhaps be rejected.

The history of Moses must have been written more than 2500 years after the creation of the world. How then, it has often been asked by infidels, can it be relied upon as better than a vague and obscure tradition of remote transactions? To those who believe him to have been an inspired penman, the cavil appears futile. But when it can be done, it is allowable to meet the infidel upon his own ground; and it may be asserted with confidence, that the tradition, if it were such, not only respecting the flood, but the antediluvian history of man, came to Moses in a more direct and authentic manner, than that of the first settlement of Pennsylvania to the present generation. The following table will set the question in a very clear light.

	Born	Died A. M.
Adam		930
Seth	130	1042
Enos	235	1140
Cainan	325	1235
Mahalaleel	395	1290
Jared	460	1422
Enoch	622	987
Methuselah	687	1656
Lamech	874	1651
Noah	1056	2006
Shem	1558	2158
Abram	2008	2184
Isaac	2108	2228
Jacob	2168	2315
Joseph	2259	2369
Moses	2433	2553

From an inspection of the above, it appears that Noah was a cotemporary with all his ancestors except Adam, Seth, and Enoch, and that the parent of the whole human family lived more than half a century with the father of Noah. Shem lived an hundred years with Methuselah and Lamech, who knew Adam, and his life was prolonged until Isaac was fifty years of age. It thus appears that there were but two links in the chain of tradition from Adam to Isaac, a period of more than twenty-two hundred years. The father of Moses was a cotemporary with Joseph, who must have heard from Jacob the narratives handed down by Isaac from Shem and Methuselah, respecting the deluge and the creation.

When we reflect on the extraordinary events by which those times were signalized, it will not be thought an extravagant supposition, that the oral traditions of the patriarchs were full and faithful records of what had passed, and that if Moses had written merely as a faithful historian, and not as the divinely inspired servant of the Lord, his narrative of the creation and the deluge would rank as one of the best authenticated histories extant.

A CONSTANT READER.

FOR THE FRIEND.

PALESTINE, NO. 2.

The surface of the Holy Land being much diversified, its climate varies in different places; though in general it is more settled than in our more western countries—the atmosphere is generally mild—the summers are commonly dry, and extremely hot—intensely hot days, are however, frequently succeeded by nights intensely cold; and it is to these sudden vicissitudes, and their consequent effects on the human frame, that Jacob refers when he says that “in the day the drought consumed him and the frost by night.”

As agriculture constituted the principal employment of the Jews, they adopted a division of the seasons of the natural year with reference to their rural work. These divisions exist among the Arabs to the present day, viz: seed-time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter.

During the latter, there sometimes prevails, especially on the mountains, the most extreme cold. In the twelfth century the crusaders perished in great numbers, in consequence of want of food, the intenseness of the cold, and the heaviness of the rains; the ground was alternately encrusted with ice, deluged with rain, or loaded with snow—the beasts of burden were carried away by the sudden torrents that descended from the mountains; the stakes of their tents were torn up and carried away; their horses were killed, and their provisions spoiled by the extremity of the cold and wet.

The hail-stones which fall during the severity of the winter season, are sometimes fatal to man and beast. Such was the storm of hail that discomfited the Amorites, (Joshua,) and such was the very grievous hail that destroyed the cattle of the Egyptians, (Exod.)

A similar hail storm fell upon the British fleet in Marmorice bay, in Asiatic Turkey, in 1801, which affords a fine comment on that expression of the Psalmist, “He casteth forth his ice like morsels: who can stand before his cold?” This storm lasted two days and nights; the hail, or rather ice-stones, were as large as walnuts; the camps were deluged with a torrent of them two feet deep, which, pouring from the mountains, swept every thing before it.

There are intervals even in the depth of winter when it is perfectly warm, sometimes almost hot, in the open air. At such seasons the poorer classes in the East enjoy the conversation of their friends, sauntering about in the air, and sitting under the walls of their dwellings; while the houses of the more opulent inhabitants, having porches or gateways, with benches on each side, the master of the family receives visitors there, and despatches his business, few persons having further admission, except on extraordinary occasions.

These circumstances materially illustrate a difficult passage in the prophet Ezekiel, (xxxiii. 30.) “Also, thou son of man, the children of thy people are still talking concerning thee, by the walls and in the doors of the houses, and speak one to another, every one to his brother, saying, Come, I pray you, and hear what is the word that cometh forth from the Lord.”

The rains descend in Palestine with great violence; and as whole villages in the East are constructed only with palm branches, mud, and tiles baked in the sun, these rains not unfrequently dissolve the cement, such as it is, and the houses fall to the ground. To these effects our Lord probably alludes in Matt. vii. 25—27.

From the time of harvest, that is from the middle of April to the middle of September, it neither rains nor thunders. During the latter part of April, or about the middle of the harvest, “the morning cloud” is seen early in the morning, which disappears as the sun ascends above the horizon. These light fleecy clouds are without water, and to them the apostle Jude compares the false teachers, who even then began to contaminate the church of Christ. They have the form and office of teachers of righteousness, and from such appearances true doctrine may be naturally expected. But they are clouds without water; they distill no refreshing showers, because they contain none; and they are carried about by their passions, as those light clouds are carried by the winds.

During the greater part of this period, however, the earth is moistened by a copious dew, which in the sacred volume is frequently made a symbol of the divine goodness. Maundrell, travelling near Mount Hermon, in the year 1697, says, “We were instructed by experience, what the Psalmist means by the dew of Hermon, (Psalm cxxxiii. 3.) our tents being as wet with it, as if it had rained all night.” This very abundant moisture is, however, entirely evaporated soon after the rising of the sun. What a forcible description is this of the transiently good impressions, felt by many, to which the prophet Hosea alludes (vi. 4.) These dews, however copious, nourish only the more hardy plants—as the season of heat advances, the grass withers, the flowers fade, every green herb is dried up by the roots and dies, unless watered by the rivulets, or by the labour of man. (Psalm xxxii. 4.) If at this season a single spark falls upon the grass, a conflagration immediately ensues. (Psalm lxxxiii. 14. Isa. ix. 18. x. 17, 18. Jer. xxi. 14.)

The face of the country becomes entirely changed; the fields, so lately clothed with the richest verdure, and adorned with the loveliest flowers, are converted into a brown and dried wilderness; the fountains and rivulets are dried up; and the soil becomes so hard as to exhibit large fissures or clefts. These effects are accelerated if the east wind blow for a few days; which being usually dry and producing a blight, becomes fatal to the corn and vines, and is particularly dangerous to navigators in the Mediterranean sea. The people of the east generally term every wind an east wind, that blows between the east and north and the east and south, The Euroclyden, which caused the wreck of the vessel in which Paul was sailing to Rome, was one of those tempestuous east winds that drive every thing before them. Such winds are common in the Mediterranean to this day, where they are called Levanters, the term Levant meaning that country which lies at the eastern extremity of that sea.

During the hot season, it is not uncommon for persons to die suddenly, in consequence of the extreme heat of the solar rays. The son of the woman of Shunem appears to have died in consequence of a stroke of the sun. The army of king Baldwin IV. suffered considerably from these great heats when near Tiberias.

The Jordan is the only stream in Palestine which can properly be termed a river; its course is estimated at only 100 miles. It may be said to have two banks—the first, that of the river in its natural state; the second, that of its overflowings. After descending the outermost bank, the traveller proceeds about a furlong upon a level strand, before he comes to the immediate bank of the river. This second bank is now, as it anciently was, so beset with bushes, reeds, tamarisks, willows, oleanders, and other shrubs and trees, which form an asylum for various wild animals, that no water is perceptible until the traveller has made his way through them. In this thicket, several kinds of wild beasts used formerly to conceal themselves, until the swelling of the river drove them from their coverts. To this fact the prophet Jeremiah alludes, when he compares the impatience of Edom and Babylon under the divine judgments, to the coming up of a lion from the swellings of Jordan. On the level strand above noticed, it probably was, that John the Baptist stood, and pointed to the stones of which it was composed, when he exclaimed, I say unto you, that God is able of those stones to raise up children unto Abraham; and turning to the second bank, which was overgrown with various shrubs and trees that had been suffered to grow wild for ages, he added, and now also the axe is laid unto the roots of the trees; therefore, every tree, which bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewn down and cast into the fire. The passage of this deep and rapid river by the Israelites, at the most unfavourable season, when augmented by the dissolution of the winter snows, was more manifestly miraculous, if possible, than that of the Red Sea; because there was no natural agency whatever employed; no mighty winds to sweep a passage, as in the former case; no reflux in the tide, on which minute philosophers might fasten, to depreciate the miracle. It seems, therefore, to have been providentially designed, to silence cavils respecting the former; it was done at noon-day, in the presence of the neighbouring inhabitants; and it struck terror into the kings of the Amorites and Canaanites westward of the river, whose hearts melted, neither was there any spirit in them any more, because of the children of Israel. THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH, 24, 1827.

We have received letters from our Friends in North Carolina, which inform us that the Yearly Meeting at New Garden closed on the 9th instant. The various important concerns which engaged its attention, were satisfactorily settled, and much harmony and unanimity prevailed. The Friends of truth will hear with pleasure, that the Yearly Meeting of North Carolina has added its testimony to that of Indiana, against the antichristian and libertine doctrines which have been promulgated by Elias Hicks and his followers, in the name of the Society of Friends, to the great disparagement of its Christian reputation. The evil had become so serious and general, as to require a solemn and open disavowal on the part of Friends; and as these documents emanate from the highest authority in the Society, they will draw a clear line of distinction between the new sect and the religious Society of Friends. The Yearly Meeting of North Carolina has issued a Testimony and Epistle, in which the doctrines of the new sect are quoted from their own preachers and writers, and contrasted with the Christian principles of our Society, in such a manner as to show that they are incompatible with each other. We hope soon to receive a copy of this interesting paper, and shall lose no time in presenting it to our readers.

We cheerfully comply with a request from the Managers of the Infant School, to insert the advertisement below. Among the various modes of doing good, which so laudably exercise the benevolent dispositions of our fellow citizens, this is one which has particularly interested our feelings; and surely there is reason to believe, that it will be accompanied with His blessing, who said, "suffer little children to come unto Me;" &c.

"The Managers of the Infant School Society of Philadelphia, give notice that one hundred and fifty children have been admitted to the School in Chester street, which is now organized and in successful operation. They invite the members of the Society, and all others interested in the institution, to call and witness the course of instruction and discipline which has been adopted. It is the intention of the Board of Managers to establish other schools, if the public patronage should prove sufficient to enable them to do so. With a view to the extension of the advantages of this Institution, Collectors will be employed and authorized to receive subscriptions, and will call on those citizens who have not already subscribed."

November 10, 1827.

We have before us a printed copy of the minutes of the late Indiana Yearly Meeting published by its direction. Among the various subjects which engaged its attention, was that relating to the Indian natives; the report of a committee having charge of that concern states, that soon after the Yearly Meeting of the preceding year, a communication was received from the chiefs and principal Indians of the part of the Shawnee nation, which remained at Wahpahkownetta, requesting that the school for the education of their children, might be renewed. Accordingly the school was opened on the 12th month ensuing, and has been continued from that time, attended by about sixteen children. Besides which, care has been used to train the boys in the knowledge of farming, and the girls in housewifery, spinning, &c. Four Indian boys, at the request of their parents, have been placed by the committee at school in the neighbourhood of Springfield, Ohio. It seems by the report, that the Yearly Meeting of Ohio participates with Indiana in this exercise of Christian benevolence, in furnishing the requisite funds, and in clothing the children attending school.

It appears also that the people of colour continue to occupy a portion of that meeting's care, both as regards their protection against illegal claims upon their services, and extending to them the benefits of school learning.

From the summary of the answers to the first annual query, we should infer that Friends in the western country were, as to numbers, considerably on the increase.

Passing over several records of proceedings calculated to show the decision, firmness, and prudent foresight of that respectable body relative to the desolating spirit of innovation, we shall close our abstract with a transcript of the minute on the subject of the epistle in our fourth number, thus giving to it the stamp of an authentic document. It is as follows:—

"A Testimony respecting our doctrines on the divinity of Christ, and faith concerning Him, designed for publication and circulation among our members and others, for their help, encouragement, and information, was received from the Meeting for Sufferings; which being read, was united with and approved, and the clerk was directed to sign it on behalf of this meeting. John Pool, Elijah Coffin, Charles Fisher and John Smith, were appointed to have 4000 copies of the above mentioned Testimony printed, to distribute them among the Quarterly Meetings; to draw on the Treasurer for the amount of the expense, and to report to the next meeting."

The heavenly powers ought to be revered, and not searched into; and their mercies, by prayers sought, not their hidden counsels, by curiosity. SIR PHILIP SIDNEY.

FOR THE FRIEND.

NO. I.

Observations addressed to the persons who assembled at Green Street Meeting House, on the 19th day of the 4th Month, 1827.

In the divisions and dissensions of communities, whether of a religious or civil nature, it is usual for the parties to attempt a justification of their conduct, by an exposition of the reasons or motives by which they are actuated; and as the Society of people called Quakers, had long been remarkable for the unanimity and harmony of all their proceedings, the discord which has for some time past existed among them, naturally excites much attention and inquiry.

The exposition of the motives and principles which govern the association of the Green street separatists, was therefore impatiently expected by many; but the appearance of your manifesto has afforded very little satisfaction; for instead of a fair and full explanation of the reasons which influence your conduct, it carries on the face of it sufficient proof of a design to involve them in obscurity. We do indeed find dark hints of attempts to infringe that liberty of conscience, of which God alone is the sovereign judge; and a declaration of your determination to preserve unimpaired your spiritual inheritance unfettered by man, and unalloyed by any prescribed modes of faith. You complain that doctrines which you believe to be sound and edifying, are condemned by the other portion of the Society as spurious and unsound; that your attempts at reconciliation have been rejected, and a series of measures pursued which you deem oppressive. But you have adduced no instance of oppression, or attempts to infringe the sacred rights of conscience, nor any specification of those doctrines, to enable your readers to judge whether they are compatible with the tenets of the Society of Friends.

These charges are denied; and it remains for you to prove their accuracy by adducing evidence of them. No one is required to prove a negative; and if they are well founded, you can have no difficulty in establishing their truth. You will be under no necessity of seeking testimony in the ranks of your opponents, for you have ample room for selection among yourselves; you will easily find individuals in your highest and lowest seats, who have been subjected to the admonitions and censures of the elders and overseers, and there if any where, the victims of oppression are to be found. And you ought to recollect, that if after making such charges, you do not prove them, every principle of justice authorizes your opponents to claim an acquittal, and to be considered as having in the exercise of the powers vested in them, pursued the apostolic injunction, in marking those who cause divisions and offences, contrary to the "doctrine which they have learned."

If the doctrines to which you allude are indeed consistent with the principles on which the Quakers originally united in religious Society, then are your opponents chargeable with injustice, in endeavouring to control them. If they are adverse to these principles, it is folly to call a determination not to receive you as brethren, an infringement of your rights of conscience.

On the solution of this question the whole controversy rests; and as you have heretofore deemed it inexpedient explicitly to avow what your principles really are, we must seek for them in such of the arguments and assertions of your preachers, as have been circulated by yourselves.

Nor can any weight be given to your complaint, that your attempts at reconciliation have been rejected. No really religious person can compromise his faith; and that man's religion must be loose indeed, who will submit it to arbitration or modification.

The division of christendom into so many sects, each holding different opinions on particular points of faith and doctrine, is the consequence of their enjoying liberty of conscience, and not an infringement of it. And when individuals having a unity of sentiment on this important subject, congregate for the purpose of divine worship, they have an indubitable right to exclude from their community all who do not unite in opinion with them. This is no violation of the rights of others; but any attempts to introduce into their Society, principles and doctrines at variance with the original tenets on which their Association was founded, is unquestionably a violation of their own.

It is the practical effects of your determination, "to preserve unimpaired your spiritual inheritance, unfettered by man and unalloyed by any prescribed mode of faith," which has been the cause of all the dissensions in the Society, and therefore merits particular consideration. Although men differ in the interpretation of particular passages in the sacred writings, all Christian sects (with the exception of yourselves) acknowledge that there is a rule prescribed, which it is obligatory on them to obey. When a number of individuals join in opinion on this subject, they unite in social worship, and by mutual consent enact such rules and regulations, as will in their opinions best sustain the original principles on which they associated, and preserve harmony and peace in the church. Such are the origin and conduct of every religious association on earth; and it is the consequence of your endeavour to give effect to the extravagant idea, that our ministers are to be permitted to preach any and every doctrine which a heated or perverted imagination may suggest, unfettered by any prescribed mode of faith, which is the origin of all the disorders among us.

Having avowed these principles, it would be difficult to discover what your belief really is, had not facts been developed in the course of the controversy, which will enable us to form an opinion, without great danger of its being erroneous. I shall therefore pass over all minor considerations, which, however they may have tended to hasten your secession, were only incident to the main subject, and proceed at once to the fundamental cause of the division of the Society, which is the preaching of doctrines not only contrary to the tenets of the Society of Friends, but which attack the very bulwarks of the Christian religion.

How far your opponents are justified in making this charge, will be the subject of the present inquiry; and I shall endeavour to conduct it in such a way, as will enable my readers to form their own conclusions, and to detect any erroneous deductions, if such should be drawn from the facts which will be stated.

Your great leader is ELIAS HICKS, and I cannot be accused of unfairness in considering his doctrines and opinions as your own. You have upheld him in opposition to your friends; you have followed after and applauded him; you have, by circulating his sermons with persevering industry, given your sanction to the sentiments they contain; and you have so far identified yourselves with him, that your party is designated by his name.

In contrasting the doctrines of Friends with those of Elias Hicks, I shall not search for any isolated expression or opinion of individuals, but rely for my authority principally on Barclay's Apology; because it is a systematic and connected account of the doctrines of Friends; has, almost from the first existence of the Society to the present moment, been considered as a true exposition of these doctrines, and has been very often reprinted by the Society, and circulated among its members, for their instruction and government. And this is the most candid course which can be pursued. The purity of our faith is not to be impeached, should particular persons inadvertently or designedly promulgate opinions which may be contrary to our long recognised principles; nor ought their opinions on any particular subject (however high their standing) to be adduced in argument as the doctrine of the Society, unless the Society expressly, or by some overt act, recognise them as their own.

We have sorrowful instances of the fallibility and weakness of human nature, in the conduct of many of our ministers, who, for want of watchfulness, have been led astray. Some, enticed by the allurements of the world into its bustle, pleasures, and vices; and others, by their ambition or heated imaginations, into false assumptions of spiritual lights and spiritual knowledge, more pernicious to the Society, because it impairs the faith of many in these things. Few even of our most exemplary public Friends have pursued such an even course, as not sometimes to require admonition or caution; and an attentive perusal of the history of this people will discover, that there has been at all times a necessity for the superintendence and watchful care of the elders; and that it has been in a great measure by their paternal and unceasing attention, that the Society has, for so long a period, been preserved from that discord and contention which have afflicted other Christian sects. What then would have been the situation of this people, had each individual been permitted to pursue his devious course, "unfettered by man, and unalloyed by any prescribed mode of faith."

I shall pursue the subject in my next number.

What is Wit?—A certain bishop said to his chaplain: What is wit? The chaplain replied, The rectory of B— is vacant, give it to me, and that will be wit. Prove it, said his lordship, and you shall have it. It would be a good thing well applied, rejoined the chaplain.—C. C. COLTON.

"We feel an ardent desire, that in all our proceedings tending to this end, our conduct towards all our brethren, may, on every occasion, be marked with love and forbearance."

Green Street Address of the 4th mo.

COMMENTARY.

In the 8th month last, the followers of Elias Hicks belonging to Radnor Monthly Meeting, separated from the Society of Friends, appointed a clerk of their own choosing, and organized themselves as a Monthly Meeting of the new sect. Friends continued to hold the regular Monthly Meeting of Radnor, with the properly appointed clerk, and the minutes and records of the meeting.

At an adjourned meeting of the separatists, held in the same month, they changed the day of holding their monthly meeting, and directed that the house should not be opened, for the accommodation of Friends, at the stated time of holding the Monthly Meeting. Not satisfied with giving such directions, they took means to carry them into effect. They appointed a committee to guard the premises, on the day of Friends' meeting, to prevent them from entering the yard. Soon after these unprecedented resolutions were adopted, one of the separatists, unauthorized by any meeting either of Friends, or his own sect, forcibly took possession of the key of the meeting house, and wrested it from the Friend to whose care it had been committed by the preparative meeting, and who had the charge of the house for about thirty years.

In the 9th month, Friends assembled at the usual time for holding their monthly meeting. Not only the doors of the house, but the very gates of the yard were locked against them, and the guard consisting of four or five men, appointed by the separatists, were in and about the yard to prevent friends from entering.

Friends, however, were not in any disposition to assert their rights per force—their peaceable principles would not admit of such measures.

A respectful application was made to the guard, requesting them to permit Friends to occupy their own meeting-house for the purposes of the Society; but they refused. Under these circumstances, it was concluded to hold the meeting by the road side, as near their premises as they could. A convenient situation was selected, under the shade of some trees; a carriage was drawn up close to the bank, in which some of the elderly women were seated, while the rest of the company either stood around, or sat down upon the ground.* The whole number of persons was about seventy. The scene was one of deep interest and solemnity. It called to mind with peculiar emphasis, those days when our worthy predecessors were locked out of their meeting places by the civil power, and compelled to meet in the streets, or in the fields, while the constables or military officers stood by, to drag away to the prisons, already thronged with their suffering brethren, those who might attempt to address the assembly in the ministry of the word. Little did we think that the nineteenth century would witness an act of injustice so similar in its features to those which disgraced that less enlightened age.

The meeting, however, proved a season of divine favour; the Great Master of assemblies was there, and owned the assembly by his animating presence. Under a grateful sense of which, reverent supplication and praise were offered to his worthy name. The situation being too much exposed to transact the business of a monthly meeting, Friends adjourned to a dwelling in the vicinity. In the 10th month, the house was again locked up; the gates secured with padlocks, and the sashes fastened down, so as to guard every avenue by which an entrance could be affected. But either from a conviction that Friends were not a warlike people, or for some other reason, the guard did not appear. The monthly meeting again convened in a dwelling, and is now held at a house belonging to a Friend in Haverford.

The followers of Elias Hicks carried their opposition to Friends still further. They changed the day for holding the midweek meeting at Haverford; and as if determined to coerce Friends into a compliance with their views, ordered the house to be closed on the stated day of the meeting. Friends, however, could not acknowledge their authority to change the time of the meeting, and continued to meet on the regular day. The doors and gates were locked against them; and when application was made for admission into the house, they were refused. They then asked to be permitted to assemble in the yard, but the keeper of the house told them his orders were, not to suffer them even to enter that. They were therefore compelled to hold their meeting for worship in the road, where they continued to meet for many weeks, exposed to the variableness of the autumnal season.

Such acts need no comment of ours—they "speak more loudly than words."

FOR THE FRIEND.

William Penn's select works mention "A Salutation, a Reproof, and Visitation," which he addressed to his countrymen from on board the ship Welcome, in the Downs, the 30th of the 6th month, 1682, after his embarkation for Pennsylvania; but the Epistles themselves are not given.

If they have been printed on this side the Atlantic, they have escaped my observation. It is however an interesting fact, that the originals of those papers are in the possession of Benjamin Chew, Esq. of this city, who politely furnished copies, from which the transcripts now submitted, were made. William Penn's autographs are none of them easily read, and those under notice are not legible in several places, owing probably to the motion of the ship to which the author was subjected, when they were written—this will account for the omission of a few words. The praise of these excellent works, it does not become me to speak. The solemnity and dignity of their subjects, and the rich simplicity of their style, render them worthy of all acceptance. V.

A Salutation to the faithful, a Reproof to the unfaithful, a Visitation to the inquiring, in a solemn farewell to them all in the land of my nativity.

A SALUTATION TO THE FAITHFUL.

Ye are beloved of me above all the sons and daughters of men, who have received and bowed to the blessed appearance of the Lord Jesus Christ in your hearts, and that have not counted any thing dear for the testimony of his cross and gospel, but have unfeignedly loved and obeyed his light within, and not been afraid to confess it without. You that have not been offended in him, though the world have not received him, but bitterly mocked and persecuted his saving appearance, to you doth my soul reach in the love that many waters cannot quench, nor time nor distance wear away, beseeching the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, to be with you and bless you with his abundant goodness and mercy. O Friends, go on; ye are called to an high and heavenly calling; the trumpet hath given a certain sound, follow your Captain, be valiant, fight the good fight of faith, that you may finish your course with joy. A crown is at the end, a diadem that will never fade away, the reward of the righteous at the end of all his troubles. Dear Friends, love the truth in your hearts; be near to the Lord, that ye may grow in the life and wisdom of it, and keep all your meetings in the faith and power of God, and love and honour the brethren that labour in word and doctrine; be diligent in this work, and that will make you rich in the Heavens that will never pass away. Have a godly care over your families, and let Heaven be your throne, and the earth your footstool, ye that received the truth for the truth's sake; who have loved it above all, and for it lost all—that being tried, fainted not, but endured, and who to this day have not sought yourselves, but the Lord, and have counted nothing dear that ye might lift up his name among men; who being reviled, have blessed; and being persecuted, have suffered; and being defamed have entreated; and are to this day tempted, buffeted, and accounted by too many as the offscouring of the land—be not discomfited, but gird up the loins of your minds; be sober, watch, pray and hope to the end, for through many tribulations are we to enter the rest and city of God. What if I should say that the days of sorrow and sighing will even here have an end, and that the peace, righteousness and glory of the latter days are even at the door! Beloved Friends, as clay is in the hands of the potter, so let us be in the hands of our God, so will he bring forth himself through us, and confound the wisdom and opposition of this world. Nothing can hurt us but our own unfaithfulness; for the God that hath called us is all-powerful, all-knowing, all-present; and hath given us that believe, the witness in ourselves, which is the unerring way of the Lord: so that our religion is Emmanuel, God with us, who bath the words of eternal life: he that cured the ruler's son by his divine presence in his bodily absence, he also is present with us in Spirit, in the fire, in the water, by sea and by land, he worketh wonders upon both, who is glorious in holiness, and fearful in praises in the congregations of his children. In him I love you, and in him I salute you, and in him I dearly bid you farewell. His grace, mercy and peace be with you all, and the blessings of His life and presence for ever rest upon you, Amen. Your faithful friend and brother,

WILLIAM PENN.

Villany that is vigilant, will be an overmatch for virtue, if she slumber in her post; and hence it is, that a bad cause has often triumphed over a good one; for the partisans of the former, knowing that their cause will do nothing for them, have done every thing for their cause; where the friends of the latter are too apt to expect every thing from their cause, and to do nothing for themselves.

* An attempt was made to procure the use of some old benches, which had long laid by unused; but the guard peremptorily refused to permit them to be appropriated for the accommodation of Friends.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

Lines written on hearing one of the followers of Elias Hicks say that "we should doubt all mystery," "that it was unreasonable to suppose man should believe what he could not comprehend." 11th mo. 12th, 1827.

"Thou great First Cause," Creator, King, and Lord,
The worm that breathed at thy commanding word,
And dies when'er thou wilt, presumptuous man,
Has dared the mazes of thy path to scan;
Guided by reason's powerless rays alone,
Would pierce the veil of mystery round thee thrown!

Tell me, proud being!—flutterer of an hour—
(Who thus would comprehend omniscient power,) Why worlds were made, why man was formed at all,
Or crimeless once, permitted then to fall?
The why, the wherefore, boots not us to know,
Enough—that God ordain'd it to be so.

Go thou and cull the simplest flower that blows,
The hill-side daisy, or the wilding rose,
And tell me why so bright their hues appear,
Why they return with each revolving year;
Or how, when countless worlds are all in bloom,
O'er every bud is breath'd its own perfume?
Yes, solve me this, and I'll believe with thee,
'Twas meant that man should doubt all mystery.

Presumptuous worm! enough to know is given—
'Tis fearful meddling with the things of heaven;
Its sacred mysteries belong alone
To Him, whose paths are awful and unknown;
Who wings the storm, or whispers "peace, be still,"
Cradling to rest the mountain wave at will;
Who for our souls his son a ransom gave,
And guards "his fold" from childhood to the grave.
Confess, proud man, all his known ways are just,
And what thou canst not fathom, "learn to trust."
MARIAN.

Extract of a letter from an American gentleman travelling in Europe, dated Leipzig, Saxony.

"A few of the peculiarities of this country shall occupy the remainder of this sheet. Europe is a military country; every town, street and corner is crowded with soldiers. Saxony, which at best is but a very inconsiderable kingdom, (the one half having been ceded to Prussia by the Holy Alliance, because the king made common cause, or for awhile took part with Napoleon,) containing about 1,300,000 inhabitants, (about as many as the city of London,) maintains a standing army of 15,000 men! Prussia 600,000, and Russia one million! These armies cost an immense sum of money. The people are groaning beneath the oppressive weight, while the morals of the rising generation are awfully corrupted.

"Perhaps no people on earth are so passionately fond of promenading as the Germans. Thus, we find in almost every town, and also in the vicinity of the town, the most beautiful shaded walks and public gardens, laid out and arranged with all the taste and elegance imaginable. Dancing, masquerades, concerts, gambling, music, theatrical exhibitions, &c. &c. are all the rage, and no inconsiderable quantum of the conversation turns upon those subjects. The merits of the performers, the appearance of the masks, the dexterity of the dancers, are so often discussed as to nauseate the stomach of every man, who takes no pleasure in them; and what to me is most surprising, is the melancholy fact, that these amusements are more frequent on the Lord's day than on any other. Still, however, there is much in the German character that excites my admiration. They are truly a polite, refined, friendly, hospitable and learned people. In no country have I observed so much tenderness and affection between friends, between man and wife, and between children and parents; no where is the stranger received with more cordiality, and no people on earth can boast of so many profoundly learned men; I verily believe there are more authors in Germany than in half the world besides, and more books are printed here than in most other parts of the globe taken together. Nor is this country destitute of numerous and mighty advocates of the cross. Heterodoxy, thank God, is on the decline. Many theologians, whom much learning had made mad, and who grew dizzy while elevated on the pinnacle of reason and philosophy, and lost themselves in the labyrinth of their speculations, have discovered their folly, and like humble penitents have returned to the plain, simple doctrines of the gospel, and now proclaim those saving truths with all the power of their erudition, and with all the fervour of their hearts warmed anew by the love of God.

"Thus, things are taking a favourable turn. Rationalism is losing ground, and is beginning to be ashamed of itself. Many who, a few years ago, had exalted reason on the throne, and made it sit in judgment upon revelation, and the things of God, that far transcended its circumscribed capacity, have come back, wept bitterly over their errors, and are now boldly and effectually fighting in the cause of Calvary. Let those divines of our country, who have also departed from the simplicity of the gospel, and speak and write so much about rational christianity and liberal views, and in maintenance of their barren dogmas, appeal so often to the literati of Germany, imitate this example. A few years ago, these men told us, that the present age was too enlightened to believe the absurd doctrines of our pious ignorant forefathers.—Let these know that if they would keep pace with the learning of the day, they must abandon their present untenable grounds, and subject poor, frail, human reason to the doctrines of revelation—that they must humbly and submissively bow in reverence and faith at the foot of the cross, or they will in a short time be behind the age in which they live, and can no longer appeal to learned Europe for support in favour of their cold and comfortless neology.

"All Europe has its eye, at present, fixed with most intense interest upon the United States, and the eagerness and enthusiasm with which they overwhelm me with questions concerning our laws and political affairs is indescribable. Thousands are in a state of suspense, wondering whether it be possible that our government can be managed without a king, and whether the christian religion can sustain itself without the intervention and support of government, or without a union of church and state. Though I have no doubt, that there are some in this country, who would rejoice in the downfall of our Republic, yet there are many who wish us success, and would weep over our misfortunes. Such is the admiration of the American character over all Europe, that the very name is a passport to the most friendly reception. Let us in the mean time humbly put our trust in the Lord of hosts, and earnestly pray Him to preserve us from pride and self-dependence, and to perpetuate upon the rock of ages the inestimable civil and religious privileges, which it is our happy lot to enjoy."

FIRE.—On the morning of the 21st inst. about half past 7 o'clock, a fire broke out in the Printing Office of Jesper Harding, in Carter's Alley, hard by our establishment. It originated in what is technically called the drying-room, where a great quantity of printed paper was hung up, with which the stove-pipe accidentally communicated, on lighting up the fires in the stoves, at an early hour this morning. From some cause or other, the alarm did not spread so rapidly as usual, and the fire had made considerable progress before the hose and engines were brought into operation.

J. Harding is a kind-hearted neighbour, and a very industrious and enterprising man, and was carrying on a large book printing and binding establishment, in this city. His stock was insured at $5,000. A number of valuable works in hand, were either materially damaged, or entirely destroyed; among them, part of a large edition of Hume and Smollett's History of England; the Collateral Bible; Life of Washington; a quantity of the forthcoming, and back numbers of the Franklin Journal, and other works of minor note. Many of these works, and a large quantity of paper, were saved by the activity of the neighbours.

Since writing the above we have been informed, that besides the damage above mentioned, the types and materials in the composing room are much injured, and nearly all the books and materials of the bindery in the third story entirely destroyed. It is to be observed, that the roof of the building was of slate; and however much this article might protect a building from exterior accident by fire, it certainly very much retards the operations of the firemen in extinguishing flames inside. In the present case, it is not improbable that one half of the damage had not been done, could the water have penetrated from the roof.—[Press.

DIED, at Lancaster, on the 16th instant, at ten o'clock in the morning, THOMAS DUNCAN, Sen. Associate Judge of the Supreme Court of this Commonwealth. The melancholy intelligence of the death of this eminent Judge reached this city on Saturday evening: on the opening of the Courts of Nisi Prius, Oyer and Terminer, District Court for the City and County of Philadelphia, and Common Pleas, yesterday morning, they were respectively adjourned; and, immediately thereafter, the Gentlemen of the Bar assembled in the Chamber, in which the lamented Judge had so often and so ably presided, to express their deep sorrow for the loss which they and the community have sustained by his death.

On the 16th instant, about 12 o'clock, SARAH R. LONGSTRETH, aged 36 years, relict of the late Samuel Longstreth, and daughter of the late Miers Fisher.

We have been gratified in the perusal of a Circular, addressed by the Secretary of the Treasury to a portion of the American consuls abroad, in relation to the introduction of valuable foreign seeds and plants into the United States. This has often appeared to us a matter well worthy the attention of enterprising fellow citizens who visit distant climes, and the present measure being under the direction of our enlightened and patriotic Chief Magistrate, we have the best reason to hope it will be followed by results highly beneficial to the country. The Circular is accompanied with a specification of the kind of information required, relative to the natural history, habits, &c. of each particular plant, and ample directions as to the best mode of putting them up, or the seed, for transportation. It comprehends forest trees, useful for timber, grain of every description, fruit trees, vegetables for the table, esculent roots, and, in short, plants of whatever nature, whether useful as food for man or the domestic animals—or for purposes connected with manufactures, or any of the useful arts.

The appearances of northern lights, so frequent here, in the last and preceding months, have not been confined to this quarter of the globe—the following is one among several notices, of their having been observed in different parts of Europe.

On the 8th September a fine Aurora Borealis, was observed throughout the whole of Denmark, to the northwest. This phenomenon is said to forebode an early and severe winter. As far as our own country is concerned, it is not improbable the indication may prove a correct one;—the weather for some days past has been unusually cold for the season, and there are accounts from the northward of considerable falls of snow, &c.

GRAND TRUNK, OR TRENT AND MERSEY CANAL.

The laudable example set by the Duke of Bridgewater, gave rise to the Grand Trunk Canal, the plan of which was brought forward by the Marquis of Stafford, supported by the opinions of Brindley and Hucatan. Its construction was authorized by act of Parliament in 1766, and it was completed in 1777, and by its extensive usefulness gave immediately a great stimulus to the spirit for internal navigation, which soon pervaded all parts of England.

This canal commences at Preston-brook, where it is connected with the Duke of Bridgewater's canal, and by that means has a communication with Liverpool and Manchester. Its original object was to establish a navigation completely across the island of Great Britain, from the Trent, which falls into the North Sea, to the Mersey, which falls into the Irish Channel; and also in conjunction with the Staffordshire and Worcester canal, which was undertaken at the same time, to open a communication between those points and Bristol.

The importance of its outlets has induced the construction of many branches to this canal, the most remarkable of which are those extending to the city of London, by the successive execution of the Fazeley, Coventry, Oxford and Grand Junction canals; which together constitute a complete line of navigation between London and Liverpool, through the Trent and Mersey canal, whence this latter derives the name of the Grand Trunk, as being the centre of the navigable ramifications which stretch towards the four principal seaports of England, viz. Liverpool, Hull, Bristol and London.

The length of this canal from Preston-brook to its point of discharge in the Trent, is 93 miles. The summit level is 316 feet 3 inches above the Trent, and 408 feet 2 inches above the Mersey. The summit is supplied by five reservoirs, the principal one of which is near Leek, and covers 160 acres. At Hare Castle the summit level passes through a tunnel; the first of the kind accomplished in England: it is 2888 yards in length, 9 feet wide and 12 feet high, and 210 feet below the surface of the ground, and cost 70 shillings and 8 pence sterling per yard forward; it is generally arched with brick, and has no towing path; but in passing it, each boat takes in two additional hands, who, lying upon their backs, push with their feet against the walls of the tunnel to effect the passage of the boat. The operation requires about two hours, and costs a shilling to each assistant. As the tunnel is too narrow to permit boats to pass each other within it, different times are allotted for making the passage in opposite directions; thus boats going from Liverpool towards London occupy the morning, and those coming in the opposite direction, the afternoon; but so extensive is the trade, that the waiting boats not unfrequently accumulate in such numbers, as to cover a mile of the canal, before the hour for passing arrives. To remedy this inconvenience a second tunnel is now constructing, parallel to the first, at an expense of about a guinea an inch forward, or an aggregate expenditure of more than half a million of dollars. There are four other tunnels upon this canal; one near to Preston on the Hill, of 1241 yards; a second at Barton, of 572 yards; a third at Saltersford, of 350 yards; and a fourth at Armitage, of 130 yards; each of which is 17 feet 4 inches high, and 13 feet 6 inches wide. The locks are in general seven feet wide, and the boats most used, are six feet wide by eighty feet long, and carry from 18 to 20 tons; but on some parts of the canal the locks are 14 feet broad, so as to pass the boats in pairs. It has also 258 bridges, 16 basins and 3 aqueducts, and several rail-roads on its banks. Boats generally require four days for the trip from Longport to London, a distance of 186 miles, and go day and night.

When the charter for this canal was first obtained, its advantages were so highly appreciated, that almost all the proprietors of grounds through which it was intended to pass, relinquished their claims without compensation, and time soon realized their liberal anticipations. In all directions it gave birth to improvements of the greatest importance.— Mines of coal, rock salt, and iron, and quarries of stone, previously of little or no value, were immediately worked upon an extensive scale, and to great profit, and manufacturing establishments of queensware and glass, which may be said at this time almost to supply the world, were put into operation.

The salt mines of Northwich, which are contiguous to this canal, and owe to it much of their value and importance, may be considered among the wonders of England. They consist of three beds of salt, the lowest of which is 289 feet below the surface, and is esteemed the best, both on account of the quality of the salt, and the thickness of the stratum. It has been already penetrated by the workmen to the perpendicular depth of 72 feet without their having passed through it. A surface of three acres or more, and from 15 to 18 feet in height, has been removed in one mine, leaving pillars of 15 feet thick, which are at the frightful distance of 150 feet asunder.

Previous to the making of the canal, the product of the salt mines was consumed almost exclusively in Cheshire; but now, in consequence of the facility of transport, the manufacture has increased to about 60,000 tons per annum, two thirds of which are sent by the canal to Hull, and are thence transported to the Baltic.

Some idea of the manufacturing establishments which are carried on in the neighbourhood of this canal, may be formed from that of the Devenports at Longport, whose principal object is the making of queensware and glass. The proprietors of this manufactory employ four steam engines solely in grinding the earths necessary for their wares; they send three boats weekly to Liverpool with the articles manufactured; and it requires five government agents to collect the duties upon their fabrics. In another manufactory of similar articles, 800 workmen are constantly employed.

The advantages which have accrued to the proprietors of this canal have been also great. The dividend has been equal to 60 per cent. per annum, and the shares which cost originally 100*l.* are worth 1300*l.*; and besides paying this large annual dividend, the company has discharged very heavy loans, which it was obliged to make in consequence of the deficiency of its capital. The Marquis of Stafford is a large proprietor in the canal, and holds extensive mines of coal and other substances, which owe their value mainly to this enterprise. He was its principal promoter, and has derived from it the most striking pecuniary advantages. His income is said to be equal to about 1000*l.* sterling per day. G. V.

FOR THE FRIEND.

CO-OPERATIVE INDUSTRY.

The reverses to which all commercial and manufacturing nations are liable, press upon the working classes in exact proportion to the complexity of the political machine, and to the minuteness of the subdivisions of labour. They have been no where more severely felt than in the great manufacturing districts of England, where the ignorance and improvidence of the labourers, generally leave them without any provision against either old age or the want of employment. The best means of alleviating the evils of such a state of society, has been one of the chief studies of the wise and the good of that country. That many moral and physical comforts are best secured by joint endeavours and co-operation, is one of the first and simplest truths that we discover in this research. The animating principle of social prosperity is self-interest; and where circumstances, which render the man careless of the future, prevent its full and free operation, we may be allowed to take him into our charge to manage his scanty means, so as to produce a greater amount of comfort than his unassisted efforts could procure; and by restoring his mind to a healthy, vigorous action, to render him frugal, industrious and emulous. Such appear to be the natural suggestions of a benevolent mind, in viewing this subject; and these simple ideas have been acted upon in various places and at various times, though modified in each by some peculiarity of circumstance, manners and opinions.

One of the most remarkable attempts of this kind, the most important certainly in its consequences, is that commenced at New Lanark, in Scotland, towards the latter part of the last century, by David Dale, the founder and manager of the extensive cotton mills in that village. This pious, benevolent man, established a system of police, and of moral and religious instruction, which were attended with the happiest results. Out of 3000 persons employed during a period of twelve years, from 1785 to 1797, only fourteen died, and not one became the subject of judicial punishment. The factories at his death passed into the hands of several proprietors, among whom were two extraordinary men, of the most opposite principles and character—William Allen and Robert Owen. The latter was the son-in-law of David Dale, and his successor as acting partner and manager. He brought to this office an enthusiasm which nothing could divert from its reveries; a sincere desire for promoting the welfare of his people, and views of human society the most fantastic and chimerical that were ever attempted to be realized. To these were added a system of philosophy, which denied the existence of either vice or virtue; which esteemed the doctrine of future rewards and punishments as the very box of Pandora; which rejected as an unnatural yoke the institution of marriage; which placed the gospel on the same shelf of error and superstition, with the books of Mahomet and the Brahmins; a system, in short, of the most degrading fatalism, clothed in the garb of the fairest philanthropy. He was prevented by the religious principles of his partners, from making New Lanark the scene of a full experiment on his system. Under his administration the prosperity of the village was progressive, and many valuable additions to the happiness and comfort of the population were made. The domestic arrangements for the workmen; the care taken in educating the children, and in the internal government and police of the institution; the economy in the purchase, preparation and distribution of food; the kindness to the aged and the sick, were all admirable. Yet with these substantial benefits were joined refinements, which betray the principles of the mind that planned them, and which to sound judges must ever appear misapplied and frivolous; and the subsequent career of Owen leaves room to doubt whether the prosperity of New Lanark was not owing to the more solid and practical good sense of the other proprietors.

The vast projects which this singular man had formed, could not find room for their development in the narrow limits of a Scottish village. He saw in the wilds of America a virgin soil; a people free from the feudal shackles of rank and vassalage; and he left his native country to become the regenerator of the new world. The whole system of Owen rests upon the positions, that the character of man is entirely formed by circumstances; that his will has no power over his opinions; that he may be moulded at pleasure for happiness or misery; and that it is therefore practicable, by training him up in pleasurable sensations, by removing all the causes of physical uneasiness, in a word, by building a perfect house, to endue him with all the perfection of which he is capable, to render him completely happy—the proper term for what is vulgarly called virtuous, and to banish for ever from the earth misery and pain, which are the only vices! Redeunt saturnia regna! We all saw him as he passed through our city to his western paradise—insane with expectation. He told us that in four years America would be regenerated; that the whole world would soon throng at the gates of his communities for admittance, and that the true and only millennium, that of mutual co-operation, was at hand. If we were incredulous as to his statements, and insensible of the force of his arguments, he unrolled his drawings of New Harmony, and pointing to the arrangements of his village, the conveniences for cooking, dancing, eating, sleeping, debating, working and nursing, in which he thought every possible want of human nature was anticipated, and every temptation to evil abolished, asked us with a smile of pity and triumph, if misery or vice could enter there.

We have all heard of his declaration of mental independence; in which, with the glee of a maniac, he tore off all that hides the nakedness of our nature; rejected virtue and vice from his scheme, as phantoms of superstition, and denied in substance the very providence of God.

His project ended, as only it could end, in disgrace and anarchy. But it will be well for our country, if the doctrines which he taught have not taken root in our rank soil, to spread and bear the fruit at some future day, of atheistical licentiousness.

It is consoling to think, that from the same materials out of which the evil philosophy of Robert Owen could extract only poison, men imbued with better wisdom have drawn practical and solid benefits.

Another of the proprietors of New Lanark, a man whose name will rank with Howard and Clarkson, resolved on attempting an experiment, at his own expense, upon the practicability of separating, from the wild and fantastic schemes of Owen, the wise and useful reforms that were blended with them. He accordingly purchased a farm in the neighbourhood of London, which he parcelled out into small lots, that were rented to labourers. A certain course of tillage was laid down; the tenants formed a little community, which superintended their common interests, and adopted certain regulations, though without interfering with the right which all men possess to the profits of their own industry.

I shall give in a future number the constitution, drawn up for the government of these little communities, several of which are now in existence. They have been flourishing and happy, and are a good example for the imitation of the proprietors of our great cotton and woollen factories; an order of men upon whom there rests, at the present time, a great responsibility, in regard to the success of our free institutions, as great perhaps as upon any class of citizens "north of the Potomac!"

FRENCH OPINION OF SCOTT'S LIFE OF NAPOLEON.

Translated for the Friend, from the Revue Encyclopedique.

The Life of Napoleon Bonaparte, to which is prefixed a sketch of the French Revolution, by the Author of Waverly. London, 1827. 9 vols. octavo.

When we formerly began an analysis of this work for an English journal, we asked ourselves the question, whether Walter Scott possessed a pencil of sufficient strength and variety to paint the conqueror of Europe, and the oppressor of France; whether, as an Englishman, he could be just to the embittered enemy of his country; or, as a tory, he could be inflexible towards the ambitious despot, who, beginning his public career with the language of Brutus, brought to the throne the ideas of Tarquin and Octavius; whether, among the various opinions formed of this astonishing man, the author of Waverly could preserve the impartiality of a historian; whether he could follow through his wonderful career that orphan of Brienne, that simple officer of artillery, who, born without fortune, raised himself by victory over the ruins of monarchy and republic, lived to see his standards float upon the towers of the proudest capitals of Europe, and died upon a solitary rock, in exile and captivity. While he condemns his insatiable ambition, will the narrator record the blessings which that very ambition has procured for France; and if, electrified by the lofty deeds of Napoleon, he celebrates his warlike superiority, will he paint, with equal skill, his public qualities, and his private vices and virtues? We have now concluded the perusal of the nine volumes devoted to the history of our revolution, and to that of the man who destroyed the liberties of many nations; these doubts are now satisfactorily answered, and we think that it can be said with truth, that the powers of Walter Scott fall beneath the task which he has undertaken. It is not a history which he offers to the public; it is a romance, of which the personages alone are historical. We can well recognise, in his volumes, the character of the man, who, for fifteen entire years, ruled France as a master, soldier and general, conqueror and legislator, shunning pleasure, lightly supporting privations; enterprising, ambitious organizer of systems; knowing well to obtain the love of nations by the language of liberty, and the affections of his troops by the charms of glory; plain in his person, magnificent and haughty in his court; despising religion, which he made subservient to his poetical views; pretending a love for liberty, and reigning by despotism; modest after victory, but sometimes wanting in resolution after defeat; in fine, a good father and a good husband; such is, indeed, the character of Napoleon, as it has been traced for us by public events. Thus, it is not in sketching his character that Walter Scott disfigures history; but it is in the narration of facts. His survey of our revolution contains a great number of errors. He gives, as certain, statements which are frequently forgeries; he exaggerates, in imitation of obscure pamphleteers, the excesses, in reality too deplorable, of periods of disorder and war. In one place, he ascribes to the club of jacobins the combination of the Gardes Française with the inhabitants of Paris; while this club really never existed until three months after the occurrence of which he speaks. Further on, upon the testimony of an emigrant named Peltier, he greatly exaggerates the number of victims who perished in the catastrophes of the 2d and 3d of September. In the history of Napoleon, he still expresses doubts relative to the alleged poisoning of the sick at Jaffa; although so many proofs are in existence that such a crime is not to be attributed to that chieftain.

It would be tedious to enumerate all the errors into which Walter Scott has fallen; and I abandon this task to that one of the contributors to the Revue Encyclopedique, who undertakes the analysis of this last work of the Scottish writer. I will content myself by adding that the production of Walter Scott is, most generally, but a pure compilation; that I have remarked in it, whole pages literally translated from French works; such as the recital of the occurrences of the 8th and 9th of Thermidor, which is entirely borrowed from the history of M. Mignet. We also find numerous deficiencies in the narrative: thus the conspiracy of Babeuf hardly obtains a few lines; while the description of some battle may occupy several leaves of the book.

We ought not, perhaps, to say that Scott is guilty of partiality. In every instance where he enters into general discussions, his ideas are just, elevated, and philosophical. It is in the details that he errs; and in all cases where the republicans and royalists are placed in contact in his narrative, the latter uniformly meet with his approbation.

The style of this work, in fine, will not increase the reputation of Walter Scott. It contains pages written with eloquence and energy; but, in general, it is flat, diffuse, and wanting in dramatic effect. F. D.

The heart and the understanding are not always in perfect unison—the latter being frequently under a deep delusion, while the former is the dwelling of virtue and piety.

MESSIAH'S ADVENT.

'He came unto his own, and his own received him not.' St. John i. 2.

He came not in his people's day,
Of miracle and might,
When awe-struck nations owned their sway,
And conquest crowned each fight;—
When nature's self with wonder saw
Her ancient power, her boasted law,
To feeble man give way—
The elements of earth and heaven,
For Israel stayed—for Judah riven!

Pillar and cloud Jehovah gave,
High emblems of his grace;
And clove the rock, and smote the wave,
Moved mountains from their place;—
But judgment was with mercy blent—
In thunder was the promise sent—
Fierce lightning veiled his face;
The jealous God—the burning law—
Were all the chosen people saw.

Behold then—pilgrim tribes no more—
The promised land their own;
And blessings theirs of sea and shore,
To other realms unknown:
From age to age a favoured line
Of mighty kings, and seers divine,
A temple and a throne:—
Not then, but in their hour of shame,
Wo, want, and weakness—then "He came."

Not in the earthquake's rending force,
Not in the blasting fire;
Not in the strong wind's rushing course,
Came He, their soul's desire!
Forerunners of his coming these,
Proclaiming over earth and seas,
As God, his might and ire:—
The still, small voice—the hovering dove,
Proved him Messiah—spoke him "Love!"

Of life the way, of light the spring
Eternal, undefiled;
Redeemer, Prophet, Priest, and King—
Yet came he as a child!
And Zion's favoured eye grown dim,
Knew not her promised Lord in Him,
The lowly and the mild!
She saw the manger, and the tree,
And scornful cried—"Can this be He!"

STANZAS.

Life is a faithless ocean!
Upon its tide awhile,
Our way is cheer'd by flattering gales,
And summer's gentle smile:
O could it thus for ever be,
Our course were gladly run;
Nor had my tears been shed for thee,
Thus early lost, my son!

Few saw, or seeing knew thee,
My bright and beauteous boy!
The world—how little doth it heed
A parent's grief or joy!
We mourn thee, dear one, we alone—
Our wo shall sacred be;
The cold applause from others won,
We will not ask for thee.

Thy form of passing beauty
I see before me now,
The conscious look, the manly air
That graced thy lofty brow;
I saw in these, or deem'd I saw
The germ of noble things,
But now the thought exalts my pain—
A keener anguish brings.

'Twas not when thou wast dying,
I felt the weight of wo;
Nor when with solemn step and rite,
We palced thy limbs below;
It was the fearful moment, when
With prescience sadly true,
I first the dreaded day beheld
In the dim distant view:

It came—the hour of parting!
O God! and must we part!
I gazed upon his fading face,
And press'd him to my heart:
And she was there, whose constant watch
Was kept his couch above,
Whose wasted form and sunken eye
Told of a mother's love.

Why should the tie be sever'd,
It were so meet should last?
Why should our hopes so fairly bloom,
To wither in the blast?
For thou wast all my wishes crav'd,
Joy of her heart and mine,
And all a parent's love could do,
Was surely done by thine.

Beyond life's troubled ocean,
Thine is a better sphere,
And 'tis a soothing thought, to feel
We made thee happy here.
Beautiful Infant! doubly blest!
Two worlds 'twas thine to gain,
One that is far beyond all grief,
And this without its pain.

FOR THE FRIEND.

"Doctrines held by one part of Society, and which we believe to be sound and edifying, are pronounced by the other part to be unsound and spurious. From this, has resulted a state of things, that has proved destructive of peace and tranquillity; and in which the fruits of love and condescension have been blasted, and the comforts and enjoyments even of social intercourse greatly diminished."—Green-street Address of the 4th month.

There is scarcely any circumstance which has contributed more to disseminate the errors of Elias Hicks, than his specious professions of implicit belief in the light within. Too many of his admirers, neglecting to "take heed how they hear," or to examine for themselves into the nature and tendency of the opinions which he promulgates, have been carried away with the erroneous notion, that he preaches the same doctrines as were held by the Society in the beginning. That this is not the fact, is clearly demonstrable from his sermons. "By their fruits shall ye know them," is a criterion often appealed to by the followers of Elias Hicks, and we are willing to rest the decision of the case on this test.

In one of his sermons at New York, he tells his audience, "I declare unto you, that I have an evidence, and that I testify unto you nothing, of which I have not an evidence. I dare not speak at random, otherwise I should show that I departed from God's illuminating Spirit."—New-York Sermons, p. 137, 138.

From this it follows as a necessary consequence, that all the preaching of Elias Hicks flows immediately from that spirit by which he is actuated; and therefore the doctrines inculcated in his sermons, must be the fruit of his "Light within." I shall make some quotations from his discourses, to show the nature of his principles, and the consequences they lead to. In the Philadelphia Sermons, speaking of the Scriptures, he says:—

"All must go away. We must look no longer to the letter, let it come from what source, it may; it is no difference."—P. 112.

On page 119, alluding to the sacred writings, he says:—"They were not necessary, and perhaps ~~not~~ suited to any other people, than they to whom they were written."

"One would suppose, that to a rational mind, the hearing and reading the instructive parables of Jesus, would have a tendency to reform and turn men about; to truth, and lead them on in it. But they have no such effect."—P. 129.

"We have many demonstrations of this in the letter; but what does the letter do? What has it ever done? It can do nothing."—P. 171.

"The great and only thing needful, then, is to turn inward, and turn our backs upon the letter, for it is all shadow."—P. 225.

"Now the book we read in says, search the Scriptures; but this is incorrect; we must all see it is incorrect."—P. 314.

"It proves itself what it is: that it is nothing but a history of passing events, which occurred eighteen hundred years ago, a great portion of which may be true."—"Here we see Jesus calling them to an account for attending to the Scriptures; we see in a short time after, that by an application to these books contention entered, and divided Christian professors. They were divided by the letter; for it is the letter that kills—it is the letter that divides in Christendom. This is plain to every rational mind—it is as clear as the sun at noonday."—P. 315.

Such are the sentiments which Elias Hicks' light teaches, relative to the Holy Scriptures. That they are nothing but a mere history of passing events, a large portion of which may, or may not, be true—that they are not necessary, nor suited to any other people than those to whom they were written—that the great and only thing needful for us to do, is to turn inward, to the light; which he makes synonymous with turning our backs upon the Scriptures, for the Scriptures must all go away—we must no longer look to them. That they can do nothing at all—that even the parables of our blessed Lord have no such effect, as that of reforming men, and turning them to the truth. That the injunction, contained in Holy Writ, to search the Scriptures, incorrect—that our Lord himself, called the people of his day to an account; in other words, reprehended them for attending to the Scriptures—that an application to this book introduced contention into the church—that the Scriptures divide Christian professors, and kill the spiritual life, and that to every rational mind this is as plain as the sun at noonday.

These are a part of those sentiments, of which the followers of Elias Hicks declare in their Address of the 4th month, that "they believe them to be sound and edifying." It is to these, too, that the Epistle of the 6th month has reference, where it complains that "Friends travelling in the ministry with certificates from their monthly and quarterly meetings," "and other faithful friends," "were unjustly charged with undervaluing the Scriptures." How "unjustly" the charge was made, we cheerfully leave it to every Christian reader to determine!

The assertions of Elias Hicks relative to the Holy Scriptures, are the very reverse of those which the Society of Friends has always held respecting them. It is therefore not surprising, that his doctrine on this point, should be "pronounced unsound and spurious" by every true Quaker.

William Penn says, "We bless God for the Scriptures; we read them with comfort and advantage, and they are profitable to the perfecting the man of God, through the assistance of the Spirit. As face answers to face in a glass, so we say and know, the Spirit and Scripture answer each other." Vol. ii. p. 199. "Tis true, all the Spirit leads to is according to the Scriptures; it overturns them not." Vol. ii. p. 338.

In another place, speaking of the sacred Scriptures, he says, "With reverence we read, believe, and desire to always obey, the mind and will of God therein contained; and let that doctrine be accursed that would overturn them."

Again—"Whereas we in truth and sincerity believe them to be of divine authority, given by the inspiration of God through holy men—they speaking or writing as they were moved by the Holy Ghost: That they are a declaration of those things most surely believed by the primitive Christians, and that as they contain the mind and will of God, and are his commands to us, so they in that respect are his declaratory word, and therefore are obligatory on us; and are profitable for doctrine, reproof, correction, and instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, and thoroughly furnished to every good work." "We both love, honour, and prefer them, before all books in the world, ever choosing to express our belief of the Christian faith and doctrine, in the terms thereof, and rejecting all principles or doctrines whatsoever, that are repugnant thereunto."—Vol. ii. p. 878.

George Fox, speaking of the Holy Scriptures, declares, "We receive and embrace them as the most authentic and perfect declaration of Christian faith, indited by the Holy Spirit of God, that never errs." And in his declaration to the governor and council of Barbadoes, he says, "Concerning the Scriptures, we believe they were given forth by the Holy Spirit of God through the holy men of God, who, as the Scripture itself declares, spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost: We believe they are to be read, believed, and fulfilled, (he that fulfils them is Christ,) and they are profitable for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works; and are able to make wise unto salvation, through faith in Christ Jesus."

We would earnestly request all our readers to compare these sentiments of our primitive Friends with those of Elias Hicks on the same subjects. The contradiction must be obvious at once.

LUTHER.

FOR THE FRIEND.

THE PROSE OF MILTON.

On this side of the Atlantic, at least, we have generally been in the habit of considering Milton only in his character of a great poet—only then as in

"His flight

Through utter and through middle darkness borne,
With other notes than to th' Orphean lyre,
He sung of chaos and eternal night"—

Or fed "on thoughts that voluntary move harmonious numbers,"

"He rode sublime

Upon the seraph wings of ecstasy,"

beyond the boundaries of "this visible, diurnal sphere."

But he was also a distinguished writer of prose; and his being so little known among us in that capacity, must be ascribed principally to the extreme scarcity of his printed prose works. That difficulty is now removed by the recent publication in Boston of a selection from these, in 2 vols. We have been much gratified in looking through these volumes, and as many of our readers may not have met with them, we have thought a few extracts might be introduced with advantage into our columns.

The style of these writings may at first view appear rather repulsive; beside a certain quaintness of expression, there is a harshness, and an occasional involution in the construction of the sentences; encumbered also by frequent parenthesis, by no means calculated to please the fastidious delicacy of those who are never satisfied but with the artificial smoothness of well rounded periods. He remarks of himself, in allusion to this department of his labours—"I should not choose this manner of writing, wherein knowing myself inferior to myself, led by the genial power of nature to another task, I have the use, as I may account, but of my left hand." Notwithstanding these blemishes, however, which are characteristic of the writings of that period, there is much in the style of Milton to excite our admiration; it savours strongly of his pre-eminently rich and pregnant mind; appears a fit vehicle of those high thoughts and magnificent conceptions, as of a mind surcharged and straitened to be delivered. It is bold, nervous, stately, majestic; sometimes rugged, and sometimes breaking forth with a splendour of diction and illustration, scarcely any where exemplified but in his own matchless work, the "Paradise Lost."

The selection we shall first introduce, merits attention, not only as affording additional evidence of the author's deep, inbred piety, but of his capacity to enter adequately into a feeling and conception of those exercises which appertain to the priestly office, under a right sense of the burden and ministration of the word; and it is also calculated to encourage to faithfulness, by elevating the hopes of those who, though in a more private relation, are nevertheless conscious of having received valuable gifts—or in the language of the Psalmist, of "bearing precious seed," yet go forth, if we may so speak, weeping at the desolations which are abroad, and who are almost ready to shrink at the difficulties which present in the way.

How happy were it for this frail, and as it may be truly called, mortal life of man, since all earthly things which have the name of good and convenient in our daily use, are withal so cumbersome and full of trouble, if knowledge, yet which is the best and lightsomest possession of the mind, were, as the common saying is, no burden; and that what it wanted of being a load to any part of the body, it did not with a heavy advantage overlay upon the spirit! For not to speak of that knowledge that rests in the contemplation of natural causes and dimensions, which must needs be a lower wisdom, as the object is low, certain it is, that he who hath obtained in more than the scantiest measure to know any thing distinctly of God, and of his true worship, and what is infallibly good and happy in the state of man's life, what in itself evil and miserable, though vulgarly not so esteemed; he that hath obtained to know this, the only high valuable wisdom indeed, remembering also that God, even to a strictness, requires the improvement of these his entrusted gifts, cannot but sustain a sorer burden of mind, and more pressing than any supportable toil or weight which the body can labour under, how and in what manner he shall dispose and employ those sums of knowledge and illumination, which God had sent him into this world to trade with.

And that which aggravates the burden more is, that, having received amongst his allotted parcels, certain precious truths of such an orient lustre as no diamond can equal, which nevertheless he has in charge to put off at any cheap rate, yea, for nothing to them that will, the great merchants of this world, fearing that this course would soon discover and disgrace the false glitter of their deceitful wares where-with they abuse the people, like poor Indians with beads and glasses, practice by all means how they may suppress the vending of such rarities, and at such a cheapness as would undo them, and turn their trash upon their hands. Therefore, by gratifying the corrupt desires of men in fleshly doctrines, they stir them up to prosecute with hatred and contempt all these that seek to bear themselves uprightly in this their spiritual factory; which they foreseeing, though they cannot but testify of truth and the excellency of that heavenly traffic which they bring, against what opposition or danger soever, yet needs must it sit heavily upon their spirits, that being in God's prime intention and their own, selected heralds of peace; and dispensers of treasure inestimable without price to them that have no peace, they find in the discharge of their commission, that they are made the greatest variance and offence, a very sword and fire both in house and city over the whole earth. This is that which the sad prophet Jeremiah laments; 'Wo is me, my mother, that thou hast borne me a man of strife and contention!' And although divine inspiration must certainly have been sweet to those ancient prophets, yet the irksomeness of that truth which they brought, was so unpleasant unto them, that every where they call it a burden. Yea, that mysterious book of Revelation, which the great evangelist was bid to eat, as it had been some eyebrightening eluctuary of knowledge and foresight, though it were sweet in his mouth, and in the learning, it was bitter in his belly, bitter in the denouncing. Nor was this hid from the wise poet Sophocles, who, in that place of his tragedy, where Tiresias is called to resolve king Œdipus in a matter which he knew would be grievous, brings him in bemoaning his lot, that he knew more than other men. For surely to every good and peaceable man, it must in nature needs be a hateful thing to be the displeaser and molester of thousands; much better would it like him doubtless to be the messenger of gladness and contentment, which is his chief intended business to all mankind, but that they resist and oppose their own true happiness.

But when God commands to take the trumpet, and blow a dolorous or a jarring blast, it lies not in man's will what he shall say, or what he shall conceal. If he shall think to be silent, as Jeremiah did, because of the reproach and derision he met with daily, 'and all his familiar friends watched for his halting,' to be revenged on him for speaking the truth, he would be forced to confess as he confessed, 'his word was in my heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones; I was weary with forbearing, and could not stay;' which might teach these times not suddenly to condemn all things that are sharply spoken, or vehemently written, as proceeding out of the stomach, virulence, and ill nature; but to consider that no man can be justly offended with him that shall endeavour to impart and bestow, without any gain to himself, those sharp but saving words, which would be a terror and a torment to him to keep back. For me, I have determined to lay up as the best treasure and solace of a good old age, if God vouchsafe it me, the honest liberty of free speech for my youth, where I shall think it available in so dear a concernment as the church's good. For if I be either by disposition or what other cause, too inquisitive, or suspicious of myself or mine own doings, who can help it? But this I foresee, that should the church be brought under heavy oppression, and God have given me ability the while to reason against that man that should be the author of so foul a deed, or should she, by blessing from above on the industry and courage of faithful men, change this her distracted estate into better days, without the least furtherance or contribution of those few talents which God at that present had lent me; I foresee what stories I should hear within myself, all my life after, of discouragement and reproach. 'Timorous and ungrateful, the church of God is now again at the foot of her insulting enemies, and thou bewailest; what matters it for thee, or thy bewailing? When time was, thou couldst not find a syllable of all that thou hast read or studied, to utter in her behalf. Yet ease and leisure were given thee for thy retired thoughts, out of the sweat of other men. Thou hadst the diligence, the parts, the language of a man, if a vain subject were to be adorned or beautified; but when the cause of God and his church was to be pleaded, for which purpose that tongue was given thee which thou hast, God listened if he could hear thy voice among his zealous servants, but thou wert dumb as a beast; from henceforward be that which thine own brutish silence hath made thee.'

Or else I should have heard on the other ear; 'Slothful, and ever to be set light by, the church hath now overcome her late distresses after the unwearied labours of many her true servants that stood up in her defence; thou also wouldst take upon thee to share amongst them of their joy; but wherefore thou? Where canst thou show any word or deed of thine which might have hastened her peace? Whatever thou dost now talk, or write, or look, is the aim of other men's active prudence and zeal. Dare not now to say, or do any thing better than thy former sloth and infancy; or if thou darest, thou dost impudently to make thrifty purchase of boldness to thyself, out of the painful merits of other men; what before was thy sin, is now thy duty, to be abject and worthless.'

These, and such like lessons as these, I know would have been my matins duly, and my even-song.

But now by this little diligence, mark what a privilege I have gained with good men and saints, to claim my right of lamenting the tribulations of the church, if she should suffer, when others that have ventured nothing for her sake, have not the honour to be admitted mourners. But, if she lift up her drooping head and prosper, among those that have something more than wished her welfare, I have my charter and freehold of rejoicing to me and my heirs.

FOR THE FRIEND.

SKETCHES OF EARLY PENNSYLVANIA HISTORY--NO. III.

In my present number I shall pursue in brief outline the policy of Pennsylvania, in reference to the Indian natives, or at least of that part of her citizens who remained attached to the precepts and practice of her first founders. In this sketch I shall be indebted to the interesting discourse of Roberts Vaux, though I may not always specifically quote from it.

The territory which William Penn acquired had been occupied to a considerable extent by the Swedes and Dutch previous to his arrival, who had introduced among the Indians that bane of human happiness, in savage as well as civilized life, namely, ardent spirits. The operation of this dreadful agent on the poor natives, was of the most disastrous kind; their unsubdued passions were rendered doubly ferocious, whilst every nobler and more exalted feeling which belonged to their nature, was obscured, if not obliterated. Wars, murders and disease, made fearful ravages among them, and whilst under the influence of these intoxicating draughts, they became the easy victims of craft and artifice, of robbery and spoil. One of the first acts of William Penn, on his arrival in 1682, was to remedy this evil as far as possible, by a legal enactment, subjecting every person to a considerable fine who sold ardent spirits to the Indians. The yearly meeting of Pennsylvania also took the subject into consideration, and in 1685 made a rule of discipline against the practice, which was revived in 1687 with a singular addition, which I presume in this day of general license and false liberty, would be put under the same sentence of condemnation as divers other wholesome regulations, by some styled bigoted and oppressive; it runs thus:—"And for the more effectually preventing this evil practice aforesaid, we advise that this our testimony be entered in every monthly meeting book, and that every Friend belonging to the said meeting do subscribe the same."

Concern for the welfare of this injured race, was constantly manifested by the Society of Friends, at that period, forming a majority of the inhabitants of Pennsylvania, and frequently in their annual assemblies they alluded to the hospitality and kindness of the Indians, as furnishing powerful reasons for a just and mild course of conduct towards them. But the influx of mercenary adventurers into the province, who came with far different views from those of our ancestors, "soon polluted the land which had been consecrated to justice, mercy and peace."

But "the evil tempers exhibited by those who sought their own aggrandizement at the cost of every virtuous principle, served to animate and enlarge the minds of others to perform acts worthy of their high calling, and thus present in bold relief the genuine and consistent character of the men, who were the founders and architects of the honourable fame of primitive Pennsylvania."

The discontents which arose from this and other causes, "occasioned much solicitude in the mind of Penn and his Friends, who assiduously exerted their authority in the legislature and elsewhere, to punish and prevent trespasses upon the acknowledged rights of the natives." Although the final departure of William Penn from his province in 1701, was a serious loss to the cause of benevolence and humanity, yet it did not intermit the labours of his friends and associates in the government, for the conciliation of the Indians and the melioration of their condition. Penn had given an example of attention to the welfare of this people, not only by acts of justice and by wholesome counsel when they came to Philadelphia, but also by visits to their towns in the interior; and this good example was followed by many of his Friends. An accident of a very touching character, occurred in one of these missions of benevolence, performed by Thomas Chalkly, who in 1705 visited the Seneca and Shawanese Indians on the Susquehanna. "It is related that when he and his companions were about to part from the assembled Indians, an ancient queen called Ojuncho, who is represented to have been a person of distinction, and who spoke frequently in their councils, thus addressed the venerable minister of peace:—

"I look upon your coming as more than natural—you came not to buy and sell, and get gain, but for our good—we desire the Great Spirit to keep you from harm on your journey, and we bid you farewell."

The Indians, when asked why a female should, contrary to their customs, have obtained such respect among them, returned the quaint and appropriate answer—"it is because some women are wiser than some men."

In 1707, the assembly sent a deputation to William Penn, then in London, to solicit the recall of Governor Evans, who was charged with unwarrantable conduct towards the Indians. This application shows that a lively care was exercised by the legislature for the protection of Indian rights.

In 1711 a requisition of money was made by Queen Anne, for aid in carrying on a war in Canada—those members of the assembly who were conscientiously opposed to war, objected to the tax, and gave the additional reason for declining payment, viz. that Pennsylvania had expended, and was expending large sums of money for the preservation of peace among the Indians. This fact "is a proof of the untiring labours of at least a portion of those in authority at that period, to maintain amicable relations with the natives."

It appears that the Indians had the discernment to perceive, and the gratitude to acknowledge, the laudable designs of those amongst the whites, who were desirous to promote their real welfare; for at a conference held in Philadelphia in 1713, attended by a large number of Delawares, Sassoonan, one of their chiefs, thus spoke:—

"The calumet, which we carried to all the nations, we have now brought here; it is a sure bond of peace amongst them, and between us and you; we desire by holding up our hands, that the God of Heaven may witness, that there may be a firm peace between you and us for ever. We heard of some murmurs among some of our people, and to prevent any trouble, we come to renew our former bond of friendship. When William Penn first came, he made a clear and open road, all the way to the Indians! We desire the same may be kept open, that all obstructions may be removed, of which, on our side, we will take care. Let the peace be so firm, that you and us, joined hand and hand, even if the greatest tree falls, it shall not divide us. As our fathers have been in peace, so let us, and our children, as they come into the world hereafter, be in peace, that it may be continued from generation to generation, for ever."

This remarkable speech, while it bears honourable testimony to the character of Penn, shows the manly and generous temper of the race with which he treated.

During the administration of governor Keith, which commenced in 1717, the inhabitants of the province and their aboriginal friends, sustained a severe affliction in the death of William Penn; and while suffering under its immediate pressure, the alarming intelligence reached the governor, that a body of southern Indians had actually invaded the settlements on the Susquehanna, in hostile array, against the Six Nations. This was the first time that the inhabitants of Pennsylvania had been threatened with the horrors of war; and the assembly urged the executive to take immediate measures not only to prevent any hostilities against the whites, but also to reconcile and mediate between the belligerent tribes, promising that the legislature would vote the most liberal supplies for the attainment of this good end. The governor accordingly made a journey to Virginia to prevail on the authorities there to influence the Potowmac Indians; and after his return held a treaty at Conestogue with the deputies of the Five Nations. This interview occurred in 1721. In delineating the causes of their present difficulties, one of the chiefs said, "that all their disorders arose from the use of rum, which took away their sense and memory; that they had no such liquor among themselves, and were hurt with what the white people brought among them." He mentioned William Penn in terms of the most grateful affection, styling him "The great and good Onas," and concluded his speech in the following characteristic language: "The Five Nations faithfully remember all their ancient treaties, and now desire that the chain of friendship may be made so strong, as that none of the links can ever be broken; but as a chain may become rusty, we desire it may now be so well cleaned, as to remain brighter and stronger than ever it was before." This conference exhibits in a prominent point of view, the advantages which resulted from a kind treatment of the Indians, and gives conclusive evidence that nothing more was wanting to preserve peace than a mild and just conduct towards them, such as the illustrious founder of our state had practised and enforced. THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH, 1, 1827.

It would be ungrateful in us to withhold our acknowledgments for the liberal patronage which the Friend has received. It is an expression of satisfaction with our labours, which is truly gratifying, and which we shall spare no exertion to merit. This continued progressive increase of our subscription list, has justified us in making some change in the appearance of the journal. The last, and the present number, are printed with an entirely new type; and we hope are executed in a style at once agreeable to our readers, and creditable to the work itself. Circumstances beyond the control of the editor and publisher, and which occur notwithstanding all our care to avoid them, sometimes prevent our subscribers from receiving their numbers regularly. We respectfully request those who may be thus unpleasantly disappointed, to give us information, and forward particular directions how the paper shall be addressed to them. No pains shall be spared to remedy the evil.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have a number of valuable contributions in reserve, for which we hold ourselves obliged to our good friends. It is but due to them to observe, that allotting to one the priority in point of time over another, is by no means to be considered as the measure of our preference, but rather for the purpose of securing a suitable diversity for each number; and therefore it may sometimes happen, that an article for which our partiality is greatest, may be the longest deferred.

It seems right also that we should offer some remarks upon another class of productions, which are accumulating on our files, both in prose and verse. Many of these afford evidence of talent at composition, worth cherishing and cultivating, yet do not entirely come up to the character which we aim at for the Friend. This, however, ought not to operate as a discouragement, or prevent further attempts. On the contrary, such should be incited to renewed exertions, in the remembrance that several eminently distinguished literary characters, corrected, concocted, and elaborated abundantly, before they could satisfy themselves; and others wrote much which their riper judgment condemned to the flames. The artisan does not produce a perfect piece of cutlery at a single heat; and after it has been fully wrought out, it must undergo the process of the polisher, and of garnishing.

A REPROOF TO THE UNFAITHFUL.

How long shall the Spirit of the Lord strive with you, O ye careless and unfaithful, who are convinced of the truth of God, and come to meetings, confess to the testimony, and profess it in the world, and are yet unsanctified and unregenerated, and so have no part nor lot in the blessed word of life eternal. What can ye hope for from the hand of the Lord at the hour of your death and day of your judgment? Will not God remember unto you the day of your visitation, his strivings, his waitings, his long suffering; how often he would have gathered you, that ye might have inherited substance. Awake, awake, ye sensual, ye earthly minded professors of the truth, that Christ Jesus may give you life; for I may say with the apostle, and that weeping too, there are too many unworthy of the great favour and mercy of God, who under all their pretences to religion, walk in the way of those whose god is their belly; who glory in their shame, and who mind earthly things, pursuing uncertain riches, and trusting in their store; if redeemed from scandalous things, yet abounding too much in more hidden evils—envy, covetousness, high-mindedness, meddling in other folks' matters, out of the watch, out of the cross that crucifies the flesh and delivers the spirit to serve God in the newness of life. O! knowing the terrors of the Lord, let me persuade you while it is to-day to hear his voice, his living word that cleanseth the young man's way; and believe in the light whilst ye have the light, that ye also may be the children of light, in which the nations of them that are saved must walk; lest it pass away from you and the night overtake you, in which the works of peace cannot be wrought. O friends, your doom will be the most dismal, and your end the most horrible of all others that are called, and would not do it. Will not he make such Jews of the synagogue of Satan, who are not Jews inward, neither your circumcision that of the heart?

Be assured, that in the day of his winnowing, ye shall go to the chaff, and the wind of his fury shall drive you from the joy of his presence for ever. Therefore receive my counsel in the love of God, be faithful to his truth, wait and watch in it, that ye may be delivered in the hour of temptation. It will try your, limit your desires, bound your affections, it will make you humble; so God will teach you, and so will he guide you in judgment, and clothe you with salvation. I have a trouble upon my soul, and my spirit is pained for you. I would have nothing lost but the son of perdition. I would have you all gathered and nothing cast away that is called of God. I would have all come to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, and be saved. This I send you as a farewell to you in the name and power of the God of my salvation, and in so doing am clear of you all. Your true friend,

WILLIAM PENN.

A VISITATION TO THE ENQUIRING.

Ye are the workmanship of God as well as I, and he hath made us for an end of glory to himself. Come see, search and try how we answer it. Ye have souls as well as I, and ye must give an account as well as I, for we must all die and come to judgment. Turn in therefore and see how it stands betwixt you and your Judge, for by Jesus Christ, the light of the world, will God judge all men. Therefore, with the light of Christ which is within you, judge yourselves, that ye may not be judged: put away the evil of your doings, love the light, join to it, walk in it, it will give thee a sight of the spirit of the world, and the fruits of it, from the Spirit of God and the fruits thereof, by which ye will receive an understanding of him that is true, whom if ye receive ye shall live in him that is true, and he will give you power to become the children of God, born not of flesh and blood, but of the incorruptible word and will of God. O hear his voice that ye may be his sheep; let him go before you, and do ye follow him, and he will give unto you eternal life. O ye hungry and thirsty ones that want, seek, and cry for eternal life, his light within you that brings life and immortality to light. And if it should be said, can any good come out of Nazareth, can such a day of small things bring salvation? I say, O come and see, for we who have believed have seen his glory to be that of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and full of truth; he is the good Samaritan, the physician of value, he cures our diseases, he heals our breaches, he leads us in the ways of pleasantness and in the paths of peace. There are riches in his reproaches, and a crown in his cross. Remember who desired eternal life, and what hindered; therefore give up all, let not Isaac be spared when he calls, and follow him fully. Out of him the enemy is too strong for you; in him ye are too strong for the enemy: therefore, wait in the light of Christ, and watch. This is painful to flesh and blood, but that must not inherit the kingdom. It brings the soul into the liberty of the sons of God, where the peace of God and the joy of his salvation far for it is just with God to give such up to strong delusions, who hold the truth in unrighteousness, and profess it in their own spirits, not in the Spirit and power of God, whose tongues are their own, whose wills and affections are their own, and under the profession of truth can give them their swing! Such as these become the subjects of Satan's devices, and too often by a loose conversation or high-mindedness, and unsubjectedness, cause grief, and give great trouble to the churches of Christ; for many may never leave the profession of the truth, that may be troublers of the peace of Jerusalem here, and vessels of wrath hereafter. Be therefore warned, ye foolish virgins, ye vain professors of the truth. Pray, fear, and dread of the end. I send this caution to you, that ye may repent and do your first works O that ye may have eternal life, that ye may not miss of your desire through the subtle working of the enemy of your souls, that seeks to divert you, from the right way of God by many stumbling blocks; but be not offended in him and he may bless you; remember that all things are possible with him with whom ye have to do, for all power in heaven and earth is given him that hath enlightened you; therefore do not murmur, do not despond; do not presume, but hearken to his voice, in which the prince of this world hath no part, and he will give you power to resist him. And remember that to them that overcome, shall be given a new name, and they shall have right to eat of the tree of life that stands in the midst of the Paradise of God. May God shed abroad his love abundantly in your hearts to the love and obedience of the truth, that ye may be all saved in the day of the Lord, in whose visiting love I bid you all farewell. Your well wishing friend,

WILLIAM PENN.

FOR THE FRIEND.

One of the lamentable and wide spreading evils arising from the unhappy schism in the Society, is the general dissemination of unfounded and erroneous statements. The injurious effects of this circumstance are not confined to any particular class. Anxious to support the cause in which we embark, we are too apt to credit every flying report, which we deem favourable to our purpose; and without inquiring into its merits, promote its circulation, until, with many, it obtains the character of fact. In numerous instances, such reports would be discovered on examination, to be wholly destitute of any foundation; but for want of taking this precaution, many well meaning persons become the subjects of mischievous deception, and have been deeply prejudiced and embittered against their truest friends. Others, through the baneful influence of falsehood and wilful misrepresentation, are gradually enlisted in the cause of libertinism and unbelief, until the prospect of their rescue from the snare into which they are decoyed, becomes almost hopeless.

Finding that they have been often misled, some preface their narrations with various cautionary phrases, in order to secure themselves from any responsibility, which neither make truth of their relations, nor completely remedy the evil to which their hearers are exposed. The next person, confiding in the veracity of his author, and perhaps forgetting that his story was mere rumour, gives it the colouring of fact; and thus, while we flatter ourselves with being very guarded in our assertions, we may be the involuntary vehicles of untruth and misstatement, prejudicial to private character and the cause of religion at large. The safe habit of taking heed how we hear is insensibly destroyed, which will soon be followed with neglecting to take heed how we speak. In this way many are made the dupes of every plausible tale, and are drawn into the current of detraction, concluding that the support of their cause is sufficient authority, even if it be at the sacrifice of correct principle, and the substantial reputation of their opponents. As it is altogether possible that a steady and inflexible regard to truth, may be imperceptibly weakened by the operations of this news-telling spirit, would it not be well to appropriate occasionally a column of the Friend, for the purpose of inculcating the benefits of keeping strictly to the truth, and to exhibit the odiousness of the vice of lying?

INTERESTING DECISION.

The Commonwealth, } Indictment for the vs. } murder of his wife.
William Leshner. }

At the swearing of the jury in this case, at the present term of the Oyer and Terminer, Isaac W. Morris, a member of the society of Friends, being called as a juror, declared to the court his unwillingness and inability to find a verdict of conviction, whatever might be the evidence, in a capital case.—The attorney for the commonwealth, thereupon, offered to challenge the juror for cause. This was objected to by the counsel of the prisoner; they alleged that the declaration of the juror was no cause of challenge, and contended that he should be affirmed. After argument at length on each side,

Chief Justice Gibson said in substance, that he considered the point as recognised and ruled by the late Chief Justice Tilghman and himself, in a former case in the same court,* where a member of the Friends' Society was committed to prison for refusing to serve as a juror, in a capital trial. The case fell within none of the causes of challenge laid down in the books—it was an error and a mere abstract opinion of the juror's; if the prisoner had advantage by it, the Court was not to deprive him of it; and he thought the juror should be affirmed, as being "omni exceptione major."

Judge Rodgers, who had been called from the Court of Nisi Prius, adjoining, to take part in the decision, in giving his opinion, denied the right of the Court to place the juror in a situation to violate his conscientious rights; such interference would be a violation of the constitution. "Lead us not into temptation," said Judge R. is our daily prayer; and to compel the juror to act either against his conscience, or the law, would be to tempt him to wrong. The obvious religious persuasion of the juror confirmed him in believing his declaration was a sufficient cause for challenge.

Judge Todd did not think the point decided in the former case referred to; that there, the juror had only asked to be excused. We are bound, said he, to support the law. Murder ought to have the punishment which the law provides, or no punishment at all. It would be an abuse of language to say that an assassin was tried by jurors who felt the convictions which Mr. Morris had expressed. He gave his opinion that the cause of challenge was good,

The juror was excused, and another substituted.

For the prisoner, Messrs. McLaughlin and D. P. Brown. For the commonwealth, Mr. Pettit.

The Alpine Horn.—The Alpine Horn is an instrument constructed with the bark of the cherry tree, like a speaking trumpet, and is used to convey sounds to a great distance. When the last rays of the sun gild the summit of the Alps, the shepherd who dwells highest on those mountains, takes his horn and calls aloud, "Praised be the Lord!" As soon as he is heard, the neighbouring shepherds leave their huts and repeat those words. The sounds last many minutes, for every echo of the mountains and grotto of the rocks repeat the name of God.—How solemn the scene! Imagination cannot picture to itself any thing more sublime; the profound silence that succeeds, the sight of those stupendous mountains, upon which the vault of heaven seems to rest, every thing excites the mind to enthusiasm. In the mean while the shepherds bend their knees, and pray in the open air, and soon after retire to their huts to enjoy the repose of innocence.

It is common to say that a liar will not be believed although he speaks the truth; but the converse of this proposition is equally true, but more unfortunate, that a man who has gained a reputation for veracity, will not be discredited, although he should utter that which is false; but he that would make use of a reputation for veracity to establish a lie, would set fire to the temple of truth, with a faggot stolen from her altar.

C. C. COLTON.

In the following chaste little production, imbued with so much of genuine devotional feeling, and which is taken from one of the back numbers of the Bucks County Patriot, we think we recognise an old acquaintance, the friend of our boyhood, with the peaceful solitudes of whose rural retreat we cherish very pleasant associations. We feel under considerable embarrassment as to the mode of address, or the terms of solicitation, with which to approach his coy muse—not coy in regard to himself, for she seems ever ready at his bidding, but as to all intermeddling of others with her rights and privileges—but we must say, that we should be exceedingly happy to open to him a free channel of communication for the embellishment of our columns, in prose or poetry, for in either department he is equally at home.

Be thou my strong rock for an house of defence to save me; for thou art my rock and my fortress.—Psalm xxxi. 2, 3.

A man shall be as an hiding place from the winds, and a covert from the tempest; as rivers of waters in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.—Isaiah xxxii. 2.

The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous runneth into it and is safe.—Rev. xviii. 10.

To living waters in a thirsty sand—

A tower of strength to which the righteous flee—
A rock's vast shadow in a weary land,

To these fond man hath loved to liken Thee,
Fountain of light and life! but, oh! how weak,
How feeble language, when of Thee we speak.

Yet Thou, whom highest heaven cannot contain,
Who fillest all things, (oh! consoling trust!)
Though throned in blessedness, wilt not disdain
The simple offering of a child of dust—
The broken accents of adoring love—
When the full heart impels the tongue to move.

A strong tower Thou!—to which the righteous flee,
And find that safety thou alone canst give;
But, Heavenly Father! to that tower, to Thee,
The sorrowing sinner too may fly and live,
The bruised reed that healing shadow share,
And living water ever flowing there.

When the transgressor who had wandered far
O'er the wild waste, the abode of sin and shame,
Repentant turn'd—did aught his progress bar
To that dear holy home from whence he came?
No! all his sorrows, all his soul's alarms
Found sweet oblivion in a Father's arms.

Oh! happy he who knows that Father near,
Who finds, when tempests of affliction beat,
From sin and sorrow, danger, doubt and fear,
The rock of ages a secure retreat;
Who makes the eternal pearl of price his own,
That bosom treasure, to the world unknown.

O! happy he! who in that awful hour
When earth must vanish from his closing eye,
Feels full assurance of that love, whose power
For the freed soul can happier worlds supply.
To him, resigned to all thou mayst ordain,
To live is pleasure, and to die is gain.

And without this can sought terrestrial merit,
The name of solace, for the immortal mind?
That emanation of the eternal spirit,
From Heaven descended and for Heaven designed.
What's man's experience but corroding care?
In life delusion, and in death despair!

* The case of the Commonwealth vs. James Allen, for murder, tried at the Oyer and Terminer, at Philadelphia, November, 1831.

DIED, on the evening of the 7th ult. in the 50th year of his age, THOMAS CARPENTER WHARTON, Merchant, of this city.

It is with feelings of more than ordinary interest, that we record the lamented decease of this our worthy and much esteemed fellow-citizen. But these emotions of sorrow and regret, which the removal of a long loved friend is calculated to awaken, are subdued and mitigated in the instance before us, by the pleasing reflection, that as regards him, death had no sting, nor has the grave obtained any victory.

With the holy confidence and tranquillity of a humble Christian, our departed friend bade a last adieu to the bright and busy scenes of life; he put off the pains, the perplexities and the sorrows of an inconstant and transitory world, "in the full assurance of faith;" and animated by a "hope replete with immortality, and eternal, holy life."

In the various relations of private and domestic life, he sustained an amiable and unsullied character. He was a tender and affectionate husband, a generous, sincere, and constant friend. As a man of business, he maintained a high standing for integrity, punctuality, and correctness in all his transactions.

But it was in the solitary chamber of sickness, while languishing under a tedious and acutely painful disease, during a confinement of many months' continuance, that the Christian virtues which adorned his character, shone most sweetly and with the brightest lustre. It was there, that he proved by the severest tests, the all-sufficiency of divine grace to triumph over those frailties and infirmities, which our fallen nature "is heir to;" and through steadfast faith in the merits and mediation of a crucified and risen Saviour, to conduct the ransomed soul, with holy serenity, and humble, yet confiding hope, through the dark valley of the shadow of death.

Through the course of his life, he had not been remarkable for an extraordinary attention to the subject of religion: indeed his habitual distrust of himself, and a sense of his own unworthiness, induced him always to speak of his devotional feelings with great diffidence, and rather to conceal than to make a parade of them. But it has seldom fallen to our lot to witness such unconquerable patience, so constantly maintained, under complicated and agonizing sufferings; or more cheerful, submissive resignation to every dispensation of an all-wise and merciful Creator, than his dying bed exhibited. If the keenness of his pain extorted an involuntary exclamation, which rarely occurred, he would immediately recall the expression; and even when earnestly petitioning at the throne of grace for a release from his afflicted tenement, he would close his humble supplication with the divine language, "Not my will, O Lord, but thine be done." These were not the results of human reason or human excellence—it was no fine-spun philosophy, nor any novel system of rational religion, that produced these blessed effects. It was the triumph of grace over nature;—they were the genuine fruits of that "grace and truth which come by Jesus Christ;" and of living faith in Him, as the propitiation, the Mediator, the Advocate and Saviour, of a fallen, a helpless world.

For months previous to his dissolution, the great subject of religion and the awful realities of eternity, were the theme of his meditation and his converse. He was little disposed for conversation, except on these momentous concerns; and during the many hours which passed away in silence, there is good cause to believe that the great work of redemption and sanctification was mercifully completing. For a few weeks, however, before the last solemn scene, he often spoke on religious subjects, and not unfrequently was engaged in fervent supplication on his own account, or in behalf of others. A few of those expressions were noted down at the time, and some of them may be profitably introduced here.

One afternoon, being much exhausted with pain and weakness, he thus ejaculated: "Oh Lord! if it seem good in thy sight, Oh sanctify me—clothe me with the white robe—permit me to enter into the marriage chamber—cleanse me in the precious blood of Jesus, the Lamb immaculate, who suffered on Calvary's mount!" In a few moments after, "Ah! when on the cross, he said to the thief, this day shalt thou be with me in paradise;—Oh! precious, precious words—I have no other hope: Lord, have mercy on me."

On another occasion, being in great pain, he said, "Oh! that I was in heaven.—Oh! most merciful God, blot out all my sins, and remember my transgressions no more." Alluding to his weak and exhausted condition, he exclaimed, "What a humbling state is this! I am as helpless as a little child. I think if the aspiring, scheming men of the world were to reflect, that all their pride and thriving must end at last in this, it might regulate their views a little;" then added, with much earnestness, "I have nothing in myself to trust to;—nothing but the blessed promises of a crucified Saviour, who suffered on Calvary's mount for the sins of the whole world." After some religious conversation with a friend, he remarked, "I hope I do not go too far when I say, I am now willing either to live or die;" and to another friend, "I die in peace with all the world."

Though not himself a member of the Society of Friends, he was deeply concerned on account of those erroneous principles which have induced so many to forsake their "first love," and often mourned over these in pathetic language. "They were a people," said he, alluding to the Society, "who for their peaceable spirit, were once the admiration of all around them—now thrown into confusion and disorder, by artful and designing men, who have done much, of late, to draw them off from the right foundation. Oh! it is cruel, cruel, to rob poor man, that is nothing of himself, of the only hope and comfort that he can depend on—the mercies and the merits of a crucified Saviour. I hope that many innocent ones that have been deluded, may see, ere it be too late, wherein they have been deceived; for all the sophistry, and reasoning, and false philosophy of man, that is now so prevalent, can never bring infinite Wisdom on a level with their views. Enough is shown us for our redemption; and secret things belong unto God. Well has the poet said, 'Men rush, where angels dare not tread.'"

It was the privilege of the writer of this article, to pass a night with his afflicted friend a short time previous to his decease—and to witness his patient resignation, his calm, confiding hope, and his unshaken faith in the mercy and meditation of the crucified Immanuel. As I silently watched by his dying bed, he was frequently absorbed in earnest and solemn supplication: "Oh most gracious and merciful Lord God! be pleased to blot out all my transgressions, and to remember my iniquities no more, for the sake of thy dear Son, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the immaculate Lamb, who offered up his life, and shed his precious blood, for poor sinners." Soon after this, he expressed the deep and abiding sense of his own unworthiness, which continually impressed his mind: "Oh!" said he, "what a poor creature I am—how unworthy of the many mercies I enjoy: I have every thing to make me comfortable; but ah! what would all these outward comforts do for me, if I had no hope for eternity. We are poor, lost, fallen creatures: we can do nothing for ourselves." His friend, alluding to the pardon and power that is in Christ Jesus, and the plenteous redemption which he has in store for those who sincerely and humbly ask it of him; he replied with much earnestness, and a countenance animated with joy, "Oh! yes: he is a most merciful and precious Saviour! My only hope is in him and his merits: I have nothing in myself to trust to." Some hours after, being assisted to turn in bed, he pleasantly observed, "What a poor, helpless creature I am, unable to do any thing for myself. Oh! could the busy, active men of this world but realize the idea, that they must at last come to this, how would it humble their pride; how would it subdue their ambition! Could they but see the awfulness of the eternal world, and the soul's salvation, as I now see it, how would it check their swift and thoughtless career!"

A friend calling to see him, inquired how he was; he replied, "Almost gone!" then added—"Oh that it was the Lord's will to take me, to release me from pain and suffering: but I desire to be patient, to trust in the immaculate Lamb, Christ Jesus, who suffered on Calvary's mount for the sins of the whole world; I have no other hope than in his merciful intercession. Ah! precious promise—consoling reflection! even the malefactor who died with Him was accepted, and an assurance given him, that he should be with him, that day, in paradise. And how encouraging is the parable of the labourers in the vineyard! Some were sent in, even at the eleventh hour, and received as much as those who had borne the burden and heat of the day—Oh! how comforting! O Lord God Almighty, receive my poor soul, through the blood of the Lamb, that taketh away the sins of the world."

On the evening previous to his release, being very low and feeble, he several times repeated the word "foundation." Some inquiry being made of him relative to what he said, he replied, with much exertion, "The only sure Foundation, Christ Jesus the Son of God." He then spoke, at intervals, of his glorious offices, his attributes, and mercies, which were, indeed, often the theme of his discourse; adding, "If some persons were to hear me, they might think I was very presuming—No, I am nothing—though I trust I have not led a wicked life; yet I have done the things I ought not to have done, and left undone those things which I ought to have done. I have nothing to trust in but mercy, mercy. It is not the fear of death that makes me speak thus: I held these sentiments when in health."

The last conflict was now evidently at hand, and he earnestly desired the prayers of those present on his behalf, expressing his belief that the prayers of the righteous would avail much. A short time previous to his departure, he slowly repeated, with a low and interrupted voice, "The Lord giveth—the Lord taketh away—blessed be his name—for ever—and ever."

It had several times been his earnest prayer, that if consistent with his Lord's will, his long continued sufferings might be alleviated before the solemn close arrived, and that at last he might pass quietly away. His petition was graciously answered; he departed with great ease and composure on the 7th ultimo, leaving his bereaved relatives the consoling assurance, that through adorable mercy, his purified and redeemed spirit has been permitted to join the general assembly of the just, in singing the holy anthem of the ransomed in heaven, "Worthy, worthy is the Lamb that was slain—for thou hast loved us, and washed us from our sins in thine own blood, and made us unto our God, kings and priests." Injurious application of cotton to the dressing of wounds.—The real cause of the ill effect of cotton when applied in the dressing of wounds, is to be seen in its formation. On viewing the fibres of cotton in the microscope and under considerable magnifying powers, it will be found that each fibre is flat, like that of a riband with sharp edges, which no doubt act in lacerating instead of healing the wound. The fibres of flax or linen, on the contrary, when viewed in the microscope, under similar circumstances, and especially when the flax has been dressed in the best manner, present the appearance of polished cylinders, beautifully transparent. Hence the superiority of linen will be self-evident. And it shows that the microscope will frequently afford an unerring test of the real cause of good or ill properties of substances when properly applied in their examination.

A solid and substantial greatness of soul, looks down with a generous neglect on the censures and applauses of the multitude, and places a man beyond the little noise and strife of tongues.—ADDISON.

FOR THE FRIEND.

The following article, which is extracted from the last number of the London Quarterly Journal of Science, contains the most concise and interesting account I have seen of the recent discoveries in Egyptian literature. The extraordinary interest of the subject will attract and richly repay the attention of all the readers of the Friend. The restoration of the language of ancient Egypt, after an oblivion of two thousand years, may be considered as one of the most wonderful events of this wonderful age. The steps by which this discovery has been made; the singular coincidences which have attended it; the intense interest we must all feel in the events of the times, which it has unfolded to view, are but the faint dawn and promise of what must attend the further discoveries to which it may lead. From a few papyri and tablets; inscriptions copied here and there from tombs and temples, and pyramids; the age of Sesostrius, of the Exodus and the Pharaohs, has been ascertained. What then may we not expect, when the temples and the ruins with which not only Egypt and Nubia, and Ethiopia, along the whole of the Nile, but the very Desert, as far as the Red Sea and the confines of Syria are strewn, shall have been examined and deciphered? It is a singular phenomenon in the annals of our species, that the earliest should be also the most enduring monuments of civilization. Was not the memory of that great universal catastrophe, which had but recently swept away every trace of human labour, the impelling motive to all these mighty excavations and constructions; to those records upon everlasting granite, of the names of ephemeral kings and dynasties? That thus the fame of monarchs and of empires might be placed beyond the reach of the elements, and of time itself, to efface? Whatever we may think of the motive for these constructions, they must be admitted to furnish a marvellous instance of the manner in which the moral government of the world bends the will and the purposes of men, to work the counsels of the Almighty. The worship of the true and living God, was maintained in the family of Abraham from the time of Noah; it was preserved in the nation to which he gave birth; and since the advent of the Redeemer, there have never been wanting true disciples of his gospel. Yet, although a pure faith has thus been kept alive upon the earth, from the time of Noah, it has been but as a spark, ready oftentimes to perish.

The slow progress, the slight influence upon the world at large, of the precepts of Christianity, are among the inscrutable counsels of Infinite Wisdom. "The fulness of time," perhaps, is at length dawning. A knowledge of the Holy Scriptures is fast spreading throughout every nation of the earth, and we cannot doubt, that He who has so miraculously preserved the sacred volume, will bless, wherever it is known, its effect upon the heart. More just and pacific principles of policy, may be discerned amidst the wars and revolutions of both hemispheres to be struggling for the ascendancy. "The golden girdle," as it has been called, of commerce, is fast encircling the globe, and binding nation to nation, and continent to continent, by the ties of interest, to the occupations of peace and industry. Is it the dream of an enthusiast to suppose, that the proofs of the truth of Sacred Writ, which must silence every cavil, and drive the unbeliever from his last covert of doubt; the proof derived from records, coeval perhaps with the children of Noah, were purposely sealed up in an unknown tongue, to be opened and examined in the fulness of time—then, when all things else should conspire to bring home the evidence with the strongest conviction, and impart to it an intensity of interest, which nothing else but a miracle could awaken?

On the Recent Elucidations of early Egyptian History.

Since the commencement of the present century, the researches of philologists have ascertained that the language of ancient Egypt—the language of the hieroglyphical inscriptions engraven on its ancient temples and monuments, and of the still existing manuscripts of the same period—differs from the modern Egyptian or Coptic, only in the mixture in the latter of many Greek and Arabian, and a smaller portion of Latin words, introduced during the successive dominion of the Greeks, the Romans, and the Arabs, and occasionally substituted for the corresponding native words. The grammatical construction of the language has remained the same at all periods of its employment: and it finally ceased to be a spoken language towards the middle of the seventeenth century, when it was replaced by the Arabian.

In writing their language, the ancient Egyptians employed three different kinds of characters. First, figurative, or representations of the objects themselves. Second, symbolic, or representations of certain physical or material objects, expressing metaphorically, or conventionally, certain ideas; such as, a people obedient to their king, figured, metaphorically, by a bee; the universe, conventionally, by a beetle. Third, phonetic, or representative of sounds; that is to say, strictly alphabetical characters. The phonetic signs were also portraits of physical and material objects; and each stood for the initial sound of the word in the Egyptian language which expressed the object portrayed: thus a lion was the sound L, because a lion was called Labo; and a hand a T, because a hand was called Tot. The form in which these objects were presented, when employed as phonetic characters, was conventional and definite, to distinguish them from the same objects used either figuratively or symbolically; thus, the conventional form of the phonetic T, was the hand open and outstretched; in any other form the hand would either be a figurative, or a symbolic sign. The number of distinct characters employed as phonetic signs, appears to have been about 120; consequently many were homophones, or having the same signification. The three kinds of characters were used indiscriminately in the same writing, and occasionally in the composition of the same word. The formal Egyptian writing, therefore, such as we see it still existing on the monuments of the country, was a series of portraits of physical and material objects, of which a small proportion had a symbolic meaning, a still smaller proportion a figurative meaning, but the great body were phonetic or alphabetical signs; and to these portraits, sculptured or painted with sufficient fidelity to leave no doubt of the object represented, the name of hieroglyphics, or sacred characters, has been attached from their earliest historic notice.

The manuscripts of the same ancient period make us acquainted with two other forms of writing practised by the ancient Egyptians, both apparently distinct from the hieroglyphic, but which, on careful examination, are found to be its immediate derivatives: every hieroglyphic having its corresponding sign in the hieratic, or writing of the priests, in which the funeral rituals, forming a large portion of the manuscripts, are principally composed; and in the demotic, called also the enchorial, which was employed for all more ordinary and popular usages. The characters of the hieratic are for the most part obvious running imitations, or abridgments of the corresponding hieroglyphics; but in the demotic, which is still further removed from the original type, the derivation is less frequently and less obviously traceable. In the hieratic, fewer figurative or symbolic signs are employed than in the hieroglyphic; their absence being supplied by means of the phonetic or alphabetical characters, the words being spelt instead of figured; and this is still more the case in the demotic, which is, in consequence, almost entirely alphabetical.

After the conversion of the Egyptians to Christianity, the ancient mode of writing their language fell into disuse; and an alphabet was adopted in substitution, consisting of the twenty-five Greek letters, with six additional signs, expressing articulations and aspirations unknown to the Greeks, the characters for which were retained from the demotic. This is the Coptic alphabet, in which the Egyptian appears as a written language in the Coptic books and manuscripts preserved in our libraries; and in which consequently, the language of the inscriptions on the monuments may be studied.

The original mode in which the language was written having thus fallen into disuse, it happened, at length, that the signification of the characters, and even the nature of the system of writing which they formed, became entirely lost; such notices on the subject as existed in the early historians being either too imperfect, or appearing too vague, to furnish a clue, although frequently and carefully studied for the purpose. The repossession of his knowledge will form, in literary history, one of the most remarkable distinctions, if not the principal, of the age in which we live. It is due primarily to the discovery by the French, during their possession of Egypt, of the since well-known monument called the Rosetta Stone, which, on their defeat and expulsion by the British troops, remained in the hands of the victors, was conveyed to England, and deposited in the British Museum. On this monument the same inscription is repeated in the Greek and in the Egyptian language, being written in the latter both in hieroglyphics and in the demotic or enchorial character. The words Ptolemy and Cleopatra, written in hieroglyphics, and recognised by means of the corresponding Greek of the Rosetta inscription, and by a Greek inscription on the base of an obelisk at Philæ, gave the phonetic characters of the letters which form those words: by their means the names were discovered, in hieroglyphic writing, on other monuments of all the Grecian kings and Grecian queens of Egypt, and of fourteen of the Roman emperors, ending with Commodus; and by the comparison of these names one with another, the value of all the phonetic characters was finally ascertained.

The hieroglyphic alphabet thus made out, has been subsequently applied to the elucidation of the earlier periods of Egyptian history, particularly in tracing the reigns and the succession of the Pharaohs, those native princes who governed Egypt at the period of its splendour; when its monarchy was the most powerful among the nations of the earth; its people the most advanced in learning, and in the cultivation of the arts and sciences; and which has left, as its memorials, constructions more nearly approaching to imperishable, than any other of the works of man, which have been the wonder of every succeeding people, and which are now serving to re-establish, at the expiration of above 3000 years, the details of its long-forgotten history. To trace these stupendous monuments of art to their respective founders, and thus to fix, approximately, at least, the epoch of their first existence, is a consequence of the restoration of the knowledge of the alphabet and the language of the inscriptions engraven on them. We propose to review, briefly as our limits require, the principal and most important facts that have thus recently been made known in regard to those early times; and shall deem ourselves most fortunate if we can impart to our readers but a small portion of the interest which we have ourselves derived in watching their progressive discovery.

The following are the authors to whom we are chiefly indebted for the few particulars we know of early Egyptian history. Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, Grecians, and foreigners in Egypt. Manetho, a native; and Eratosthenes, by birth a Cyrenean, a province bordering on Egypt, both residents. Josephus, a Jew, and Africanus, Eusebius, and Syncellus, Christians, Greek authors. Herodotus visited Egypt four centuries and a half before Christ, and within a century after its conquest by the Persians. In his relation of the affairs of the Greeks and Persians, he has introduced incidentally a sketch of the early history of Egypt, such as he learnt it from popular tradition, and from information obtained from the priests. It is, however, merely a sketch, particularly of the earlier times; and is further recorded by Josephus to have been censured by Manetho for its incorrectness. Diodorus is also understood to have visited Egypt about half a century before Christ; and from him we have a similar sketch to that of Herodotus; a record of the names of the most distinguished kings, and for what they were distinguished; but with intervals, of many generations and of uncertain duration, passed without notice. Manetho was a priest of Heliopolis, in Lower Egypt, a city of the first rank amongst the sacred cities of ancient Egypt, and long the resort of foreigners as the seat of learning and knowledge. He lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, two centuries and a half before Christ, and wrote, by order of that prince, the history of his own country in the Greek language, translating it, as he states himself, out of the sacred records. His work is, most unfortunately, lost; but the fragments which have been preserved to us, by the writings of Josephus in the first century of the Christian era, and by the Greek authors above named of the third and fourth centuries, contain matter, which, if entitled to confidence, is of the highest historical value, viz. a chronological list of the successive rulers of Egypt, from the first foundation of monarchy, to Alexander of Macedon, who succeeded the Persians. This list is divided into thirty dynasties, not all of separate families; a memorable reign appearing in some instances to commence a new dynasty, although happening in the regular succession. It originally contained the length of reign as well as the name of every king; but in consequence of successive transcriptions, variations have crept in, and some few omissions also occur in the record, as it has reached us through the medium of different authors. The chronology of Manetho, adopted with confidence by some, and rejected with equal confidence by others—his name and his information not being even noticed by some of the modern systematic writers on Egyptian history—has received the most unquestionable and decisive testimony of its general fidelity by the interpretation of the hieroglyphic inscriptions on the existing monuments: so much so, that by the accordance of the facts attested by these monuments with the record of the historian, we have reason to expect the entire restoration of the annals of the Egyptian monarchy antecedent to the Persian conquest, and which, indeed, is already accomplished in part.

Before we pursue this part of our subject, we must conclude our brief review of the original authorities in early Egyptian history, by a notice of Eratosthenes. He was keeper of the Alexandrian library in the reign of Ptolemy Evergetes, the successor to Ptolemy Philadelphus, under whose reign Manetho wrote. Amongst the few fragments of his works, which have reached us, transmitted through the Greek historians, is a catalogue of thirty-eight kings of Thebes, commencing with Menes, (who is mentioned by the other authorities also as the first monarch of Egypt,) and occupying by their successive reigns 1055 years. These names are stated to have been compiled from original records existing at Thebes, which city Eratosthenes visited expressly to consult them. The names of the two first kings in his catalogue are the same with the names of the two first kings of the first dynasty of Manetho; but the remainder of the catalogue presents no further accordance, either in the names or in the duration of the reigns.

THE CHEROKEE, OR CHE-LA-QUE* INDIANS. NO. I.

This noble tribe of aborigines exhibits at the present time a singular and interesting spectacle. It has abandoned the wandering life of the hunter for the employment of the plough and the loom—it has established a civil government, somewhat on the plan of ours—it encourages education—many of its leading men have embraced Christianity, and to heighten the interest of its situation, a new Cadmus has arisen, who has, by an extraordinary effort of unassisted genius, given to his countrymen, the elements of a written language.

I have received the following narrative of the invention of this alphabet from an intelligent traveller who passed through the Cherokee country soon after the circumstance occurred. At one of their council fires—at which recollections of the melancholy fate of their fellow-tribes, who had perished as if blasted by the touch of civilization—a retrospect of the former extent contrasted with the present limits of the Indian power—the consciousness that they themselves had felt the withering contact filled the chiefs with gloomy forebodings, and disposed them to envy the influence of that civilization and of those arts which rendered the white man so immeasurably their superior—an Indian named Guess rose from his seat, and pointing to a book told them that there lay the secret of the white man's power; that it was by recording his thoughts and observations that he was enabled to effect the wonders they witnessed; and that if the Indians could invent a method of writing their language, that inferiority would no longer be felt. From that moment the desire of accomplishing so great an end seemed to take the entire possession of his soul. He shut himself up in his cabin, and after several months of seclusion appeared again before his countrymen with an alphabet of their language. It was a wonderful effort of unassisted genius, for he was ignorant of all language except his own, and knew not even the sounds of the English letters from which he formed his characters. The rapidity with which a knowledge of this alphabet was spread throughout the nation was surprising. The old men learned it in a few days, and the children, more docile, in a still shorter time. It is said that there are but few in the nation who are now ignorant of it; and a constant correspondence is maintained by its means, which their brethren on the Arkansas, to whom the invention was speedily made known. It is stated in the newspapers, that Elias Boudinot, a native Chelaque, who has received a liberal education, is about to publish a weekly journal, printed partly in English and partly in his native tongue; and that a fount of Chelaque letters has been cast for this purpose in Baltimore. The facility with which this alphabet has been acquired by the Indians is no doubt owing to its being syllabic, and thus not requiring so minute an analysis of the sound of words, as would have been necessary, had fewer characters been adopted, sufficient only to express the mere elemental sounds. It consists of eighty-six characters, which are said to represent all the monosyllables contained in the language. With the progress of improvement and civilization new terms and new sounds will be introduced, requiring new characters to express them unless a more minute analysis of the words be made, and letters with the power of the Roman alphabet be adopted.

An accurate representation of the alphabet is annexed to this paper. It would be unfair to subject an invention, made under such circumstances, to the test of severe criticism; but there are some of its features which may well attract our attention. In the first place the Chelaque language does not appear to possess the sounds B, D, F, P, R, V, X and Z. Six of the characters represent vowel sounds, viz: the short, long and broad a, e, o, and u; fifty-two represent the remaining consonants of our alphabet, four represent the aspirate, and sixteen of them stand for syllables containing two consonants, and one vowel sound. We find a great redundancy of characters representing the same radical sound, for instance, there are ten characters for n variously modified by vowel sounds, which also have characters, by the aid of which one character for the simple sound of n may replace the whole ten. In the same manner C, L, Y, W, and M, have each four characters, L, T, S, and K, have each five, T and K, have each six, and Q has three characters, each representing a syllable with the same consonant sound.

The influence which this invention may have upon the future destinies of the tribe is a curious subject of speculation. Being adapted to the present limited range of their language, and exciting their feelings of national pride, it is probable that it will give an immediate and powerful stimulant to the desire for improvement. But it is so inadequate a means of representing the thoughts of a more cultivated people, that it will soon require additional characters and a more complicated structure. At that period of civilization it must operate injuriously in impeding the progress they would make, if there were no radical imperfections in their written language to overcome. We may conclude, therefore, that the invention of these characters will be a blessing to the Chelaques, if they use it only until prepared to adopt the Roman letters and the English language. If, on the other hand, mistaken pride and a rooted animosity to the whites and their institutions should induce them to cleave to their own language as now spoken and written, it is too easy to foresee, that even if they maintain their distinct existence as a people, they will be bound down in a narrow circle, from which the greatest individual genius can never extricate them.

IDRIA AND THE QUICKSILVER MINES.

Idria is a district of Carniola, dependent on the circle of Adlerberg, in the dominions of the Emperor of Austria.

A short distance beyond Layback, the traveller leaves the great road, for that which runs westward over the mountains of Idria. For a few miles the country is flat, and presents an uninteresting aspect. But suddenly the road begins to ascend rapidly, and is skirted on either side by deep forests of fir trees, whose dense and sombre foliage intercepts the cheering rays of day, and involves the weary traveller in the gloom of continued night. For several miles the road runs along the precipitous edge of deep hollows; now emerging upon a barren heath, and again plunging into the dark pine-woods, until at length you reach the summit of the ridge, an elevation of more than seven hundred feet. On a sudden, the road seems entirely to disappear; and as the traveller approaches the point of its apparent termination, he finds himself standing on the brink of a spacious amphitheatre, bounded on every side by lofty precipices and towering crags, here and there tufted with little patches of fir, which form a striking contrast with the piles of dreary, naked rock thrown up on either hand.

The inhabitants have given to the dell, a name which corresponds to the English word "kettle," and in many respects the comparison is not inapplicable.

A late traveller describes this scene as viewed from the highest peak, in nearly the following words:—The effect is at once singular and striking. The picture was entirely changed by the mist in which every object was enveloped. The morning was not yet sufficiently advanced, to open to our view the grandeur of the scene which lay concealed beneath us. The sun, though bright and warm above, had not yet penetrated the gulf, which was filled to the brim with white and fleecy vapour, into which the road seemed to descend as into a field of ether. All around, the rugged and broken cliffs towered above its surface, like the steep and rocky shores of the mountain lake, and even imagination itself could assign no depth to the abyss over which this light and snowy mantle was thrown. As the sun approached his meridian altitude, his warm rays slanted over the mountain tops, and pierced the veil which concealed the kettle from our view. The cloud of vapour began to rise, slowly and majestically, curling its dense volumes over the topmost crags, but without dividing into those distinct and rapidly ascending columns, which produce such fantastic appearances, and give rise to so many fairy tales, in the higher passages of the Swiss Alps.

In a short time, the whole dell became visible, terminating below, in a narrow, irregular and confined valley.

The Idrixa, a stream of no inconsiderable magnitude, bursts at once, like a noble fountain, from the side of the mountain, and flows rapidly along the bottom of the ravine, towards the south. On the sides of the mountains which encircle this little spot, and seem to shut it out from all communication with the rest of the busy world, scarcely a cot is to be seen, or a trace of verdure, save the dark foliage of the solitary and stunted pine, to relieve the rudeness of the prospect. In the centre of the valley, and along the banks of the Idrixa, lies the little village of Idria, so far below, as to diminish the size of its houses and their tenants almost to Lilliputian dimensions. On one side of the bank, and scattered just at the foot of the mountain, are several clusters of huts, which mark the entrance to the quicksilver mines. These mines, the most magnificent and productive in the world, constitute the sole riches of Idria, and give employment to the larger part of its inhabitants.

The principal metallic stratum lies about two hundred yards below the surface, and is imbedded in limestone rock. It has been followed 800 yards in one direction, and more than 1000 in another. Six large shafts penetrate the mine, four of which are vertical, and two inclined at an acute angle. The access to it is from a spacious building erected on a little hillock, to the south of the town. The entrance is under a lofty vault, leading almost horizontally to a stone staircase, hewn with great regularity, in the solid rock, and kept remarkably clean and neat. It is surmounted by an arch built of hewn stone, except where the superincumbent rock furnishes a roof, with no other trouble or expense than that of smoothing its rugged surface. The descent into the mine, instead of being accomplished, as formerly, by slippery and tottering ladders, is by successive flights of steps, as regular and smooth as if they had been constructed for some stately mansion. Landing places, also cut out of the rock, occur at various distances, where galleries branch off from the main shaft, through the openings in which veins of ore have been pursued, or where the shaft takes a new direction. This is the regular mode by which the ascent and descent are now conducted; forming, from the surface of the earth to the lowest excavation of the mine, a subterranean staircase more than eight hundred feet in length. At the distance of two hundred and sixty yards from the entrance, there is a chapel where mass is celebrated on all festival days, and the images of saints, protected by a grating, stand in niches along the wall.

FOR THE FRIEND.

SAVONAROLE, THE ITALIAN REFORMER.

The personal character of this singular man, the predecessor of Luther in the work of Reformation, is not without interest; while the incidents of his short but distinguished career, may serve to illustrate the habits of a people, who, perhaps more than any other of modern times, recommend themselves to our regard, by their patronage of learning, and their disinterested zeal for the establishment of free institutions.

Jerome Francis Savonarole was descended from illustrious ancestors, and born at Ferrara in 1452. Distinguished while very young by his proficiency in theological studies, he separated himself from his family at the age of twenty-three years, and uniting with the Dominicans of Bologna, his extraordinary talents soon attracted the notice of his superiors, by whom he was appointed to deliver lectures on philosophy. In this new vocation, our young Dominican had much to contend with; his voice was at once feeble and harsh, his physical powers debilitated by long and severe abstinence, and his delivery so singularly ungraceful, that although respected for his erudition, he was deserted when he ascended the pulpit.

But genius and determination triumphed over these obstacles. Another Demosthenes, Savonarole acquired by practice in his retreat, the graces which nature had denied him; and those who had been disgusted by his awkward recitation, could scarcely recognise him, when, after the lapse of five years, they heard him modulating at will a voice strong and harmonious, and assisting it by graceful and imposing gesture. Conscious of the change, and fearful of priding himself on the success of his efforts, the preacher professed to consider it a miracle, designed to prove the divine authority of his mission. It was in his 31st year, that Savonarole began to be sensible of that secret and prophetic impulse which designated him a reformer, and called him to preach repentance to Christians, announcing to them the calamities which impended equally over church and state. Six years after, he travelled on foot to Florence, and fixing his residence in the convent of his order, he continued during eight years to preach the necessity of reform, until death, the manner of which he is said frequently to have foretold, put a period to his labours. The reformation which he recommended as "a work meet for repentance," had for its object an improvement of morals, not a change of faith.

Enthusiastically attached to the church of Rome, Savonarole did not suffer himself to question the truth of its dogmas, while he believed its discipline to be corrupt, and its pastors faithless to their trust. It was not by reasoning that he assailed the established order, but under the sanction of divine inspiration; not by syllogisms, but by prophecies and miracles. But if he stooped to the authority of the church, he did not yield to that which was temporal. Liberty was in his eyes almost as sacred as religion. Usurped authority could be retained only at the peril of salvation; and Lorenzo de Medici, who withheld from the citizens of Florence their privileges, which were their birthright, could not prevail upon him to recognise his authority by and mark of respect. When on his death bed, Lorenzo sent for him to receive absolution at his hands, the confessor required that he should express his willingness to restore liberty to the Florentines, as the only condition on which this boon would be granted. It is not a little curious, that so firmly was the love of power planted in his breast, that the dying usurper could not be prevailed upon to accede to these terms, and the priest was compelled to leave him, according to the dogma of the church.

—"Unanointed, unanointed,
No reckoning made, but sent to his account
With all his imperfections on his head."

The situation of Italy at that period, was one of peculiar interest. During the fifteenth century, that country had risen to the pinnacle of prosperity—superior to most, and inferior to none of the neighbouring states in political influence, its commerce and manufactures had produced an accumulation of wealth, which rendered the republicans of Italy the bankers of Europe. Literature was encouraged by the munificence of princes and the enthusiasm of citizens; and no period, perhaps, has been adorned by a greater number of distinguished men, than that which was illustrated by the Medici, by a Nicholas V. and a Machiavel. But the evil days drew nigh. Divided into a large number of states, not only disconnected but always at variance with each other, Italy was about to become the prey of the surrounding nations, whose repeated attacks were soon to reduce her from that proud eminence to the lowest abyss of wretchedness and imbecility. At the period to which we refer, Charles VIII. of France had already commenced the war, which was to end in the subversion of the Italian republics. Florence, prostrate at the feet of the Medici, seemed to have forgotten her attachment to free institutions; while the See of Rome, occupied by a Borgia, participated in the ignominy and contempt which already attached to a name, since proverbial for flagitiousness and vice. Such was the situation of affairs when Savonarole commenced his discourses at Florence. In the name of the Most High, he every day addressed his numerous audience, on the calamities which threatened them, and the vices by which they were provoked. He placed before them graphic pictures of the laxity of morals, and the progress of luxury; of the disorders of the church, and the corruption of the prelates; of the abuses in the state, and the tyranny of its rulers. If when he discoursed upon spiritual subjects, he displayed an imagination brilliant and enthusiastic; when he reasoned upon temporal affairs, his logic was not less powerful, nor his eloquence less attractive. Nor were his labours without their full effect—already the citizens of Florence began to testify, by the simplicity of their dress, and by the modesty of their conversation and demeanour, that they had become converts to the reformation of Savonarole—already the women had relinquished their ornaments, and a change of manners was observable throughout the whole city.

HYMN—By BISHOP HANER.

I praise'd the earth, in beauty seen
With garlands gay of various green;
I praise'd the sea, whose ample field
Shone glorious as a silver shield;
And earth and ocean seem'd to say,
"Our beauties are but for a day!"

I praise'd the sun, whose chariot roll'd
On wheels of amber and of gold;
I praise'd the moon, whose softer eye
Gleam'd sweetly through the summer sky;
And moon and sun in answer said,
"Our days of light are numbered!"

Oh God! oh good beyond compare!
If thus thy meaner works are fair!
If thus thy bounties gild the span
Of ruin'd earth and sinful man,
How glorious must thy mansions be,
Where thy redeem'd shall dwell with thee!

FOR THE FRIEND.

The following epitaph has lately been placed over the grave of a young Greek, who died last spring at Tottenham, near London, aged about 13 years; and whose gentle and amiably sweet disposition, had attracted for him a strong attachment from those who kindly visited him during a lingering decline.

Far from his native Greece, the mortal part
Of Constantine Sotiris here was laid,
Almost ere childhood melted into youth,
Bold, wild, and free, the little Suliote came
To England's shores a student; and his soul
All knowledge, save of ill, with eager joy
Received; but chiefly with a spirit's thirst,
He drank the waters of immortal life.
Meek, holy, calm, the little Suliote died;
His last breath murmured, in his country's tongue,
The name of mother—"Twas a father's death,
(Sad tidings, told him in this foreign land!)
First bade him droop; no hand of relative
Closed his sad eyes, yet left he mourners here,
True friends, whom his sweet gentleness had made;
And one of these inscribes this humble stone.

Obiit, Aprilis xviii. mcccxxxviii.
Ætatis, circiter xiii.

The following, which has before appeared in print, but in an imperfect form, has been handed in for publication in the Friend, with corrections, and an additional stanza or two.

GRIEF FOR DEPARTED FRIENDS.

It is not when the parting breath
We watch with anxious heart,
It is not in the hour of death,
When those we love depart,
Nor yet when laid upon the bier,
We follow slow the corse,
Which leads us to their dwelling low,
That most we feel their loss.
When past the last and solemn rite,
And dust to dust hath gone,
And in its wonted channel'd course
The stream of life flows on,
Oh! who can tell how drear the space
Once fill'd by those most dear;
When well known scenes, and local things,
And all but they are there!
This deep, this heartfelt loneliness,
This quietness of grief,
Falls heavier on our flowers of joy,
Than tempests strong but brief;
The whirlwinds tear the blossoms fair,
Yet still the stem may thrive,
While a cold season's withering blast
Scarce leaves the root alive.

But as our earthly pleasures fade,
If plants of heavenly peace
Spring in our bosom's wilderness,
And nurtur'd there increase,
In humble hope, and holy fear,
Our minds will daily prove,
That smitten friends are angels, sent
On errands full of love!
Then seek not hours of sober grief,
Or sorrowing thought to shun,
Until our hearts are brought in truth,
To say "Thy will be done!"
And grateful love for strokes like these,
Our hearts to God may warm,
Perhaps he saw the gathering cloud,
And housed them from the storm.
If in his own good time and way,
He shelters these from ill,
And in his mercy, bless the blow
To those remaining still,
May we not hope to join in Heaven,
The song the blessed raise,
Almighty Lord, and King of Saints,
How just and true thy ways!

FOR THE FRIEND.

Translated from the Revue Encyclopedique of Paris.

The Theory of Concentric Spheres, of Capt. Symmes, explained by a Citizen of the United States, and containing proofs that the earth is hollow, open at the Poles, and inhabited in the interior. Cincinnati, 1826. 168 pages.

This little book may afford, according to the temper of the reader, materials for consolation or for regret. It shows us that the new world has its dreamers, as well as our old Europe; and that, on the shores of the Ohio, as well as those of the Seine, makers of systems are employed in wasting their own time, and making others waste theirs. Some imprudent expressions of approbation suffice to encourage them, their enthusiasm becomes contagious, they publish books, and they acquire disciples. All this vain notoriety perishes with them; but they retard the progress of real knowledge. In some future age, when men shall have forgotten that such things were spoken of, as expansion, on this side the Atlantic, and a hollow world, in the other continent, they will not be able to imagine what were the obstacles which were able to retard the human mind, and prevent it from arriving at the knowledge of such a great number of truths, long within the reach of every one, and with which every one ought to be acquainted.

It seems that the number of the Symmesites are, in proportion to the population, greater in the United States than those of the sectaries, to whose opinions we have already alluded, have become in France. Perhaps the American system may even have in its favour a decided numerical superiority; and, on both sides, the inventors are of opinion that questions of this nature should be decided by majorities. But a philosophy, zealous for the honour of the human understanding, would direct it towards a more noble destination, and not suffer it to consume all its activity in vain amusements. We should recollect the injury which physical science received from the system of Descartes: and yet Descartes did not content himself with the mere employment of his imagination; he knew how to observe, measure, combine forces, and calculate their effect; he was, in fact, a profound geometrician. By an inconceivable fatality, none of those who have undertaken to reform Newton, are willing to take the trouble of learning mathematics; and it is with this capital stock of ignorance, that they attempt to solve the highest questions of astronomical mechanics.

Besides, is it really praise, when we say of a system of universal science, that "its reasonings are often ingenious?" Not one single work of genius is ingenious. Genius has never been sunk so low as that expression. A pun may deserve it sometimes: the forms in which wit chooses to clothe its vain conceptions, must be ingenious, or they will either be in bad taste, or vanish quite away. The march of reason is imposing, and inspires no sentiment but respect; the impression which it leaves is a profound conviction, in which the understanding delights, because it feels the price at which it has paid for the acquisitions it has made; and these acquisitions are the truths which have been communicated to it. But, after having read the productions of ingenuity applied to the sciences or literature, we feel like one who has just emerged from a theatre; neither the head nor the heart is improved.

"We feel an ardent desire, that in all our proceedings tending to this end, our conduct towards all our brethren, may, on every occasion, be marked with love and forbearance."

Green Street Address of the 4th mo.

COMMENTARY.

In fulfilling the unpleasant duty of presenting our readers with an authentic and faithful narrative of the conduct of the followers of Elias Hicks, in excluding friends from the occupancy of their meeting houses, we have already had to record many painful and humiliating transactions. The occurrences at Abington, Byberry, Falsington, Bristol, Solebury, Darby, Radnor, and Haverford, are marked by a spirit but little consonant with the professions contained in the Addresses issued by the new sect; and are, in our opinion, incompatible with the benign temper of the gospel, which breathes the harmonious language of "peace on earth, good will to men."

After perusing the specious pages of the Epistle of the 10th month last, with a knowledge that many of the persons engaged in the violent actions we have narrated, attended the meeting which issued it; we were almost ready to conclude, that conviction had at last arrested their minds, and shown them the great inconsistency of their former demeanour. We had hoped, too, that the fair professions, the solemn asseverations, of the Epistle, were the prelude to the practical illustration of that most comprehensive and noble precept of Christianity, "As ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." But our charitable anticipations have all been blasted, and the apparent sincerity of the Epistle has only heightened our disappointment. Surely there must exist a wide difference between the feelings of those who wrote, and those who read and sanctioned, that document, or they must alike be involved in the just imputation of great insincerity. For professions and practices could scarcely be more directly adverse, than the tenor of the Epistle, and the subsequent conduct of some of those who composed the meeting which adopted it. In performing the task assigned us, we shall have to record in the present number, the principal facts relative to the seizure and occupancy of Friends' meeting house at Buckingham, by the followers of Elias Hicks—a transaction which has occurred since the Epistle of the 10th month was issued, and which is more painful and outrageous in its character than any thing which has yet taken place. There are circumstances connected with it, which from respect to the feelings of our readers, and from regard to the reputation of civil, not to speak of religious society, we feel it our duty to withhold.

To give a clear view of the occurrences, it will be necessary to observe, that the person who has acted as clerk of Buckingham preparative meeting for several years, and to whom was entrusted the care of the meeting house, is a Friend. Until the 8th month last, he had never experienced any difficulty in transacting the concerns of the preparative meeting, nor had any complaints been brought against him. But at the meeting in that month, when he rose to read the opening minute, one of the followers of Elias Hicks peremptorily commanded him not to proceed, alleging that he was unfit any longer to serve the meeting in that capacity. This summary mode of displacing the officers of Society, was entirely unknown till the new principles were embraced; and it is totally incompatible with the spirit and letter of our excellent code of discipline. The clerk therefore replied, that he was regularly appointed to the station, and not having been released, he thought it his duty to go on with the business; which he did, amid the clamour and outcries of the followers of Elias Hicks.

After the preparative meeting had concluded, Friends retired as usual; but the members of the new sect remained in the house, and organized themselves into a distinct meeting, which they called a preparative meeting. This irregular assembly, amongst other business, took upon it to appoint a new care-taker for the meeting house and premises; and instructed him to call on the Friend who regularly held that station, and demand the keys; and in case of his refusal to surrender them, to take off the locks, and put new ones on the doors. This, however, was not immediately done; the Friend retained unmolested possession of the keys, and opened the house as usual for the preparative meeting in the 10th month. At this meeting, in virtue of his office as clerk, he went to the table in order to transact the business; but it was already occupied by one of the new sect, who had taken his seat there in the early part of the meeting. The clerk stood by the table for a few moments, to see whether he would be permitted to proceed, but the person persisted in retaining his seat, and read a minute opening a preparative meeting for the new sect.

It was then proposed by a Friend that they should quietly withdraw and hold their meeting out of the doors, as the followers of Elias Hicks seemed determined to preclude them from transacting the business in the house. This was accordingly done; for although the clerk of the preparative meeting had never been released, nor any other regularly appointed in his place; and the followers of Elias Hicks, regardless of the discipline and order of the Society, had organized a new preparative meeting of a new sect, distinct from Friends, and of course could have no right, nor even a plausible excuse, for usurping the control and possession of the property; yet Friends patiently submitted to the wrong, and did not contend with them, even for what was so evidently their just right. The new preparative meeting appointed another person to take possession of the house, probably from an apprehension that he whom they had before entrusted with the commission, was not resolute and hardy enough for their purpose. Be this as it may, the new incumbent proceeded forthwith to give proof of his promptness and determination, for he began to take off the lock while the meeting was yet sitting, and accomplished the task before they broke up.

The Friend, regularly appointed to the charge of the property, then went into the house with a view of shutting it up. He closed some of the windows, but finding that the followers of Elias Hicks seemed inclined to remain there longer, he desisted. The person just appointed to take possession came in, with a new lock, which he fastened on the door; after which, they nailed down the window sashes. During this time, great confusion prevailed amongst them, and much excitement was apparent—men and women talking loudly, and looking with anxious eyes to see what would be the event of these violent and extraordinary proceedings. The women, and some of the men, now went away, but about twenty men remained to guard the premises. By this time the stoves had got quite cool, and more fire was wanted. They demanded the key of the wood-house from the Friend who had the charge of the property; but as they were not sitting there on any business of the Society, and as he had not been released from the trust confided in him, he declined giving it to them; at the same time exhorting them, as they regarded their own reputation, or that of the Society, to go home and conduct peaceably. They replied that his declining to give them the key, made no difference, they merely wished to see whether he would surrender it or not. They immediately went to the wood-house and broke it open, by splitting the window shutter, and tearing off one of the hinges; they then entered, took out some wood, and made up a fire—the door of the wood-house was subsequently broken open and the lock taken off.

Evening was now approaching, and they began to make preparations for passing the night in the meeting house—a basket of victuals and some bed clothes were sent to them by some of their friends.

These extraordinary and disgraceful proceedings, spread quickly through the neighbourhood, and during the course of the afternoon and evening, many persons were coming to and going from the house; some out of curiosity, and some of the followers of Elias Hicks, to assist or encourage their party. Under these circumstances, the Friend became ashamed to be seen there, lest he should be considered accessory to them; and as the new occupants showed no disposition to leave the premises, he thought it most prudent quietly to retire, which he did between 8 and 9 o'clock in the evening. Some time after he had left the meeting house, a Friend passing along the road, heard a great noise from within the house, and supposing that the care-taker was still there, stopped to speak with him. He opened the door, and stepped upon the threshold, when several of the noisy tenants ran to him, and pushing the door with violence, caught him by one leg and one arm, between it and the half which remained closed. Here they held him for a considerable time, pressing against the door with such force, as to make his situation very uncomfortable.

While in this predicament, one of the persons in the house called out, "bring a candle and let us burn him!"—a candle was immediately brought, with which they attempted to burn his hand, which projected into the room. He was however aware of their design, and extinguished the candle; another was called for and brought, and a second attempt made to burn him, by holding the flame under his hand, but he extinguished this also, and extricated himself from the unpleasant posture in which they had so long detained him. The followers of Elias Hicks remained in the house that night; and, as we are informed, the next night also. On the succeeding morning, the house was left entirely open, but towards evening they locked it up and left it. It is with feelings of regret and shame that we record these most disgraceful transactions—they are degrading to the character of a civil community; and how much more so, when we reflect who were the principal actors in them! It has been said in extenuation, that the outrages were committed by young men, whose passions were ardent, and their judgments not properly regulated. This may be in part true; but we know of some elderly men, of mature years, who were present a part of the time, if not during the whole scene, and for whom no apology can be made. Some of the young men, too, were the sons of plain persons, and even of Elders of the new sect, whose duty it was to restrain their violence.

What a lamentable commentary do such proceedings furnish, upon the peaceable professions, the plausible declarations, of the 10th month Epistle!

"We servently desire," say they, "that all may be increasingly concerned to retire from the noises, the contentions, and the confusions that are in the world, that we may individually submit to the government of the Prince of Peace," &c. Again—

"We feel the awful responsibility of our present standing, and the necessity of abiding individually, in the meekness and simplicity of the truth as it is in Jesus—avoiding all doubtful disputations which engender strife, and earnestly endeavouring to show forth by a godly life and conversation, that we are his humble followers, who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; and whose religion enjoins that we resist not evil, but overcome evil with good."

"We earnestly desire that all may be preserved in the spirit of patience, gentleness, and forbearance, under every provocation and trial."

"Our profession is high and holy, and let us be increasingly concerned to walk consistently therewith."

Of our primitive Friends, they say—"They held up with practical clearness, a peaceable testimony against wars and fightings, and by a scrupulous adherence to the principles of justice, became proverbial for their integrity;" to which we may be permitted to add our "ardent desire," that the followers of Elias Hicks would imitate their noble and Christian example.

What could be more fair and plausible than these smooth professions? What more completely calculated to impress the reader with an idea that the men who made them, were the most peaceable and pious Christians?

What then are we to think, when persons who write thus, can return from a meeting so favoured as they represent theirs to have been, and at once act in such open violation of every sentence which their Epistle contains?

FOR THE FRIEND.

GREEN STREET EPISTLE OF THE TENTH MONTH.

There is something so dignified and magnanimous in the open and fearless avowal of correct principles, supported by a correspondent practice, that the united suffrage of good men has ever awarded it the highest praise; while on the other hand, the concealment of our real opinions, and the profession of others, which our conduct continually contradicts, has justly been esteemed grossly reprehensible.

We have been led to this reflection by perusing, for the first time, an Epistle issued by the followers of Elias Hicks, at their Yearly Meeting in the 10th month last, and inserted in Poulson's Daily Advertiser of the 26th ult. We had been convinced, long since, by the most painful evidences, that there was too little accordance between the conduct and professions of many of the new sect; but we had hoped, that as a body, they still retained candour and integrity sufficient to prevent them from thus coming before the world, with an address so entirely incompatible with their conduct.

The heading of the Epistle is a misrepresentation—"the Yearly Meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia," convenes in the fourth month, and holds no session in the 10th month. We know of but one body entitled to the appellation; and this body assembled as usual on the 16th of the 4th month last, and adjourned on the 20th of the same, to meet again on the third second day in the 4th month next. The assumption of the title therefore by the followers of Elias Hicks, can only be considered as an attempt to conceal the fact of their separation from Friends, and the organization of their new sect. Another instance of duplicity occurs in the following sentence, on page 9 of the Epistle:—"The language of the Meeting for Sufferings, in the introduction to the book of advices, published under the direction of our Yearly Meeting in 1808, appears peculiarly adapted to our present situation."

There is something so ungenerous and unfair in the attempt to inculcate the idea that the meeting which issued these advices, is the same body, and belongs to the same Society, as that which prepared the Green-street Epistle, that we could scarcely have supposed some of the persons who assembled in this new Yearly Meeting, and some who were engaged in preparing the Epistle, would have given even a tacit sanction to so unmanly a deed.

The Meeting for Sufferings which prepared those advices, and the Yearly Meeting of Friends which directed them to be published, have been regularly continued to the present time, and have no connexion with the Society, nor with the meeting, which thus improperly assume their names—the new Society was not organized, nor was their Yearly Meeting set up, until 19 years after the book of Advices was published. This new Yearly Meeting, moreover, separated from the Yearly Meeting of Friends, and was established in opposition to it, as the several addresses issued by its members clearly prove. They declare that "the unity of that Yearly Meeting is interrupted;" that "a division exists" between them and it, "developing in its progress, views which appear incompatible with each other, and feelings averse to a reconciliation"—that "they are bound to express, under a settled conviction of mind, that the period has fully come, in which they ought to look towards making a quiet retreat from this scene of confusion"—that to them "there now appears no way to regain the harmony and tranquillity of the body, but by withdrawing themselves from religious communion" with the members of that Yearly Meeting; and they propose "the propriety and expediency of holding a Yearly Meeting for Friends in unity with us."

After these various declarations of entire disruption from the Yearly Meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia, how can they, with the least colour of justice or candour, deliberately assume its name, and declare themselves to be the same body? Surely the inconsistency and contradiction are so palpable, that they must at once strike the most careless observer.

The Epistle abounds with exhortations to love and forbearance, and against airy speculation, light conversation, &c.—all which are very good in themselves; and we most sincerely desire they may claim the practical attention of all the members of the new sect: For certainly their conduct, both before and since their separation from Friends, has not evinced the predominance of those Christian virtues. Let the reader turn to the pages of the Friend, and peruse attentively the narratives of breaking open the burial ground, and the repeated instances in which they have expelled Friends from their own meeting houses; and ask himself, how such practices accord with the following smooth and plausible sentences:—"We tenderly exhort, that in places where our members [here is the separation again] constitute the larger part of any meeting, their conduct may be regulated by the rule laid down by our blessed Lord, Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." How different are the theory and the practice! Recur to the numerous instances in which they have compelled Friends to hold their religious meetings in the open air, or at private dwellings, while they kept possession of our meeting houses—where they have changed the regular time of holding the meetings for worship, and put new locks, and bars, and bolts, on the doors and gates and windows, to prevent Friends from entering—though they have permitted their own party to have free use of the houses, for holding irregular meetings, "unauthorized by the Society and unknown to its discipline." On some occasions, where Friends have patiently waited until the followers of Elias Hicks had gone through with their business, and then requested the use of the houses, this just right has been peremptorily denied them; and even defenceless and aged women have been threatened with the civil authority, merely for endeavouring to sustain their monthly meeting, in the order of our Society. These are not exaggerated representations of one or two isolated cases—they are plain, well attested facts, which have repeatedly occurred. After all these instances of oppression, what can we think of the professions contained in the Epistle under review? These circumstances have so repeatedly occurred, before and since the Epistle was issued, and men who promoted and sanctioned that Epistle have taken so conspicuous a part in them, that we are compelled, however reluctantly, to consider the document as a covering, designed to conceal or palliate the glaring inconsistencies of their conduct.

One other paragraph demands a few remarks: It is as follows:—"The discipline under which we act, positively discourages members of our Society from suing each other at law: To violate this discipline in a meeting capacity, is not only a departure from our established order, but is calculated to injure us in the eyes of sober inquirers after truth, and to disturb the peace of our own minds." They also declare—"We feel deeply concerned that our religious testimonies may never be wounded by contending for property and asserting our rights—that no course be pursued, although sanctioned by the laws of the excellent civil government under which we live, that may be at variance with the spirit of that holy law giver, who taught his disciples, 'If any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also.'" How mild, how pacific and unresisting, does this language seem! But alas for the frailty, the deceitfulness of human nature! we know certainly that some of those very persons who were accessory to the framing of this "peaceable epistle," have consulted legal counsel in defence of their cause. But setting this aside, we would ask, whether it be more inconsistent with the spirit of Christianity, to take legal measures to preserve our just rights; or violently to infringe the rights of others, and take possession of property not our own, by means contrary to law? It is well, indeed, for the adherents of Elias Hicks, after having taken possession of the meeting houses of Friends in various places, to come forward with these soft professions, and tell us that "the Spirit of the holy Lawgiver" and "the discipline," "discourage members of the Society from suing each other at law." Both the spirit and the discipline alluded to, equally discourage and condemn, the measures by which the followers of Elias Hicks have obtained the property of the Society of Friends. But after they have obtained it; doubtless they must "ardently desire" that the principle of "not suing at law," may be widely disseminated, lest "the laws of the excellent civil government under which we live," should compel them to surrender that, which they now unjustly hold.

A FRIEND TO SINCERITY.

FOR THE FRIEND.

PELICAN ISLAND AND OTHER POEMS, BY JAMES MONTGOMERY.

As we are not aware that the contents of this volume have been made the subject of criticism, we are desirous of introducing it to the notice of the readers of the Friend, and of expressing the gratification we have derived from its hasty perusal. The fervid imagination and original thinking of its amiable author, are conspicuous throughout the volume; the fine moral tone of which, and the truly pious and edifying spirit that animates it, cannot fail to win for him our warm admiration and esteem.

"Pelican Island," as we are informed in the prefatory remarks, is a title and theme "suggested by a passage in Capt. Flinder's voyage to Terra Australis." The captain, in describing the islands alluded to, observes—"Upon two of these we found many young pelicans, unable to fly." Again—"From the number of skeletons and bones there scattered, it would seem that for ages these had been selected for the closing scene of their (the pelicans') existence."

But we would greatly err in supposing from the nature of the title, that pelicans, their loves, joys and reverses, were the engrossing objects of attention; as the space consumed by these details is comparatively small. The author's lofty and excursive fancy soon takes wing, and the poem is in fact a delineation of the character and enjoyments of a being, or more properly an essence, whose exquisite powers of perception and intuition enable him to scan the universe at a glance, and to whom the leviathan and animalculæ are equally objects of apostrophe and admiration. There is so much genuine poetry in the very conception of this spiritual emanation; so philosophical a vein of thought pervades the description of his attribute, that we are tempted to subjoin it entire.

I was a spirit in the midst of these,
All eye, ear, thought; existence was enjoyment;
Light was an element of life, and air
The clothing of my incorporeal form,—
A form impalpable to mortal touch,
And volatile as fragrance from the flower,
Or music in the woodlands. What the soul
Can make itself at pleasure, that I was:
A child in feeling and imagination,
Learning new lessons still, as Nature wrought
Her wonders in my presence. All I saw (Like Adam when he walked in Paradise)
I knew and named by secret intuition.
Actor, spectator, sufferer, each in turn,
I ranged, explored, reflected. Now I sail'd,
And now I soar'd: anon expanding, seem'd
Diffused into immensity, yet bound
Within a space too narrow for desire;
The mind, the mind perpetual themes must task,

Perpetual power impel, and hope allure.
I and the silent sun were here alone,
But not companions: high and bright he held
His course; I gazed with admiration on him,—
There all communion ended; and I sigh'd,
In loneliness unutterable sigh'd
To feel myself a wanderer without aim.
An exile amid splendid desolation,
A prisoner with infinity surrounded.

We select the following delineation of a thunder storm, as abounding with much that is graphically descriptive of the most sublime and awful scenery. It manifests a happy concordance of epithet and subject.

Faint gleam'd the lightning, follow'd by no peal;
Dreary and hollow moans foretold a gale;
Nor long the issue tarried; then the wind,
Unprison'd, blew its trumpet loud and shrill;
Out flash'd the lightnings gloriously; the rain
Came down like music, and the full-toned thunder
Roll'd in grand harmony throughout high heaven:
Till ocean, breaking from his black supineness,
Drown'd in his own stupendous uproar all
The voices of the storm beside; meanwhile
A war of mountains raged upon his surface;
Mountains each other swallowing, and again
New Alps and Andes, from unfathom'd valleys
Upstarting, join'd the battle; like those sons
Of earth—giants, rebounding as new-born
From every fall on their unwearied mother.
I glow'd with all the rapture of the strife:
Beneath was one wild whirl of foaming surges;
Above the array of lightnings, like the swords
Of cherubim, wide brandish'd, to repel
Aggression from heaven's gates; their flaming strokes
Quench'd momentarily in the vast abyss.

At the conclusion of the tempest—

With scarce inferior lustre gleam'd the sea,
Whose waves were spangled with phosphoric fire,
As though the lightnings there had spent their shafts,
And left the fragments glittering in the field,

The annexed metaphor is bold and forcible.

To trace

The Nile of thinking to a secret source,
And thence pursue its infinite meanders,
Not lost amidst the labyrinths of time,
But o'er the cataract of death down rolling,
To flow for ever, and for ever, and for ever,
Where time nor space can limit its expansion.

We cannot better conclude our extracts, than with the following really sublime effusion: it is worthy of Milton.

So he ordain'd, whose way is in the sea,
His path amidst great waters, and his steps
Unknown:—whose judgments are a mighty deep,
Where plummet of archangel's intellect
Could never yet find soundings, but from age
To age let down, drawn up, then thrown again,
With lengthen'd line and added weight, still fails;
And still the cry in Heaven is, "O the depth!"

The measure of the poem is generally flowing and harmonious; the diction for the most part terse and consonant with the general cast of the subject. Nevertheless we find cause to object to an occasional harshness of expression, as well as undue diffusiveness of style; faults which tend to obscure the meaning, and detract from the beauty of the narrative. The description of the coral reefs, is a piece of fine writing, and redolent with similar excellencies to those we have selected, but its merits are of such a character, that extracts of moderate length would not do justice to their merits. The majority of lyrical effusions contained in this volume, has already met the public eye in different British periodicals; but among those heretofore unpublished, we remark the same pious spirit and poetic feeling, which have already won for Montgomery a high reputation as a poet and a christian. The extracts which we have given have been selected as much for their brevity as their superior beauty, and we may assure our readers that these are but links severed from a continuous chain of beauties, which extends throughout the poem.

TWELFTH MONTH, 8, 1827.

Our readers will find in the literary department of the present No. several highly interesting articles, particularly that relating to Egypt, including a dissertation copied from the last No. of the London Quarterly Journal of Science, Literature and Art.

The account of the exclusion of Friends at Buckingham, has been drawn up with a minute regard to the simple truth of the facts. We may embrace this occasion to repeat the observation, that we take no pleasure in publishing these disgusting statements—on the contrary, they are both irksome and painful to us; and were we to be governed solely by selfish considerations, should most certainly desist. But it appears to us a duty we owe to the Society of Friends at large—to those of its members in particular, whose remote situation would otherwise preclude them from the opportunity of correct information—and to the community in which we live. We know that there are some, as heretofore remarked, persons of timid minds and cautious habits, who would fain let these matters rest, lest they might stir up something worse—we like better the principle, “fearlessly but prudently to pursue the right, and leave to Providence the consequences.” Should these timid counsels prevail, what would be the result? Friends at a distance would be without the means to rebut the misrepresentations which we know have been sedulously disseminated, and the simple and unwary be left an easy prey to the false glosses and specious declamation of those who are too ready to mislead them. Nor would this be all. Our fellow citizens, in general uninformed as to the real truth, would have nothing to depend upon but the casual, uncertain and often contradictory reports of mere rumour; of course, would be very likely, and in short, it would be natural for them to involve in the odium of those disorderly proceedings all under the name of Quaker, without distinction or discrimination. In points of doctrine, too, were no steps taken to place the unscriptural, and consequently, unchristian notions now afloat, to the account of those, to whom they exclusively belong, what could we object to the justice of the decision, if, in the view of the public, the whole society should lay under the stigma of unsoundness?

Our last number contained what we considered a neat translation by one of our friends, of a review of Scott's Life of Napoleon, from the “Revue Encyclopedique.” We to-day insert, as in some sort a counterpart, an extract from a sketch of the character of the same extraordinary man, derived from a late number of the Christian Examiner and Theological Review, published at Boston. We have not considered it our province to enter into the political discussions of the day, being inclined rather to regulate our conduct agreeably to the well known peaceful character of the Society of which we are members. But we are free to say, that we have observed with regret, the many indications of a too prevalent predilection to the military life—to all the “pomp and circumstance of war.” In so far as it predominates, it disappoints the hopes we have loved to cherish as to the effects of the light of the glorious gospel of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, which was ushered in with the acclaim “Glory to God in the highest—peace on earth—good will to men;”—it might have been expected that as this Gospel spread and prevailed, both people and governments would become, more extensively than is really the case, weaned from those lusts, or that temperament of the mind, whence, according to the apostle, “come wars and fightings.” But, aside from our exposition of Christian doctrine, and its repugnancy to war in every shape; without insisting (which nevertheless must be the case) that mankind universally, come within the scope of the divine injunction, “resist not evil,” we might still have expected that the humility, the meekness, the gentleness which on all hands is admitted to appertain to the Christian temper, would ere this, have predisposed men more generally, to be less dazzled with the bauble military renown.

The following extract, written with much force and elegance, places, in our apprehension, the military talent, in contrast with the higher and nobler achievements of mind, upon its right footing, and therefore deserves to be read with attention.

“We spoke of the energies of the mind called forth by war. If we may be allowed a short digression, which however bears directly on our main subject, the merits of Napoleon, we would observe, that military talent, even of the highest order, is far from holding the first place among intellectual endowments. It is one of the lower forms of genius; for it is not conversant with the highest and richest objects of thought. We grant that a mind, which takes in a wide country at a glance, and understands almost by intuition the positions it affords for a successful campaign, is a comprehensive and a vigorous one. The general, who disposes his forces so as to counteract a greater force; who supplies by skill, science, and genius, the want of numbers; who dives into the counsels of his enemy, and who gives unity, energy, and success to a vast sphere of operations, in the midst of casualties and obstructions which no wisdom could foresee, manifests great power. But still the chief work of a general is to apply physical force; to remove physical obstructions; to avail himself of physical aids and advantages; to act on matter; to overcome rivers, ramparts, mountains, and human muscles; and these are not the highest objects of mind, nor do they demand intelligence of the highest order; and accordingly nothing is more common than to find men, eminent in this department, who are almost wholly wanting in the noblest energies of the soul: in imagination and taste, in the capacity of enjoying works of genius, in large views of human nature, in the moral sciences, in the application of analysis and generalization to the human mind and to society, and in original conceptions on the great subjects which have absorbed the most glorious understandings. The office of a great general does not differ widely from that of a great mechanician, whose business it is to frame new combinations of physical forces, to adapt them to new circumstances, and to remove new obstructions. Accordingly great generals, away from the camp, are commonly no greater men than the mechanician taken from his workshop. In conversation they are often dull. Works of profound thinking in general and great topics they cannot comprehend. The conqueror of Napoleon, the hero of Waterloo, undoubtedly possesses great military talents: but we have never heard of his eloquence in the senate, or of his sagacity in the cabinet, and we venture to say, that he will leave the world without adding one new thought on the great themes, on which the genius of philosophy and legislation has meditated for ages. We will not go down for illustration to such men as Nelson, a man great on the deck, but debased by gross vices, and who never pretended to enlargement of intellect. To institute a comparison in point of talent and genius between such men and Milton, Bacon, and Shakespear, is almost an insult on these illustrious names. Who can think of these truly great intelligences; on the range of their minds through heaven and earth; of their deep intuition into the soul; of their new and glowing combinations of thought; of the energy with which they grasped and subjected to their main purpose, the infinite materials of illustration which nature and life afford; who can think of the forms of transcendent beauty and grandeur which they created, or which were rather emanations of their own minds; of the calm wisdom and fervid impetuous imagination which they conjoined; of the dominion which they have exerted over so many generations, and which time only extends and makes sure; of the voice of power, in which, though dead, they still speak to nations, and awaken intellect, sensibility, and genius in both hemispheres; who can think of such men, and not feel the immense inferiority of the most gifted warrior, whose elements of thought are physical forces and physical obstructions, and whose employment is the combination of the lowest class of objects, on which a powerful mind can be employed?”

“Those who are enabled by constant watchfulness, never to deceive others, will at last learn never to deceive themselves; for truth being their constant aim in all their dealings, they will not shrink from that most effective of all means to acquire it, SELF-EXAMINATION.”
A. Oplie.

This partial view of human life
Is surely not the last;
The poor afflicted honest man
Had never yet been born,
Had there not been some recompense
To comfort those that mourn.—RIVERS.

Were all men happy, revellings would cease,
That opiate for inquietude within.
Lorenzo! never man was truly bless'd,
But it compos'd, and gave him such a cast,
As Folly might mistake for want of joy;
A cast, unlike the triumph of the proud;
A modest aspect, and a smile at heart.—YOUNG.

ELUCIDATIONS OF EARLY EGYPTIAN HISTORY.

(Concluded.)

To return to Manetho:—Amongst the monarchs of the original Egyptian race, there was one named by him Amenophis, (the eighth king of the eighteenth dynasty,) of whom it is stated, in a note of Manetho's preserved by Syncellus, that he was the Egyptian king whom the Greeks called Memnon. The statue of Memnon at Thebes, celebrated through all antiquity for the melodious sounds which it was said to render at sunrise, is identified in the present day by a multitude of Greek inscriptions; one of which, in particular, records the attestation of Publius Rabrianus, who visited the ruins of Thebes in the suite of the empress, the wife of Adrian, to his having himself heard the "divine sounds of Memnon or Phamenoph;" which latter name is Amenophis, with the Egyptian masculine article ϕ prefixed, and omitting the Greek termination. The hieroglyphics carved on the statue, and coeval with its date, had been very carefully copied by the French whilst in possession of Egypt, and were engraved in the splendid work, the Description de l'Egypte, to which their researches had given rise. These hieroglyphics contain the alphabetic characters Ammf (being the initial vowel and all the consonants of the name Amenof) inclosed within a ring; a distinction which had been previously observed to take place with the names of the Roman emperors, and of the Grecian kings and queens: as the rings have hitherto been found to occur in no other instance whatsoever than when containing the names and titles of sovereigns, they are regarded as characteristic signs. It should be remarked, that in the hieroglyphic writing, as in the languages of other eastern nations most nearly connected with Egypt, the vowels are often omitted, and when expressed, have not always a fixed sound. The coincidence of the reading of the hieroglyphic name with that recorded by Manetho, and with the Greek inscription on the statue itself, was so far confirmatory of Manetho's authority; it was also highly interesting in the evidence it afforded of the employment of the same hieroglyphic alphabet, that was in after use in the times of the Ptolemies and the Cæsars, even in the very early periods of the Egyptian monarchy; for the reign of Amenophis was in the dynasty preceding that of Sesostrius: it also indicated the further advantage to be gained by the application of the alphabet in deciphering other proper names, distinguished by being enclosed in rings, existing on other statues, and in the more ancient temples generally. Considerable progress had been made in reading these, which in several instances had been found to correspond with the names of the kings of the same and subsequent dynasties to Amenophis, as given by Manetho, when a most important discovery was made of the existence of a genealogical record, in hieroglyphics, of the titles of thirty-nine kings anterior to Sesostrius, chronologically arranged. We have already noticed that the names and titles of kings were distinguished by being enclosed in rings; the ring containing the proper name being accompanied usually by a second, enclosing certain other hieroglyphics, expressing the title by which that particular king was designated;

and it appears probable that the kings of Egypt were distinguished by their titles rather than by their names, since the same name recurs frequently in different individuals, but the titles are all dissimilar; with a single exception amongst the very many that have come under observation, and in which the same title is common to two brothers. The signification of the titles is yet obscure, except that they are of the same general nature as is frequent in the East, such as "Sun of the Universe," &c.; but for the purpose of individualizing, the sign is to us of the same value as the thing signified; and as other monuments furnish the names in connexion with the titles, we are enabled to compare the succession evidenced by the titles with the record of the historian, and thus to test the fidelity of the record. The discovery of this hieroglyphic table was made by Mr. William Banks in 1818, in excavating for the purpose of obtaining an accurate ground-plan of the ruins of Abydos, near Thebes. On a side wall of one of the innermost apartments, hieroglyphics were sculptured enclosed in rings, ranged symmetrically in three horizontal rows, each row having originally contained twenty rings, of which twelve of the upper row, eighteen of the middle, and fourteen of the lower row were still remaining, the others having been destroyed by the breaking down of the wall. The hieroglyphics having been copied and lithographed, it was speedily recognised that the rings in the two upper rows consisted of titles only; with the exception of one proper name, the last of the second row, since known to be the name of the king whose title is the last in the succession, and who was the fourth in reign and generation before Sesostrius. The third row was recognised to consist of one proper name and one title, each repeated ten times, and alternating with each other: these are since known to be the name and title of Sesostrius, to whose reign the construction of the table is with much probability ascribed. The titles in the same row with that of the ancestor of Sesostrius and preceding it, have been identified on other monuments, coupled with names which are those of the predecessors of the same king in the list of Manetho.

It would exceed our limits, and it is not our purpose, to trace in detail the successive steps by which the existence of each of the kings of Manetho's list, from the expulsion of the Phœnician shepherds from Lower Egypt, and the consequent union of Upper and Lower Egypt in a single monarchy, to the reign of Sesostrius, has been attested by the monuments. Suffice it to say, that the same number of individuals as stated by Manetho, namely, eighteen, filling a space of four centuries, are shown, by the monuments, to have reigned in that interval, and to have borne the same relationship, as well as succession, to each other, as is expressed by the historian; that, of the eighteen names, eight in different parts of the list are read on the monuments identically as in the historical record; and that in regard to the names that are not identical, we have the testimony of Manetho that some amongst the kings, Sesostrius, for example, were known by two and even by more names. The table of Abydos appears to have been strictly a genealogical record; a record of generations, in which view it is strictly accordant with the historian.

The period of the Egyptian annals on which this light has been thrown, is precisely that which might have been selected in the whole history of Egypt as the most desirable for such purpose. Independently of its very high antiquity, it was the period of the greatest splendour and power of the native Egyptian monarchy, and of the highest (Egyptian) cultivation of the arts. The greater part of the more ancient, and by far the most admirable in execution, of the temples, palaces, and statues, which still attest by their ruins their former magnificence, are the work of that age; and the hieroglyphic inscriptions still extant on them, and which, when not defaced by wanton injury, are almost as perfect as when first executed, make known the reigns in which they were respectively constructed, and frequently the purposes for which they were designed. This is in itself no small achievement, when we reflect that these extraordinary remains of ancient art were equally the objects of vague wonderment in the times of the Roman emperors, as they were in those of the generation preceding ourselves; but that they are become to us objects of a more enlightened curiosity, which they promise amply to repay, when the study that has already made known their founders, shall reveal the signification of the hieroglyphic histories, with which the walls of the palaces and temples are covered. Already have we gained some very important facts in regard to the condition, political and otherwise, of the countries adjoining to Egypt at that early period. The monuments of Nubia are covered with hieroglyphics, perfectly similar both in form and disposition to those on the edifices at Thebes; the same elements, the same formulæ, the same language; and the names of the kings who elevated the most ancient amongst them, are those of the princes who constructed the most ancient parts of the palace of Karnac at Thebes. As far as Soleb on the Nile, 100 leagues to the south of Philæ, the extreme frontier of Egypt, are found constructions bearing the inscriptions of an Egyptian king; evidencing that, during the period of which we have been treating, Nubia was inhabited by a people having the same language, the same belief, and the same kings as Egypt. To the south of Soleb, and for more than 100 leagues in ascending the Nile, in ancient Ethiopia, very recent travellers have discovered the remains of temples, of the same general style of architecture as those of Nubia and Egypt, decorated in the same manner, with hieroglyphics representing the same mythology, and analogous to those of Egypt in the titles, and in the mode of representing the names and titles of the sovereigns. But the proper names of the kings inscribed on the edifices of Ethiopia in phonetic characters, have nothing in common with the proper names of the Egyptian kings in the dynasties of Manetho; nor is one of the Ethiopian names found either on the monuments of Nubia or of Egypt. Thus there was a time when the civilized part of Ethiopia,—Meroë, and the banks of the Nile between Dongola and Meroë,—were inhabited by a people having language, writing, religion, and arts similar to Egypt; but, in political dominion, independent of that country, and ruled by kings of whom it does not appear that any historical record whatsoever has come down.

The dates of the expulsion of the Phœnician shepherds from Egypt, and of the reign of Sesostrius, in years of the æra of our computation, have been favourite subjects of discussion with chronologists: Archbishop Usher fixed the former of these events in the year B. C. 1823; which would make the commencement of the reign of Sesostrius about B. C. 1483. The reign of Sesostrius is connected with the early Grecian chronology by the migration of Danaus, brother of Sesostrius, who, according to the Parian marbles, arrived in Greece in 1483, which is a very few years earlier than the dates of Usher would assign to that event. M. Champollion Figeac, brother of the M. Champollion to whom the greater part of the discoveries made by the interpretation of hieroglyphics are owing, himself a distinguished chronologist, has assigned the year B. C.

1822, to the expulsion of the Phœnicians, which Usher had placed in 1825: the date of M. Champollion being derived from Manetho's statement, that the Phœnician invasion took place in the 700th year of the Sothiacal period, viz. B. C. 2082, and that their dominion in Egypt continued 260 years. Historical accuracy may make it desirable, that the exact year of the most ancient as well as more modern events should be determined, if it be possible: but for purposes of general interest, and especially for comparison with the chronology of cotemporary nations, which at that early period is in every case more unsettled than the Egyptian, the period seems sufficiently determined. The date before Christ 1822, pursued downwards through the dynasties of Manetho, conducts with very close approximation to the known period B. C. 525 of the conquest of Egypt by the Persians; and intermediately, accords very satisfactorily with the dates, according to the Bible chronology, of the conquest of Jerusalem in the reign of Jeroboam by Shishak, king of Egypt, and of Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia and Egypt, who made war against Sennacherib; these are the Sesonchis of Manetho, and Sh.sh.n.k of hieroglyphic inscriptions on a temple at Bubaste, and on one of the courts of the palace at Karnac,—and the Taracus of Manetho, and T.h.r.k of hieroglyphic inscriptions existing in Ethiopia and in Egypt.*

In respect to the connexion of the events of the Jewish and Egyptian histories, the period between the expulsion of the Phœnicians and the reign of Sesostris, possesses a peculiar interest, as being that of the residence of the Israelites in Egypt, and of the Exodus. In the history of Josephus, we have an extract from Manetho, in which this latter event is expressly stated to have taken place under the father of Sesostris, a king whose name, in Manetho's list, is Amenophis, (the third of that name,) and on the monuments Ramses. The date which chronologists are generally agreed in assigning to the Exodus, is 1491; that of the termination of the reign of Amenophis, according to Champollion, is 1473, or, if the correction of his chronology which we have suggested in a note be just, 1478; it is singular that the difference of thirteen years (between 1491 and 1478) should be precisely the duration of a very suspicious interval which Manetho states to have taken place, after Amenophis had gone with his army in pursuit of the Israelites; and during which interval neither the king nor his army returned to Egypt,

* It appears to us that a slight inaccuracy has crept into the deduction of all the dates in M. Champollion's Chronology subsequent to the expulsion of the shepherds. The date of that event is the foundation of the subsequent dates, and is supposed to have taken place B. C. 1822; after which, according to the extract of Manetho in Josephus, cited by M. Champollion, Thoutmosis, the king by whom they had been expelled, reigned 25 years and 4 months, followed by the other kings of the eighteenth dynasty, making altogether 342 years and 9 months; (including the 2 years and 2 months additional of Horus, in compliance with the version of the passage in the Armenian text of the Chronicle of Eusebius.) This number, 342 years and 9 months, falling short of the 348 years attributed to the eighteenth dynasty in Eusebius and Syncellus, M. Champollion has suggested that Thoutmosis may have reigned the five years which constitute the difference, before the expulsion of the shepherds, since, according to the record, he did reign, some years before that event, over all the parts of Egypt not possessed by the shepherds. So far, so well: but in such case, the year B. C. 1822, being the epoch of the expulsion of the shepherds, and not of the commencement of the eighteenth dynasty, must surely correspond to the fifth year of the reign of Thoutmosis, and not to the first, as M. Champollion makes it. We have hesitated to venture this remark on a matter to which M. Champollion must have given so much attention, believing that mistake in us is much more probable than an accidental inadvertence in him; but we have returned frequently to the consideration, without having been able to satisfy ourselves; and the rectification of our mistake, if it is one, may prevent others falling into the same.

but are stated to have been absent in Ethiopia. If the Exodus occurred during the reign of any of the kings of the eighteenth dynasty, it could only have been in the reign of the immediate predecessor of Sesostris; since his conquests in Phœnicia, and his expeditions against the Assyrians and Medes, must have brought him in contact with the Israelites, had they then been residing in the Holy Land, so as at least to have caused some mention to have been made in their history of the passage of so great a conqueror. But presuming Amenophis, father and predecessor of Sesostris, to have been the Pharaoh of the Exodus, the wandering of the Israelites in the desert for forty of the fifty-five years ascribed to the reign of Sesostris, is a sufficient explanation of his being unnoticed in the Jewish history; whilst the fact of that nation having been subject to the Egyptians during the reign of Ousieri, commencing 124 years before the death of Amenophis, is attested by the paintings on the wall of one of the chambers of the tomb of that king, discovered by Belzoni, and with which we are so well acquainted by means of the model exhibited in England.

Whilst recalling to recollection the peculiar physiognomy of the Jews portrayed in that tomb,—and which is as characteristic of their present physiognomy as if it had been painted in the present age, instead of above 3000 years ago,—the equally well characterized, but very different physiognomy of the Phœnician shepherds, represented on the monuments of the same period, is decisive of the error of Josephus, who imagined the Jews and the shepherds to be the same people. The Phœnician shepherds, long the inveterate enemy of the Egyptians, form a leading feature as captives, in the representations of the exploits of the monarchs who conducted the warfare against them. These people are always painted with blue eyes and light hair; and it is not a little curious to see assembled on the wall of the same apartment, different races, so distinctly characterized as the Jew, the Phœnician, the Egyptian, and the Negro; the latter in colour, and in the outline of the features, in painting and in sculpture, precisely as at present; all, moreover, inhabitants of countries not very distant from each other, and at a period when not more than twelve or thirteen centuries had passed since all these races had descended from a single parent. In the writings which attempt to explain from natural causes the diversity of race amongst mankind, much power has been ascribed to the effects of time and climate: but the facts with which we are now becoming better acquainted than before, do not appear to admit of explanation from those circumstances. It is worthy of notice that the negro, and the light-haired and blue-eyed people, the two races who might be deemed at the greatest distance apart amongst the varieties of man, are, equally with the intermediate Egyptians, the descendants of Ham.

Of the succession of kings in Manetho's chronology, from Sesostris to the Persian conquest, a space of nine centuries and a half, about one half the names have been already identified on different monuments: four of the Persian monarchs, subsequent to the conquest, have also been traced in inscriptions in phonetic characters; their names are written, as nearly as can be spelt with our letters, Kamboth, (Cambyases;) Ntariouch, (Darius;) Khshearscha, (Xerxes;) and Artakschessch, (Artaxerxes.)

The ascent by monumental evidence to yet more remote antiquity than the expulsion of the Phœnician shepherds, (B. C. 1822,) is not altogether without hope, notwithstanding the general demolition of the temples of the gods, which took place, according to Manetho, during the long dominion of the Phœnicians in Egypt. We learn from the Description de l'Égypte, that even the most ancient structures at Thebes are themselves composed of the debris of still more ancient buildings, used as simple materials, on which previously sculptured and painted hieroglyphics are still existing; these are doubtless the remains of the demolished temples, but the inscriptions will require to be studied on the spot. There is also reason to believe, that there exists amongst the ruins of the palace of Karnac, a portion of still more ancient construction than the palace itself; which having escaped demolition, was incorporated with the more recent building. The inscriptions on this apparently very ancient ruin, present the name and title of a king, which form a very interesting subject for future elucidation. The title does not accord with any one now extant on the table of Abydos, but possibly may have been one of those which were destroyed with a portion of the wall, and which are of kings of earlier date than the expulsion of the shepherds. The name is Mandouei, which name occurs in the dynasty anterior to Sesostris, but coupled with a different title, an effectual distinction; nor does the name recur in any subsequent dynasty. M. Champollion Figeac has, with much ingenuity, shown the probability of the identity of the Mandouei of the ancient ruin with the Osymandyas, Ousi-Mandouei, mentioned by Diodorus Siculus as an Egyptian king greatly distinguished by his conquests, whose reign M. Champollion infers, from the historical passages relating to him, to have commenced 190 years before the Phœnician invasion, or B. C. 2272 years; a prodigious antiquity, and of the very highest interest should it be established, since there exist of this individual no less than three statues in European collections, distinguished by the same name and title: two of these are colossal, one at Turin, and a second at Rome; a third is in the British Museum; and as all particulars must interest which relate to a statue, of which there is at least probability that it is the most ancient existing in the world,—the date attributed to it being earlier than the birth of Abraham,—we copy from Burckhardt the following short description of its discovery:—"Within the enclosure of its exterior part of the temple of Karnac, Belzoni found a statue, of a hard, large-grained sandstone; a whole length naked figure sitting upon a chair with a ram's head upon the knees: the face and body entire; with plaited hair falling down to the shoulders. This is one of the first, I should say, the first Egyptian statue I have seen: the expression of the face is exquisite, and I believe it to be a portrait."—(J. L. Burckhardt, Travels in Nubia, lxxvii. Letter to Mr. W. Hamilton, 20th February, 1817.)—This statue is in the farthest corner on the right hand side after entering the gallery of the Egyptian antiquities in the British Museum; and compared with other statues in the same gallery, which are of kings of the eighteenth dynasty, the dissimilarity of the features from the very characteristic ones of the latter family is too striking to be questioned. The problem of the age of this king Mandouei is, at all events, a highly curious one; and will probably receive its solution amongst the many other valuable discoveries which cannot fail to result from M. Champollion's projected visit to Egypt, in which he will be accompanied by the sincere good wishes of every one in every country, who feels an interest in the restoration of authentic history.

FOR THE FRIEND.

IDRIA AND THE QUICKSILVER MINES.

The spot where the original adventurers struck the first considerable vein of mercury is pointed out, at a distance of rather more than two hundred feet below the ground; that is, about one-fourth of the depth to which the mine has been carried, during the four hundred years which have elapsed since its discovery—a conclusive proof of the abundance and productiveness of the ore. The general direction of the veins is nearly horizontal; though it is not uncommon to find them ascending, in which case, they are seldom pursued to exhaustion, unless they prove extremely rich. The temperature of the atmosphere in some parts of the mine, is so great as to produce profuse and debilitating perspiration, and numerous thermometrical experiments, performed with much care and accuracy, show that amongst the great beds of rich ore, the heat is equivalent to 80 degrees, and sometimes even 95 degrees of Fahrenheit. Every thing within this vast cavern seems to announce extraordinary disorder and even chaotic confusion, as though nature had not recovered from her primeval convulsions. The whole mineral kingdom appears to have been confounded by some tremendous explosion, and productions the most dissimilar thrown together in strange confusion, to complete the treasures which are stored in this great magazine. Heaps of shells, masses of marble, beds of jasper and freestone, and iron, bitumen, sulphur and coal, are found intermingled with the ore, which is disseminated through the whole in very unequal proportions. In consequence of its numerous products, and their heterogeneous admixture, the mine of Idria bears little resemblance to any other in the known world, and presents few of the ordinary appearances where the ores lie in regular strata. From these circumstances have arisen the great variety and apparent contradiction, in the statements of different travellers relative to the mean product of the ore. Some represent it as yielding fifty, sixty, and even eighty per cent. of pure quicksilver, while others place the average product as low as twelve pounds to the hundred weight. All these statements are probably correct as relate to the particular portions of ore which were the subjects of experiment and observation—it is however extremely difficult to fix upon any average that can be considered correct.

As might be expected from the list of combinations which we have given, virgin mercury has at different times been found in considerable quantities, elaborated exclusively by the hand of nature. It has been known to issue in a delicate and continuous jet from the fissures in the rocks, as though projected by the force of some superincumbent pressure; and it is stated that a miner collected thirty-six pounds of pure quicksilver in six hours, at one of these metallic fountains.

The ores are sorted by the miners into different parcels, according to their quality, and drawn up out of the mine in large boxes, containing 7 or 800 pounds, by means of a hydraulic wheel, which is set in motion by the water of a canal leading from the Idria.

They are then conveyed to the lavatories where they undergo a second inspection—the large pieces of rich ore are sent immediately to the furnaces, while that which is poorer is pounded, sifted and then washed, to free it from the lighter particles which contain very little metal. It undergoes three ablutions—the residue is then dried and conveyed to the furnaces. There are large chambers of strong masonry, containing many apartments, all communicating with each other, by numerous small openings, which permit the fire to have access to every portion of the ore. The fire is kindled at the bottom, and after it is completely ignited, the upper part of the chambers is luted closely with clay and slacked lime. The fire is increased for several hours, until the masses of ore are raised to a white heat. The mercury is thus volatilized, and conveyed off through a conduit communicating with all the chambers, and leading by a circuitous and gradually descending course into a common reservoir. It requires six days to cool, before the furnaces can be opened or the reservoirs entered, in consequence of the deleterious vapours with which the atmosphere is loaded. A charge of ore, as it is called, is from 30 to 60,000 pounds, according to the size of the furnace, and will yield from 8 to 30,000 pounds of mercury, in proportion to the richness of the ore.

From the great reservoir, the mercury is run into bags made of sheep skin tanned with alum; these are conveyed to the magazine, where they are covered with a second skin, and packed in barrels for exportation.

The quantity annually exported from Idria varies greatly in different years; which is not surprising, considering the uncertainty which attends subterraneous researches. In 1663 the mines produced nearly 256,000 pounds. In 1730, the quantity had increased to about 360,000 pounds annually; twenty years after it had diminished to about 300,000; and in 1799, Kutner was informed that it had been known to reach nearly one million of pounds. By an accurate computation, made by the director of the mines under the French regime, it appears that the average quantity obtained yearly, between 1809 and 1813, amounted to 365,928 pounds. The crown of Austria, to which the mines belong, derives from them a nett profit of about $156,000 annually.

Independent of the pure mercury thus obtained, mercurial preparations of every description known in commerce, are manufactured to a great extent, especially cinnabar and vermillion. Subsidiary to the mining establishment, and that for chemical preparations of the metal, there are several interesting branches of arts and manufactures. The principal of these are a glass house, for the bottles and window glass used; a pottery, where all the requisite earthenware is manufactured; a tannery, for preparing the leather and making the sacks; and a rope-walk, which furnishes the necessary cordage. Numerous mechanics and artisans of all descriptions, are also employed in providing the necessary apparatus for the different operations.

As the town depends entirely on employments connected with mining, its population must be regulated almost exclusively by the extent to which this is carried on. When in its most flourishing state, about 1200 men derived subsistence for themselves and families, from the different branches of the business—but this number is now much diminished, and probably does not exceed four hundred. The whole of this great concern is conducted with astonishing regularity, and is under an admirable system of government. All the workmen are divided into companies—they assemble at an early hour in the morning, when the muster-roll is called, and each man descends to his allotted place of labour with a lamp in his hand. Owing to the high temperature of galleries; the rarefaction of the air; the evolution of certain gases in the combustion of the lamps; the deleterious effluvia exhaled from the metals, and the sulphurous stench emitted from the ore, the health of the miners suffers greatly. They become subject to shiverings, convulsions, palsy, decrepitude and premature old age. Their wages are moderate, yet, by the paternal care of the government, they are provided with a maintenance when disease and age render them unable to pursue their labours.

SAVONAROLE, THE ITALIAN REFORMER.

It was easy to foresee that the political instructions of the preacher would not make less impression than his lessons of morality, and in both he was doubtless aided by the near approach of the calamities which he had threatened.

Peter de Medici, the unworthy son and successor of Lorenzo, in the government of Florence, had declared himself opposed to the French monarch, whose invasion of Italy in prosecution of his claim upon Naples, was now commenced, and to whose party the Florentines had always been attached. As the army of the king approached, however, Peter alarmed, made his peace with him by sacrifice of the territory of the republic. This occasion was seized by the liberal party, at whose head was the reformer Savonarole, to excite a popular commotion, which resulted in the expulsion of the Medici and the re-establishment of free institutions. The first measure of the new government was to send an embassy to propitiate Charles. Savonarole, who was one of the ambassadors, appeared before the king, not in the character of a deputy of the republic, but as one commissioned from the Most High—the servant of Heaven, to whom events had been revealed by Deity himself. He commanded the monarch in his name who had sent them, both to go on conquering and to conquer—he besought him every where, to imitate his Divine Master in his attributes of mercy, but especially in relation to the city of Florence, in which, though there were many sinners, the Lord had yet many servants, faithful both in things spiritual and temporal. He exhorted him to protect, to the utmost of his power, the widows and the orphans; and above all, those who had devoted themselves to the service of the altar. Finally, he implored him by the sufferings of Him who pardoned his enemies on the cross, to forgive all offences; promising, on the authority of his divine mission; that his obedience should be rewarded with victory in this world, and an everlasting kingdom in that which is to come. Charles, to whom the reputation of the preacher was scarcely known, listened to his discourse as to an excellent sermon, and gave his exhortations and entreaties to the winds. The influence of Savonarole was now at its height in Florence, where the party of which he was a leader predominated; and in nothing was the effect of his preaching more evident, than in the attachment to the French monarch, which still subsisted in the minds of the Florentines. Of this prince, the reformer had conceived a most exalted opinion, which neither his character nor the events of his invasion could justify. Treacherous and imbecile; addicted to pleasure, and regardless of his plighted faith, Charles estranged from his cause all those who had once trusted in him. To the Florentines in particular, his frequent aggres-sions, and his habitual violations of his engagements had given much occasion of offence. Yet in this man Savonarole saw only the destined avenger of abuses, and the restorer of the purity of the church; and in his behalf he ceased not to invoke the favour of Heaven, while he prophetically announced that victory would eventually crown his efforts.

The citizens of Florence, captivated by the eloquence of the preacher, no longer remembered the wrongs which they had suffered; and they alone refused to enter into the league which had united the states of Italy against the invader. But whilst our reformer exerted so great, and in many respects so happy an influence at home, he had provoked a powerful and determined enemy abroad, whose animosity did not suffer him to rest until he had brought him to the stake. Alexander VI. who then filled the papal throne, and whose execrable enormities have scarcely been equalled, unless by the crimes of his own children, became the object of Savonarole's censures; who would not recognise in one so profligate, the representative of the apostles, and who desired that the reformation of the church should commence with its chief. The Pope, on the other hand, never forgave the eloquent preacher who had denounced him to the Christian world. The reputation of Savonarole seemed to him to endanger his throne; and the more he learned of the change of morals which he had effected in Florence, the more he feared the influence of his example at the court of Rome. Proclaimed a heretic, and interdicted from preaching, the influence of the reformer was maintained by the eloquence of a disciple and friend, and the pope was obliged to descend to an alliance with his enemies, before he could accomplish his designs. The liberal principles, and the severe morals of the preacher, had procured him many opponents; and these, encouraged by the Pope, and assisted by the preaching of the rival order of St. Augustine, used every artifice to bring him into disgrace. The government of the republic, unwilling to offend the Pope, endeavoured to justify Savonarole, but directed him to suspend his preaching. Alexander at length proceeded to excommunication, which was extended to all those who held intercourse with him. At first Savonarole submitted to the authority of the Holy See; but at length declaring, that an unjust sentence, even when it emanated from the pontifical chair itself, was of no effect; and that a divine inspiration compelled him to decline obedience to a tribunal so corrupt—he publicly celebrated mass, and renewed his preaching to congregations more numerous than ever. On the last day of the Carnival, anxious to convert the scene of festivity into one of penitence, he sent bands of children to every house in the city, demanding as accursed things, books and paintings of an immoral tendency, cards and dice, lutes and harps, with the perfumes and cosmetics of the women, which he directed to be brought to the public square, there to be burned amidst the chaunting of psalms and hymns. But the more the credit of Savonarole increased, the greater was the resentment of the Pope. He despatched to Florence a new brief, commanding the silencing of the reformer, and sent thither a monk, whose business it was vehemently to denounce the arch heretic who had seduced the republic, while he threatened the citizens with confiscation of their goods, with interdict and invasion. The magistracy were obliged to yield, and Savonarole took leave of his audience in an eloquent and moving discourse.

THE MIRAGE.

This is a curious phenomenon, often seen in the hot and sandy deserts of Egypt, Syria, and some other eastern countries. It is an optical illusion, produced by a peculiar refraction of the atmosphere, and frequently tantalizes the eye of the thirsty traveller with the image of water, when passing over the burning deserts.

Dr. Clark gives the following animated description of this singular phenomenon:—

"Here (at the village of Utko) we procured asses for our party, and setting out for Rosetta, began to recross the desert, appearing like an ocean of sand, but flatter and firmer as to its surface than before. The Arabs uttering their hard guttural language, ran clattering by the side of our asses, until some of them called out 'Raschid!' We perceived its domes and turrets, apparently upon the opposite side of an immense lake or sea, that covered all the intervening space between us and the city.

"Not having in my own mind, at the time, any doubt as to the certainty of its being water; and seeing the tall minarets and buildings of Rosetta, with all its groves of dates and sycamores, as perfectly reflected by it as by a mirror, inasmuch that the minutest detail of the architecture and of the trees, might have been thence delineated, I applied to the Arabs to be informed in what manner we were to pass the water.

"Our interpreter, although a Greek, and therefore likely to have been better informed of such a phenomenon, was as fully convinced as any of us, that we were drawing near to the water's edge, and became indignant when the Arabs maintained that within an hour we should reach Rosetta, by crossing the sands in the direct line we then pursued. 'What,' said he, giving way to his impatience, 'do you suppose me to be an idiot, to be persuaded contrary to the evidence of my senses?' The Arabs smiling, soon pacified him, and completely astonished the whole party by desiring us to look back to the desert we had already passed, where we beheld a precisely similar appearance.

"It was in fact the mirage, a prodigy to which every one of us was then a stranger, although it became afterwards more familiar. Yet upon no future occasion did we behold this extraordinary illusion so marvellously displayed. The view of it afforded an idea of the horrible despondency to which travellers must sometimes be exposed, who, in traversing the interminable deserts, destitute of water, and perishing with thirst, have sometimes this deceitful prospect before their eyes."

Burkhardt thus describes its appearance in Nubia:

"Its colour was of the purest azure, and so clear that the shadows of the mountains, which bordered the horizon, were reflected by it with the greatest precision; and the delusion of its being a sheet of water was thus rendered still more perfect. I had often seen the mirage in Syria and Egypt, but always found it of a whitish colour, rather resembling a morning mist, seldom lying steady on the plain, but in continued vibration; but here it was very different, and had the most perfect resemblance to water.

"The great dryness of the air and earth in this desert, may be the cause of the difference. The appearance of water approached also much nearer than in Syria and Egypt, being often not more than 200 paces from us; whereas I had never seen it before at a distance of less than half a mile. There were at one time about a dozen of these false lakes around us, each separated from the other, and for the most part in low grounds."

FOR THE FRIEND.

THE following sketch of the History of Byberry is extracted from the second volume of the Transactions of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania. It is lively and spirited, and gives an interesting picture of the progress of a Friends' settlement—the general features of which will apply to many parts of our happy country. The sketch exhibits considerable research, and is creditable to the talents of the author. We have omitted most of the merely personal details, as not being likely to interest our distant subscribers.

Byberry Township lies in the north-east end of the county of Philadelphia, distant from the city between thirteen and sixteen miles. It is bounded by the Manor of Mooreland, and the Townships of Lower Dublin, Bensalem, and Southampton. Its length is about five miles, its breadth variable, at most about three miles. It contains five thousand nine hundred and sixty-six acres; one hundred and forty-six dwelling houses, and in 1820, eight hundred and sixty-eight inhabitants. In the census of 1810, the number of inhabitants was stated to be seven hundred and sixty-seven, of whom three hundred and sixty were males, three hundred and seventy-four females, and thirty-three blacks.

It is observable that the water-courses in Byberry are much inclined to the western side of the valleys—that the grounds on this side are most prominent—and generally found to contain the best stone for building. It is rare to find a good quarry on the eastern side of the valleys, or in any of the level lands.

The timber most natural to the soil, is—hickory; black, white, red, and Spanish oak; poplar, chestnut, maple, sassafras, beech, dog-wood, red cedar, gum, persimmon, wild cherry, and in one place pine.

There are three grist-mills in the township, two saw-mills, several retail stores, and shops for mechanics of different kinds; but no factory, nor tavern. The inhabitants generally are farmers, and a majority are members or professors with the Society of Friends. There are a few Episcopalians, Baptists, and Presbyterians, and some that make little profession with any religious denomination. The Friends' meeting house is near the centre of the township.

Byberry was settled early after the arrival of William Penn, in 1682. When the white people first came here, we are informed they found but few large trees standing, though plenty of saplings and underbrush; and in some places, particularly in Mooreland, the ground was covered with coarse grass that grew as high as a man's head.

In the 5th mo. 1683, at a Quarterly Meeting of Friends in Philadelphia, "it was then and there agreed and concluded, that there be established a first day meeting of Friends at Tookany and Poetquesink, and that these two make one monthly meeting, men and women, for the ordering of the affairs of the church."

In temporal concerns, the first settlers had much difficulty to encounter, particularly in regard to a supply of provisions. The Indians near them treated them with kindness; they occasionally furnished such eatables as they could spare, and instructed the new comers to raise corn, beans, and pumpkins. Giles Knight and Josiah Ellis, once went five miles to procure beans of the Indians, and obtained half a bushel. Bread and meat were very scarce. Some horses, cows, sheep, and hogs, had been brought into the province, but the settlers were not generally able to obtain a sufficient stock for several years. When they travelled, they had to go on foot; and as to meat, very little could be had, except a precarious supply of venison or bear meat, which, with wild pigeons, fish, and beans, pumpkins or boiled corn, were thought good enough for a feast. The first wheat sowed in these parts, was brought from near old Chester by two men on their shoulders—each carried about half a bushel! It is said one of these persons was John Carver: his wife, child, and a small boy were left at home, upon what he thought a sufficient supply of provisions for their support till his return; but some unforeseen hindrances kept him longer on the journey than was expected, and unfortunately the only cow they had, and upon whose milk they made much calculation for sustenance, got into the swamp and died. The poor woman by this accident was reduced to great difficulty, and concluded she must apply to some Indians not far distant, for assistance; she accordingly took the children, and went to their settlement. The Indians treated her with much kindness, furnished her and the children with victuals, and taking off the little boy's trousers, they filled them with corn for her to carry home for their further supply.

The dwelling houses first erected were small, rough, log buildings, and generally situated convenient to a spring of water. Giles Knight dwelt about six weeks by the side of an old log, near the banks of Poetquesink. The Indians then instructed him in the erection of a wigwam, in which he resided till he raised a small log house, about half a mile south-east of the present meeting house. William Nichols was so poor, that in 1684, the meeting at Poetquesink, "allowed him four shillings per week," on account of his being in penury.

Great hardships were endured by the settlers for several years; but they were industrious and economical, and kind and obliging one to another. Their situation gradually improved, and brighter prospects were continually opening. Harmony prevailed among them, and religious unity was maintained in general, till 1691, when the disturbances raised by George Keith reached them. The controversy was carried on so sharply amongst the members of the meeting of Poetquesink, that a division took place. John Hart, Nathaniel Walton, and divers others in the southern part of the neighbourhood, adopted the Keithian profession and creed, and kept possession of the meeting. John Carver, Giles Knight, Daniel Walton, Henry English, and some others, whose residence was nearer the centre of Byberry, withdrew from the Keithians, and held their meetings at Henry English's house, which stood in Walmsley's old orchard, near half a mile south-east of the present meeting house.

The meeting of the Keithians soon vanished. Some of them turned Episcopalians, and are said to have been concerned in founding All Saints' Church in Lower Dublin. Others attached themselves to a Keithian meeting in Southampton. Most of these afterwards turned Baptists.

Edwards, in his account of the Keithian Quakers, says, "They soon declined. Their head deserted them, and went over to the Episcopalians. Some followed him thither. Some returned to the Penn Quakers, and some went to other societies. Nevertheless, many persisted in the separation. These, by resigning themselves to the guidance of Scripture, began to find water in the commission, Matt. 28—19. Bread and wine in the command, Matt. 26—26, 30. Community of goods, love feast, kiss of charity, right hand of fellowship, anointing the sick for recovery, and washing the disciples' feet, in other texts—Acts 2—41. 47. Jude 12. Rom. 16—16. Gal. 2—9. John 13. Jam. 5—14. 16."

Again, the same author tells us, "The Keithian Quakers ended in a kind of transformation into Keithian Baptists. They were called Quaker Baptists, because they still retained the language, dress, and manners of the Quakers. The Keithian or Quaker Baptists, ended in another kind of transformation into Seventh day Baptists, though some went among the First day Baptists, and other societies. However, these were the beginning of the Sabbatarians in this province."

The meeting of Friends at Byberry having survived the wreck of discord and controversy, the 2d of 1st mo. 1694, Henry English gave one acre of ground for its use, to John Carver and Daniel Walton as trustees. The deed specifies that the said one acre is for "the use of the people of God called Quakers, who are, or shall be, and continue in unity and religious fellowship with Friends of truth, and shall belong unto the monthly meeting of the said people, for whose use the said piece of ground is intended to be employed as a burying place, and to no other use or service whatsoever, provided always, and it is the true intent and meaning of the parties hereunto, that no person or persons who shall be declared by the members of the monthly or quarterly meeting whereunto he or they shall belong, to be out of unity with them, shall have any right or interest in the said piece of ground hereby granted, while he or they shall remain out of unity and church fellowship with those people to whom he or they did so belong unto."

Shortly after this, a log building was erected on the lot for a meeting house, and a burying ground was enclosed. The meeting house stood in the northern quarter of the present grave yard. In 1714, Friends erected, a few feet farther eastward, a commodious stone meeting house, about thirty by fifty feet, with galleries above stairs. For the completion of this building, they borrowed £50 of James Kooper on interest, which was paid off by the assistance of the monthly meeting, in 1723.

FOR THE FRIEND.

A NEAR OBSERVER.—NO. II.

Whatever may be the views of particular individuals among you, I am fully persuaded that many really believe that in separating from the Society, they have not abandoned any article of Christian faith, as held by the people called Quakers; and that the doctrines now preached by your ministers, are such as were maintained by our early Friends; and it is in the hope that such may be induced to inquire for themselves, that I submit these observations for their consideration. And I think I shall be able to prove (however extraordinary it may appear) that these doctrines are precisely those which have been anxiously disavowed by our forefathers; and that the inferences attempted to be drawn from particular passages in their works, are but a repetition of the assertions made by their old opponents, of the injustice of which they so often complained.

The situation and circumstances of many individuals, must prevent them from having access to the necessary information; and they naturally rely on the assertions and opinions of their friends; and I much fear the weight of the responsibility which attaches to their instructors and advisers, is not sufficiently appreciated by many of them.

It is the wilful deceit that constitutes a falsehood; and we wilfully deceive, when the information we intend to convey is not true in the sense in which we believe the hearer apprehends it. This few moralists will deny; and though some individuals in all ages have thought pious frauds defensible, it is a lamentable truth, that "Christianity has suffered more injury from this practice, than from all other causes put together."

By what epithet the transaction I am about to mention, ought to be distinguished, will appear from the statement of the facts connected with it.

It is well known that Elias Hicks and many of his followers, deny the miraculous birth of Jesus Christ, and his Godhead; and as they were not ignorant of the weight which the opinions of William Penn would have on this, and every other subject of faith and doctrine, they naturally thought that if they could enlist the authority of his name in their cause, it would have a very powerful tendency in promoting their views.

William Penn's enemies had often charged him with holding the same opinions, in consequence of the publication of a pamphlet, entitled "The Sandy Foundation Shaken;" and of this pamphlet some of these persons availed themselves, and have published and circulated, with great industry, extracts from it; not as his cotemporary opponents had done, for the purpose of confuting them, but with the disingenuous view of impressing on the reader, a belief that he advocated doctrines which they well knew he explicitly disavowed.

* Paley's Philosophy.

Every reader of history must remember, that in the time of William Penn, the attention of all ranks of people in Great Britain, was engaged with singular earnestness on subjects of religion; that religious controversy pervaded the land, and that attempts were frequently made to define the great mysteries of our religion, with a precision which the Scriptures did not warrant. To this practice the Society of Friends were always wisely opposed: they believed it was incumbent on them to receive, as fundamental articles of their faith, every doctrine which was promulgated by Jesus Christ and his apostles: they knew that there were great and awful mysteries in the operations of God's providence, the nature of which were left unexplained; and being convinced that all which is important for them to know has been revealed, their great care was to discipline their minds, so as to receive with humble gratitude the measure of light which has been imparted; to withdraw it from all vain and ensnaring inquiries, and to improve the talent which was allotted to them, with a diligence which would be acceptable to their Great Master.

And however contemptible this humble state of mind may appear to the high pretenders to light and knowledge; to the cavillers of the present day; to those who decide upon every dogma of our religion with unhesitating confidence, and yet (to apply the language of Warburton) are without learning or understanding sufficient to carry them even to the confines of rational doubt; our pious ancestors were enabled to support their testimony to the truth, and to the peaceable and quiet spirit of their religion, with a propriety and uniformity to which these men are strangers.

Influenced by these reasons, they declined the term "Trinity," as unscriptural, although their belief with respect to it, was always substantially the same as that of the Episcopal Church; and William Penn, in the year 1698, in a publication entitled "A Testimony to the Truth, as held by the people called Quakers," expressly declares that, "setting aside some school terms, we hold the substance of those doctrines believed by the Church of England, as to God, Christ, Spirit, Scripture, repentance, sanctification, remission of sin, holy living, and the resurrection of the just and unjust to eternal rewards and punishments."

It was a common practice at the period I have alluded to, to hold public disputations on questions of doctrine, and it was in consequence of some misrepresentations of one Thomas Vincent, that a discussion took place between him, William Penn, and George Whitehead, which being interrupted by the disorderly conduct of some of the auditors, William Penn published his argument in a paper called "The Sandy Foundation Shaken." This publication occasioned a great outcry against him, and he was charged with denying the doctrine of the Trinity, and the divinity of our Saviour. These charges he denied in a pamphlet entitled "Innocency with her open face," in which he explains and defends his previous publication, and solemnly declares his own belief. He complains of the malice of his opponents in endeavouring to pervert his meaning, (a complaint which must operate with two-fold weight against those who pursue the same course after this vindication,) and says, "let me beseech you to be impartial and considerate in the perusal of my vindication, which being in the fear of the Almighty God, and the simplicity of Scripture dialect, presented to you, I hope my innocency will appear beyond a scruple." He then proceeds to explain his meaning in the first publication, and concludes in this solemn manner. "I sincerely own and unfeignedly believe (by virtue of the sound knowledge and experience received from the gifts of that holy unction, and divine grace inspired from on high) in one holy, just, merciful, almighty and eternal God, who is the Father of all things; that appeared to the holy patriarchs and prophets of old, at sundry times, and in divers manners; and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the everlasting wisdom, divine power, true light, only saviour and preserver of all; the same one, holy, just, merciful, almighty and eternal God, who, in the fulness of time, took and was manifested in the flesh: at which time he preached (and his disciples after him) the everlasting gospel of repentance, and promise of remission of sins and eternal life, to all that heard and obeyed."

And in another part of the same tract, after quoting various qualifications and divine properties, which, by the concurrent testimonies of scripture, are ascribed to the Lord Jesus Christ, he declares that "without a scruple, I call, and really believe him to be the mighty God."

These are the opinions entertained by William Penn in his early years, (he being then but of the age of twenty-four,) and we find the same retained by him in the maturity of life. Five years after the above mentioned publication, in a letter to Dr. Collenges, he says, "and now I will tell thee my faith in this matter: I do heartily believe that Jesus Christ is the only true and everlasting God, by whom all things were made, that are made, in the heavens above, or the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth: that he is as omnipotent, as omniscient and omnipresent, therefore God."

And after the lapse of thirty years we find him steadily maintaining the same opinions, and in defence of "a paper called Gospel Truths," against some objections made by the bishop of Cork, he reiterates the declaration before alluded to, saying, "and yet where we are vulgarly apprehended to differ most, we dissent least, I mean in doctrine; which is the reason so many have upon occasion said, as indeed did the Bishop at the visit I made him, viz. 'why, we believe the same, it is what we preach as well as you.' For except it be the wording of some articles of faith in school terms, there are few of them professed by the church of England, to which we do not heartily assent."

Other declarations of William Penn, of the same import, may be produced, but these are sufficient for my purpose, which is, to deduce from them the following propositions, viz.

1st. That the compilers of the extracts from the work of William Penn, entitled "The Sandy Foundation Shaken" have endeavoured to circulate opinions on his authority, which he never entertained.

2d. Or that William Penn did entertain such opinions, although he has, in the most solemn manner, disclaimed them.

3d. Or that entertaining such opinions, he, in disclaiming them, had some mental reservations: which would indeed be the same falsehood, with the additional meanness of prevarication.

And it cannot escape the observation of my readers, that in either alternative the object of the compilers must be frustrated; for if William Penn did really disbelieve the articles of faith alluded to, notwithstanding his solemn asseverations to the contrary; then must his opinions on this and every other subject be completely worthless.

And here I may safely rest my case: the name of Penn forms too large a portion of the brightest pages of our history, to permit the approach of slander: it is venerated by all who have heard of his deeds: his character is the property of his country; every Pennsylvanian is interested in its vindication, and above all, the descendants of those who accompanied him into the wilderness, and assisted in raising and supporting that lasting monument to his fame, "the frame of government for the province of Pennsylvania," which, by securing to all entire liberty of conscience, has proved to the world that such liberty is not incompatible with the good order of civil society, and established a principle, which is still operating most beneficially for mankind.

A NEAR OBSERVER.

HYMN,

By BISHOP HENR.

Oh, blest were the accents of early creation,
When the word of Jehovah came down from above;
In the clouds of the earth to infuse animation,
And wake their cold atoms to life and to love!
And mighty the tones which the firmament rended,
When on wheels of the thunder, and wings of the wind,
By lightning, and hail, and thick darkness attended,
He uttered on Sinai, his laws to mankind.
And sweet was the voice of the First-born of heaven,
(Tho' poor his apparel, tho' earthly his form,)
Who said to the mourner, "Thy sins are forgiven!"
"Be whole," to the sick, and "be still," to the storm.
Oh Judge of the world! when arrayed in thy glory,
Thy summons again shall be heard from on high;
When nature stands trembling and naked, before thee,
And waits on thy sentence, to live or to die;
When the heavens shall fly fast from the sound of thy thunder,
And the sun, in thy lightnings, grow languid and pale,
And the sea yield her dead, and the tomb cleave
asunder—
In the hour of thy terrors, let mercy prevail!

The following was first published in "The Rural Visitor," a paper printed at Burlington, N. J., a few years ago, and is now inserted at the request of several of our subscribers.

LINES

Occasioned by reading Mat. chap. 8. v. 24, 25, 26.

"And behold, there arose a great tempest in the sea, insomuch that the ship was covered with the waves, but He was asleep. And his disciples came to Him and awoke Him, saying, Lord, save us, we perish! And he saith unto them, why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? Then he arose and rebuked the winds and the sea, and there was a great calm."

When on His mission, from His home in heaven,
In the frail bark, the SAVIOUR deign'd to sleep;
The tempest rose—with headlong fury driven,
The wave-tost vessel whirld along the deep—
Wild shriek'd the storm amid the parting shrouds,
As the vex'd billows dash'd the darkening clouds.—

Ah! then, how futile human skill and power—
Save us—we perish, in the o'erwhelming wave!
They cried, and found in that tremendous hour,
"An eye to pity, and an arm to save."
He spoke, and lo! obedient to His will,
The raging waters, and the winds, were still.

And thou, poor trembler, on life's stormy sea,
Where dark the waves of sin and sorrow roll;
To Him for refuge from the tempest flee,
To Him, confiding, trust the sinking soul:
For oh! He came to calm the tempest-tost,
To seek the wandering and to save the lost.

For thee, and such as thee, impell'd by love,
He left the mansions of the blest on high:
'Mid sin and pain and grief and fear to move,
With lingering anguish, and with shame to die.
The debt of justice, boundless mercy paid,
For hopeless guilt complete atonement made.—

Oh! in return for such surpassing grace;
Poor, blind, and naked, what canst thou impart?
Canst thou no offering on his altar place?
Yes, lowly mourner! give Him all thy heart:
That simple offering He will not disown,
That living incense may approach his throne.—

He asks not herds, and flocks, and seas of oil,
No vain oblations please th' all-knowing mind;
But the poor, weary, sin-sick, spent with toil,
Who humbly seek it shall deliverance find.
Like her, the sufferer, who in secret stole,
To touch his garment, and at once was whole.—

Oh for a voice of thunder! which might wake
The slumbering sinner, ere he sinks in death—
Oh for a tempest, into dust to shake
His sand built dwelling, while he yet has breath!
A viewless hand to picture on the wall,
His fearful sentence ere the curtains fall!

Child of the dust! from torpid ruin rise—
Be earth's delusions from thy bosom hurl'd;
And strive to measure with enlightened eyes,
The dread importance of the eternal world.
The shades of night are gathering round thee fast,
Arise to labour, ere thy day be past.

In darkness, tottering on the slippery verge
Of frail existence, soon to be no more,
Death's rude, tempestuous, ever nearing surge,
Shall quickly dash thee from the sinking shore.
But ah! the secrets of the following day,
What tongue may utter, or what eye survey!

Oh! think in time, then, what the meek inherit,
What the peace maker's, what the mourner's part;
The allotted portion of the poor in spirit,
The promis'd vision of the pure in heart.
For yet in Gilead there is balm to spare,
And prompt to succour, a Physician there.—

For me, I ask no mansion of the just,
No bright possession in yon dazzling sky—
For me, 'twere joy sufficient, low in dust
Like weeping Mary at His feet to lie
In deep abhorrence of myself, and hear
Such words as gladden'd her delighted ear,

TWELFTH MONTH, 15, 1827.

FOR THE FRIEND.

THE AFRICAN OBSERVER.

Edited by ENOCH LEWIS.—No. 1 to 8, to be continued monthly.

The present state of public feeling in the United States on the subject of slavery, is a striking instance of the influence which surrounding objects exert, in familiarizing the mind with things that are fitted to excite sensations of the deepest abhorrence.

A million and a half of human beings are held in chains, by men who make a louder boast of their freedom than any other nation on earth; who commenced a bloody war for the sake of abstract principles of liberty, and the unalienable rights of humanity; and the mockery no longer shocks the public feeling. Thirty years ago, the horrors of the African slave trade were the theme of popular declamation, from one end of the Union to the other; a slave trade, in many cases as revolting and degrading, is now carried on to an enormous extent within our own territories, and it is scarcely noticed but as one of the ordinary incidents of commerce. We are in habits of friendly intercourse with the masters; connected with them by private and social, no less than by political ties—they are our best customers for our manufactures and merchandize; their cotton, their rice, and their tobacco, are indispensable articles of traffic, food and luxury—we are daily deriving some comforts or profit from the labour of slaves; daily multiplying our relations and connexions with the slave-holders. An unwillingness to disturb an unpleasant topic; to offend those whom it is our interest to serve and to please; the suggestions of indolence and timidity, that the evil is too great to be removed; the apathy which affects the character of superior discernment, and is, in truth, but selfishness; all these motives conspire to render slavery an unpopular theme.

Here it is, and will remain, and why trouble ourselves about it? The slaves are happier, say their masters, than many millions of poor in Europe; happier than their freed brethren at home, and why disturb them?

We acquiesce in the conclusion, and turn away from the subject, each one to his own affairs.

A few solitary enthusiasts, here and there, lift up their voices in the name of humanity, but who listens to their cry? Occasionally, indeed, a political end is to be gained; a question like that of the constitution of Missouri is agitated, in which political interests give force and persuasion to the arguments of wisdom, and truth, and justice. But when the excitement of party has subsided, the public apathy returns, and scarcely a voice is heard amid the tumult and stir of the crowd, to plead for the oppressed. The miseries which the slaves suffer, the cruelties to which they are subjected, are indured and inflicted in remote and private places; we only hear as by accident, that misery and cruelty are results of their condition; often we only know it by the reaction which they produce; by the stinging of the trodden worm. The surface of society is smooth and placid; the wheels of government move readily along, and the superficial and the selfish are too willing to be satisfied that "all is well."

It is for these reasons the more necessary that we should fortify our principles against our inclinations, our indolence, and our interest. The powerful appeals to the heart and imagination, which wrought the overthrow of the slave trade, cannot now be made. The subject is comparatively dry and didactic, involving details of statistics, and rural and political economy, and needing more the light thrown by cool observers of men and things, than the aid of rhetoric or poetry. Those who now labour, must be content to allow others to reap the rewards of fame. To inform the public mind accurately respecting the present condition of slavery, is the first task to be performed. It is surprising to reflect how little the best informed among us have known on the subject. The recent work of an estimable fellow-citizen, on the laws of slavery, has for the first time portrayed its legal incidents—upon that point it is a treatise of inestimable value, and will form the textbook of future inquirers into the subject. The "African Observer" was established in conformity with these views, and is devoted to an impartial examination of slavery as it now exists in the union. The editor has pursued his solitary, and almost unassisted labours, with great perseverance and industry; and we know of no publication which contains, in the same space, a greater amount of solid information on this important subject. We are sorry that his journal is not more widely circulated, for it is essential to the success of future exertions in removing this blot from our national character, that the circumstances and incidents of slavery be accurately known. This knowledge can be best gained by establishing and supporting a journal like the Observer, which shall deserve and gain a character for impartiality and accuracy, and become in time a depository for the observations and suggestions of persons resident or travelling in the South. It is evident that a journal of the kind here described, can contain little to amuse the general reader—it takes higher ground—it rests its claims for support upon the sobriety of its views, and the accuracy of its information. It appeals to the understanding of practical and patriotic men. It hopes, by accumulating facts; by settling principles; by investigating, reasoning, detecting, and exposing, to prepare intelligent persons for a full discussion of the great question of emancipation, when the public mind shall be prepared for the decision which must one day be made. It is for this purpose that we are anxious that the African Observer should be supported. The good which it will be able to effect, may seem to some remote and conditional; for the dreadful catastrophe of a general insurrection may overtake us in the midst of our schemes of emancipation. Yet those who feel on this subject as men of sound principle and christian charity, are aware that all useful reforms must spring from a correct knowledge of the existing relations of slavery; that the first efforts to gain this, must be unpromising and ill rewarded; and that nothing but the perseverance of Christian principle will accomplish the end. But what will the labour of the most devoted individual avail, if there are none to cheer him in his task; no friendly greetings, no return of sympathy to show that he does not toil on unregarded?

Our design, in this cursory notice of the Observer, has been to show the obligation which rests upon philanthropists, to support a journal of this character. We shall make occasional extracts in our future numbers, from the work itself; and by so doing, justify the opinion we have given of its merits, and induce, we hope, many of the subscribers to the Friend, to become the supporters of the African Observer. †††

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The offerings in verse from 'J.' and 'A.' in respect to character being nearly the same, one answer may apply to both. Considerable facility in that kind of composition is manifest, but there is too much inequality, and too many marks of inattention to finish, to justify us in giving them a place.

We were delighted to recognise 'Marian' again, because we have had proof, that she is privileged at times to draw from the well of 'sweet poesy.' But in the present instance, we would presume to say, a retouching would be best.

UNION CANAL.

It appears from the report of the President and Managers of the Union Canal Company of Pennsylvania, that this canal, which is to form the great link of communication between the Susquehanna and Philadelphia, is now complete in all its parts, with the exception of the planking on the summit, which will be finished in ten or fifteen days.

Notwithstanding difficulties and embarrassments, which, in the internal navigation of the United States, are unprecedented, the Board believe that the Union Canal presents a work of improvement, which, for economy of expenditure, for beauty, solidity, and adaptation to its purpose, will be found unequalled in our country.

Early in the last summer, the whole canal was considered in a state of completion, and preparations were making to fill the entire line with water, when unfortunately, after the passage of the first boat, the steam-engine pump, which had been constructed in Pittsburg, was broken, and the summit was found less retentive of water than had been anticipated. These unavoidable accidents, (against the recurrence of which effectual measures have been taken,) have been the prime causes of the unexpected delay which has taken place.

The steam-engine, as well as the great water wheel, with the pumps, are now in perfect order, and, before the opening of the spring, a second water wheel, and a second steam-engine, will be in readiness, for the purpose of rendering more certain, at all times, an abundant supply of water.

The planking of the sides and bottom of the entire summit is nearly completed, and it is believed that the water may be admitted before the close of the season.

Every other part of the Canal, including the navigable feeder, is now filled with water to the extent of about eighty miles, and used for the transportation of coal, lumber, and other commodities.

In relation to what are usually denominated the narrow boats of the Union Canal, the Board remark, that the science and experience of the world are now enlisted on the side of narrow boats, as adapted to carry an adequate quantity with greater facility and economy than large boats. Upon the Union Canal, ten men, and ten boys, with ten boats, and ten horses, will carry and bring back 250 tons, with less labour and less time, than can be done with boats which are usually denominated "wide boats," whatever may be their size. The boats which are constructed for the use of the Union Canal, and which for some time have been used upon the eastern and western sections, are found by actual experience to be able to carry at least 25 tons, and to be easily drawn by one horse, and passed through each lock in five or six minutes.

The New York Canal Commissioners, in their official report to the Legislature, say, that by constructing two sets of locks, they can pass 1,900,000 tons annually, and with single locks one-half that quantity. Now let us suppose that the locks of the Union Canal will pass 8 boats an hour, of 25 tons each, or one every seven and a half minutes; then it follows that 200 tons will pass every hour, or 4800 tons in 24 hours. If then the Canal is navigable but 250 days a year, 1,200,000 tons may be passed in a single year.

It will be competent, as has been heretofore stated, to enlarge the capacity of the Canal, by raising the banks and locks one foot, and boats of 40 tons each may then navigate the canal with facility, or 1,920,000 tons may pass in a single year. The whole commerce of all the branches of the Susquehanna has been estimated at 200,000 tons, and the Pennsylvania Canal Commissioners say, in their report to the last legislature, that the total of the commerce which passes the mouth of the Juniatta by water from the north and west, of a kind to be carried on a canal in preference to the river, is 125,000 tons.

From the foregoing facts the conclusion is drawn, that although liberal policy requires that no objection should be made to the accommodation of other districts of country, either with rail roads or canals, the Union Canal will, for many years to come, have the capacity of conveying to market the whole produce of all the branches of the Susquehanna.

COAL TRADE OF THE SCHUYLKILL.

Shipments of Coal from Mount Carbon to Philadelphia, Tons.

Per last report, 1213 boats, carrying	28,230
Add. to Dec. 7, 52 do. do.	1,257
Total 1265 do. do.	29,487

This is the corrected amount, taken from official sources; a mistake of a few tons has occurred in some other published accounts—it is desirable to have the correct amount now in this early stage, say second year, of the Schuylkill coal trade.—American Daily Advertiser.

SUNBURY, Northumberland County, Dec. 1.

Effects of the Canal.—Three years ago, real property in this town could scarcely be sold at any price—there were no purchasers. Now there are purchasers, but no lots for sale. Vacant lots which then would readily have sold for from forty to sixty dollars, would now bring from one hundred and fifty to two hundred. If such are the effects already seen and felt, what may we not see and feel after the Shamokin Dam shall have been erected, and a water power thus created, inferior to none in Pennsylvania?—Emporium.

Lackawana Coal Mines.—These mines, with a body of land attached thereto, we are told, were sold for one hundred and forty thousand dollars! One hundred thousand of which were paid in stock of the Hudson and Delaware Canal, and forty thousand in cash.

Carbondale is the name given to the Coal Mines, formerly belonging to Maurice and William Wurtz, Esqrs. now owned by the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company. It is situate on the Lackawana river, Blakely Township, Luzerne county, 32 miles from Wilkesbarre, 8 miles from Dundaff, the late seat of the Northern Bank of Pennsylvania, and 16 miles from the Dybbury Fork of the Lackawana, to which place a turnpike road is now completed, and a rail road in contemplation. At this place, the canal up the Lackawana will terminate for the present. The mines are handsomely opened, the coal appears to be of an excellent quality, and about five-and-twenty operatives are employed in uncovering and raising this valuable article; and in erecting saw-mills, and other improvements, about the same number of workmen are employed. The Delaware and Hudson Canal Co. have issued bills in the nature of bank bills—which have a currency superior to that of the Northern Bank in its best days; and we are pleased to say, that the operations at the coal mines, and on the canal now constructing on the Lackawana, afford a market for the surplus produce of the agriculturalists in the counties of Luzerne and Susquehanna; and assure the landholder and cultivator, that the land and its products will rise in value.—Village Record.

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

By the packet ship Manchester, Captain Lee, arrived at New York from Liverpool, London papers to the 2d, and Liverpool to the 3d of November, have been received.

The London Gazette of Oct. 30, contains an order in Council, permitting vessels of the United States to enter ports of the Bahama Islands, in ballast, for the purpose of exporting thence fruit and salt, the produce of those islands.

The corn crops on the continent, it appears, are inferior in quantity and quality to those of the last year, and in some parts of Italy, have been almost wholly cut off.

The Edinburgh papers complain of the extreme unfavourableness of the season for gathering in the remainder of the crops. The rain and easterly winds had been of long continuance, and the Tweed was swollen to an uncommon degree.

It appears that the Greek pirates in the Mediterranean are plundering the vessels of all nations with impunity.

An article in the Greek Bee, says that the son of Lucien Bonaparte, who some time since set off for Greece in company with the nephew of Lord Cochrane, killed himself on the 5th September, on board the frigate Hellas, in an attempt to unload a double barrel pistol, which went off and lodged its contents in the lower part of his stomach.

The weather on the coast of England has been very tempestuous, and much damage has been done to the shipping.

LONDON, November 2.

Irruption of the Thames.—St. Katharine's Docks were, on the night of the 31st October, visited by an irruption of the Thames, of so extensive a description, that in a few minutes all those portions of the dock which had been excavated, were filled to the level of the water in the river. It took place, fortunately, at an advanced hour of the night, (five minutes to 11 o'clock) when the labourers and other persons employed in the works had long departed for home, otherwise, from the rapidity and violence with which the immense body of water forced its way, doubtless the sacrifice of life would have been commensurately great. The persons who heard the irruption, describe it as being similar in sound to a violent storm, accompanied with that kind of noise which is produced by a lofty cataract. So rapid was the pouring in, that though the portion of ground excavated exceeds eight acres, and the depth 30 feet, the entire in less than a quarter of an hour was filled to the tide level, when the noise ceased. The wooden bridge is quite swept away; the engine house and engine, which were nearly adjoining, are completely under water, with the exception of the roof of the former, a portion of which is still visible, and the "monkeys," as they are termed, and their scaffolding, which were used in driving the piles, are scarce one foot above the surface.

The accounts from the continent respecting the crops of wheat in the various corn districts, state generally, that the growth of the present year is much inferior in quality to that of the last. Except the neighbourhood of Hamburg, and some parts of Denmark, the quantity is rather below an average crop. In Holland, particularly, wheat is deficient both in weight and colour, and the damp state in which it has been housed renders it unfit for immediate use. The stock of old wheat in those parts is unequal to the present consumption. This circumstance, joined to a brisk demand in the Mediterranean, has raised the price so considerably, that foreign wheat may be purchased here at a lower rate than it is selling for in the Dutch markets.

The failure of the crops in the south of France and in the north of Italy, together with the apprehension that the Ottoman Porte may close the passage of the Black Sea, whence are derived the immense quantities required for the consumption of Mediterranean markets, are among the chief causes of this increased demand.

Official Intelligence from Constantinople to Oct. 5, had been received in London. No alteration had taken place in the state of the question with respect to Greece. The Sultan continued to profess the greatest anxiety to avoid any hostile result, but at the same time took no steps which might tend to the satisfactory arrangement of the matters at issue.

An article appears in the French papers, dated Bucharest, Oct. 10, which states, as a measure of precaution, that the Grand Seignior had given direction to the Hospodars of the two principalities, to furnish 20,000 lasts of corn, 10,000 oxen, 30,000 sheep, and 1,000,000 of piastres, within the space of five weeks, for the use of the fortresses on the Danube. These demands, which are created from the extreme exigencies of the case, have produced considerable discontents in the principalities, the inhabitants of which are not, it is said, in a situation to comply with them.—Am. Daily Adv.

WILMINGTON, Del. Dec. 7.

Mammoth Hog.—One of the largest hogs we ever saw or heard of, was exhibited in this borough this week. His weight, as ascertained at the hay scales in this place, was thirteen hundred and eighty and a half pounds. His length, from nose to rump, is nine feet, height, four feet six inches, girth around the body, nine feet. This mammoth animal was bred in Pennsylvania Township, Chester County, Pennsylvania, seven miles from this borough, by Mr. Joseph Pyle, on the farm owned by Mr. Samuel Bush of Wilmington. He is now two years old, and it is supposed his weight will be increased several hundred.

The abstract view taken in the Message of the President of the United States, of our finances, is most gratifying. We have reached the lowest point in the ebb of our commerce, and the tide of prosperity is returning upon us. Under the greatest difficulties to which we have been subjected, it is matter for proud and grateful recollection, that no interruption has been made in the progress of the liquidation of our public debt. It is gradually and steadily diminished, until it does not at this time exceed sixty-seven millions. Our exports have increased, until they have exceeded the amount of our imports. Our Post Office establishment has contributed this year upwards of one hundred thousand dollars to the public revenue, instead of being, as it formerly was, an annual drain on our treasury. In short, there is no dark reality for the eye to rest on, in all the range of our external and internal economy. Imaginary vapours may float before the eye of the discontented politician, but they are the effect of his own diseased vision, and have no real existence. Under the protecting smile of Providence, we have rapidly continued our onward course, giving in the most forcible and felicitous manner, a practical solution of that great problem in the science of government, which has, heretofore, baffled wisdom and experience. If any ultimate failure shall take place, there is every reason to believe that its causes do not exist in the nature of our institutions; but that they must be sought for in that infirmity which is inseparable from our mortal condition, and owing to which the ascendancy of passion over the judgment and the intellect, is so frequently and so fatally exhibited.—National Journal.

Hops.—We are not aware that any Hops were raised in this county for exportation, till one day last week, when we saw a number of bales on a cart, which, we were informed, belonged to Mr. David Damon, of Stetson-town, and that he had raised upwards of four thousand pounds this year.

IDRIA AND THE QUICKSILVER MINES.

[Concluded.]

The quicksilver mine of Idria was accidentally discovered in the year 1497. A Carniolian peasant, who carried on a small trade in wooden vessels, was in the habit of groping his way into this dark and wild recess, at that time entirely covered with wood, to procure materials for his ware. Having placed a pail to receive the water from a small rivulet which flowed from the foot of the mountain, he was surprised to find, on attempting to remove it the following morning, that all his strength was scarcely adequate to raising it up. On emptying out the sand which had accumulated in it, his astonishment was increased to terror by observing some shining globules at the bottom. This he attributed to witchcraft, and in the first paroxysm of fear, was almost ready to abandon his pail, and make his escape as fast as possible from this haunted dell. He conquered his apprehensions so far as to take with him some particles of the shining liquid, which he very devoutly carried to the village pastor, to procure an explanation of the mysterious phenomenon. The priest not giving a satisfactory solution of the problem, he next applied to a goldsmith, of whom he learned some agreeable particulars relative to the supposed witchcraft. For a long time he refused to disclose the spot where he obtained the metal, and with the assistance of another peasant, attempted to procure the metal himself. The quantity found, however, was not large enough to answer the golden expectations they had formed, and the attempt was soon abandoned. A company of miners was afterwards formed, who had better success; but in 1525 the works were interrupted, and the mines totally ruined by an earthquake. It was not resumed with activity until 1572, when the Archduke Charles of Austria having obtained possession of the mines, established a regular system for their management. The vast quantities of quicksilver procured from them; the variety and richness of the ores and other mineral productions, soon attracted the notice and attention of the curious and learned in all parts of the world; and they continue to the present time the most extensive and most productive mines of mercury that are known.

A few years ago the mine was rendered useless for a long time, by a fire which took place in it, the origin of which has never been ascertained. At that time, many of the galleries were lined and roofed with wood, and the stairs floored with the same material. In these the fire is supposed to have begun. In 1803, on the night of the 15th of March, the workmen discovered a volume of thick smoke issuing from the lower galleries—it ascended, and spread through the higher ranges with fearful rapidity. No fire was to be seen, nor a sound to be heard that indicated a conflagration, yet it was but too evident that the mine was on fire. Some of the workmen, with great intrepidity, made repeated attempts to reach the scene of its ravages. It was in vain—again and again they were forced to retreat, flying from gallery to gallery before an enemy whom they could not discover. The smoke, which continued to make its way upwards to the open air, was not merely dense and suffocating, but so loaded with noxious fumes and particles disengaged from the ores and fossils, among which the flames were raging in the bowels of the earth, that no living thing could safely meet it, much less penetrate its murky and stifling columns. The idea was adopted of extinguishing the fire by excluding the air, and the avenues to the mine were all closely stopped, and plastered over with clay. For five weeks the mine remained thus closed up, but without effect. Twice during this period the covering was removed, and each time the enemy was found more furious than before—the flames were heard raging below, with a tremendous roaring; at the very thought of which, the miner still trembles when he attempts to relate it. The smoke, burdened with mercurial and sulphurous exhalations, rolled forth from the mouth of the pit like streams from the jaws of Acheron, striking down every one that came within its influence; while the great heat and other appearances, gave reason to believe that the flames had reached the upper works, and thus threatened the total destruction of the mine. As the last resort, the director resolved to hazard the experiment of laying the mine completely under water, and accordingly a channel was cut from the Idrixa to the perpendicular shaft, and the water suffered to flow for two days and nights. During the first day, no effect was observed; in the course of the second day, whether it was that the steam generated by the meeting of fire and water, was struggling for escape; or whether an inflammable gas had been produced and kindled by the glowing fossils, a sudden subterranean explosion shook the mountain to its basis with the noise and violence of an earthquake. The huts of the miners, situated nearest the entrance to the burning mine, were rent; houses further off, and standing on the sloping bank near the skirts of the hill, were moved from their foundation—the panic-struck inhabitants were flying in every direction, dismayed at the apparent ruin which threatened to overwhelm their little valley, anxious to escape the general destruction, yet ignorant where they should flee to avoid the danger. The scene was awfully splendid—art could go no further in imitating the most terrific display of His power, “who sendeth forth the earthquake and the lightning.” But the victory was gained—the smoke and vapours began to subside, and at the end of some weeks, they ventured to explore the upper galleries of the mine.

It cost two years of constant labour to prepare an apparatus and pump out the water, so as to resume the mining operations. The water was found to be strongly impregnated with sulphuric acid, and contained so much iron, that the banks of the Idrixa, into which it flowed, were lined with a ferruginous deposit, from Idria to the confluence of the Idrixa with the Lisonro. SAVONAROLE, THE ITALIAN REFORMER.

While this event still agitated the public mind, the Franciscan monk, who had been delegated by the Pope to oppose the reformation at Florence, made a proposition as extraordinary as it seemed daring. Savonarole had boasted of his power of working miracles. Francesco proposed that they should together enter into the midst of a burning pile; not doubting that himself, who claimed no miraculous powers, would perish in the flames, but content to die in torment, if he might thus rid the church of a heretic, who had already seduced so many souls. When this singular proposition was reported to the reformer, he rejected it, not that he was unwilling to submit to the trial of his faith, but fearing, as he asserted, some stratagem of his enemies. A friend and confidant, however, Dominick of Pescia, less cautious, or more enthusiastic, accepted the challenge, determined to prove the divine authority of his master's mission, and not doubting that he would be miraculously preserved. The proposal of the contending theologians to submit their fate to this dreadful ordeal was received with avidity by all classes of citizens. The devotees rejoiced in the anticipated triumph over the court of Rome; their adversaries saw with pleasure a heretic rushing into the flames to which they had long devoted him; the populace waited impatiently for so extraordinary a spectacle; and the magistracy embraced with joy the opportunity of escaping from the dangerous position in which they were placed between the church and the reformer. The Pope encouraged his partisans to the trial, affirming that the memory of the glorious exploit would descend to all future ages. Meanwhile the Franciscan declared that he would enter the flames only in company with Savonarole, unwilling to expose himself to certain destruction, unless he might thus draw down the same fate on the head of the great enemy of the church. Candidates, however, for so glorious an office were not wanting, and two other Franciscan monks offered to undergo the trial with Dominick, while crowds of the reformer's converts, men, women, and even children, entreated that they might be allowed to enter the flames in the place or in the company of the latter. On a scaffold, erected in the public square, and covered with earth and unbaked bricks, to protect it from the flames, were placed two immense piles of wood, interspersed with faggots and other combustibles, separated by a passage of only two feet. Through this opening it was determined that the Dominican, who looked for divine interposition, and the Franciscan, who aspired to the glory of martyrdom, should pass together. On the appointed day, the monks of the latter order assumed the station assigned them in silence, while the Dominicans appeared, singing a hymn, their crosses in their hands, headed by Savonarole and the intrepid Dominick, the former clothed in his priestly garments, and bearing the host in a vessel of crystal. It was now but little after midnight, yet every window and roof were filled with crowds of anxious spectators, assembled from the neighbouring country, to witness the dreadful spectacle. When day at length dawned, the courage of the Franciscans seems to have abated. They insisted that the Dominican might be aided by magical influence, and demanded that he should put on other robes, in which no enchantment could be concealed. To this humiliating proposal Dominick consented; but new difficulties arose: Savonarole would not permit his friend to enter the flames unless bearing in his hands the consecrated wafer, while the other party declared that it would be an act of impiety to expose the Host to be burned. Savonarole was inflexible, asserting that it was upon the divine presence in the sacrament that he depended for the preservation of his friend. The discussion was prolonged during many hours, until the populace, who had long occupied the surrounding roofs, beginning to suffer from hunger and thirst, no longer restrained their impatience; ignorant of the motives of the disputants, and indifferent to their discussions, their eyes were fixed upon the frightful pile, which they were anxious to see inflamed, and which, it was sufficiently evident, the two monks had little inclination to enter. The fears of the latter at length became a subject of ridicule, and supposing themselves to have been sported with, the enthusiasm of the people was changed into contempt and indignation. Night at length arrived, and the monks had not yet settled their differences, when a violent rain, drenching the pile and the spectators, compelled the magistrates to dismiss the assembly. Savonarole, retiring to his convent, did not escape the insults of the crowd, and sensible of the fate which awaited him, he took leave of his congregation in a sermon which he preached the following day, announcing to them that he had devoted himself to God in sacrifice. His enemies had in effect taken advantage of the disappointment of the people, to excite them to acts of violence against him. A society of libertines, who had, from the beginning, accused him of hypocrisy, called upon them no longer to suffer themselves to be cajoled by a false prophet, who, in the moment of danger, had recoiled from the trial of his faith. They assembled in crowds at the cathedral, and, in the midst of the evening service, filled the church with the cry of war. The enraged populace followed them to the convent of St. Mark, assailing it with arms and with firebrands; the assembled congregation were obliged to capitulate; and Jerome Savonarole, and his two friends, were conducted to prison, surrounded by an insulting multitude, now regardless of that voice to which they had once listened as to a revelation from the Most High. HISTORY OF BYBERRY.

[Concluded.]

The monthly meeting was held for some years alternately at Byberry, Oxford, and Cheltenham. In 1702, it was held at Abington, and finally settled there. Byberry continued attached to it till 1782.

27 of 4 mo. 1692. The records mention that there was read in the meeting "a paper of condemnation given forth by a meeting of public friends at Philadelphia, against George Keith and his separate company." In the latter end of the same year, they notice the reception and reading of three other papers on the same subject—from Bridgetown six weeks meeting in Barbadoes, the yearly meeting at Tredaven in Maryland, and William Richardson, of West River. Some years after, a few individuals are noticed, who returned to the society, after having "gone out in the separation with George Keith."

26 of 10 mo. 1698. The records say "there hath been a complaint against Wm. Hibbs, concerning his disorderly behaviour in keeping on his hat when William Walton was at prayer in their meeting." At the next monthly meeting, it is said, "Wm. Hibbs being sorry for his disorderly behaviour, promiseth to do so no more."

27 of 6 mo. 1716. "At this meeting Thomas Walton appeared, and seemed to be somewhat sorry that he had indulged his children, and that for the future he hopes to be more careful, and desires Friends to pass it by."

31 of 1 mo. 1718. "Whereas, Friends of Byberry have made complaint that Friends' children do frequent shooting matches, being a practice that tends to the corruption of youth, and being dealt with some about it, viz. John Brock and his brother Oddy, who have acknowledged their fault, and given the meeting satisfaction, as also for being in other vain practices."

Very early after the settlement of Byberry meeting, Friends manifested a concern to promote good order, and especially to inculcate the necessity of it amongst their young people. In 2d mo. 1695, John Carver was "appointed to take care of the youth, concerning their orderly walking as becomes the truth they make profession of;" and in 12 mo. same year, John Carver and John Brock were "appointed to put in practice the counsel of the yearly meeting, to admonish those that profess God's truth, and do not walk answerable thereto."

Giles Knight, the patriarch of the Knight family in this neighbourhood, was from Gloucestershire, and came with his wife Mary and son Joseph, in company with William Penn, in 1682. On the passage, Mary was extremely sick, so that her survival to the end of the voyage was very doubtful. On their arrival up the Delaware, she was carried ashore in a blanket, and laid on the bank: she then observed, that she had been fully persuaded in her mind she should not die till she saw America; but now she had landed here, she could not tell how it would go with her. She recovered, and afterwards had twelve children. Giles was one of the heads of Byberry meeting. He died in 1726, in his seventy-fourth year, and Mary in 1732, in her seventy-seventh year.

The children of the first settlers were generally on the stage of active life by the year 1720. They had been educated in habits of industry and rigid economy. But many of them had very little school learning, and some of them did not know even how to read, or write their own names. They were, however, possessed of health, strength, activity, and vigour, and delighted in the exercises of chopping, grubbing, fencing, and farming—shooting wild turkeys, and hunting bears and raccons.

The land was productive, and large crops of wheat were raised. It was gathered with sickles, and commonly put up in stacks till thrashed. Barns were not then projected upon the commodious scale of modern times. Such as they had were of simple construction—two log pens of about eight or ten feet high, with a thrashing floor between them, and thatched roof over the whole. Wagons for hauling were difficult to obtain. Sleds were first used to gather the grain from the fields, and when it was ready for the market, it was carried to Pennepac mills on horses. A tongue cart was afterwards brought into use, and was considered a great convenience and improvement among the utensils of a farm. Harness for ploughing, hauling, &c. was generally of home manufacture. Collars were made of straw, or the tops of calamus ingeniously plaited, and traces were tow or hemp ropes made sufficiently strong.

Old people used to tell us that the winters formerly were more remarkable for cold weather, and that there was more snow than of latter time. In the hard winter of 1740, the snow covered the fences; and the crust on the top of it was so firm, that it would bear sleds and horses, so that people could travel in any direction, without reference to roads. We are told also of a very moderate winter, the ground being so little frozen, that they could plough all winter with the exception of two or three days.

The extraordinary wet harvest in 1719 was long remembered. A small quantity of wheat was secured before the rains commenced—much of it was in shock, and was so damaged by the grain growing, that the shocks were all green with it. Even the heads of the standing wheat grew in like manner.

The earliest records extant of the preparative meeting of Friends at Byberry bear date 18th of 2d mo. 1721. The first is a "superscription towards maintaining the poor." These records, for many years, relate chiefly to the pecuniary concerns of the society, being generally what are often termed "superscriptions begun" for relief of the poor, to pay persons for taking care of the meeting house, and other occasions. The following are noted for their singularity.

6 of 1 mo. 1725. "A superscription to defraying ye charges of a family of Friends taken captive by the Indians at New England, for their redemption."

22 of 3 mo. 1725. "A superscription for to defray the charges to the healing of a young man that broke his leg at Hosom."

23 of 4 mo. 1736. "A superscription begun to help Daniel Pennington to make up part of his loss, being burnt out."

Joseph Knight was two years old when his parents, Giles and Mary Knight, brought him to this country. He married in 1717, and settled in Jersey, but returned to Byberry in 1729. He had two children, Giles and Mary. He and his wife Abigail were remarkable for their economical habits. We have frequently heard of a coat the old man wore, which had been so abundantly darned that it was difficult to ascertain its original texture. We have heard of the pound of candles purchased by the old woman for her winter's stock, and having one thrown into the bargain by a generous neighbour, the overplus candle was used all winter, and the pound complete was sold in the spring. Abigail, in the summer time, made cheeses for sale: Joseph took them to Philadelphia. His practice was to go afoot, and carry his shoes till he came near the town; he put them on to go into it, but dispensed with them when he got out again—he thus saved his shoe leather on the road, and supported his credit in the city. He owned a valuable farm, but does not appear to have accumulated a great deal of money. At the time of his decease, it is said, there was scarcely a whole rail in his fences; they were composed chiefly of broken pieces of old rails, assorted into pannels according to their length. He cut but little live timber; dead trees, broken branches, and old stuff picked up in the woods, furnished his fire-wood. Joseph died in 1762, aged eighty-two years. Abigail died two years after, at about the same age.

Joseph Gilbert endeavoured to maintain a strict moral discipline in his family; he was rigidly temperate, and bore such a faithful testimony against the slavery of the negroes, that Benjamin Lay could consider him as his intimate friend, and put up at his house when he came to this neighbourhood. He also protested against the use of spirituous liquors especially by abstaining altogether from them himself. He diligently attended religious meetings, and encouraged his family to a regular observance of the same practice. Even the workmen he occasionally employed, were left at liberty to go to meeting with him in the middle of the week: but in case they did not incline to do so, he enjoined them to suspend their labours till he returned. His bodily and mental powers retained their strength and vigour to old age. He generally led his reapers in the harvest: he drank nothing but water, and that from the running brook, kept in a jug in the sunshine; but he provided beer for his workmen. He was one of the elders of Byberry meeting. After the decease of Abel Hinkson, he occupied the head seat, and gave the signal for closing the meeting as long as he was able to attend it. He died in 1765, aged near ninety years.

In 1788, the Hessian fly was first noticed in the wheat at Byberry. The crop being much injured, many farmers afterwards sowed rye; and rye bread, which was little used here before that time, became customary on the tables of some that were considered wealthy.

Until about the year 1791, it had for a number of years been the custom for a part of a tribe of Indians from Edgepeleck in New Jersey, to the number of twelve or fifteen, to visit Byberry every spring, where they were allowed by Thomas Walmsley to occupy one of his orchards. On their arrival, they immediately employed themselves in erecting new wigwams, or repairing the old ones, and settled themselves comfortably for the summer. Their habits, although they nearly all spoke broken English, were far from those of civilized life; and they retained much of the indolence for which they are noticed, when settled on the borders of the white population in time of peace. They nevertheless occupied a part of their time in making wooden trays, barn shovels, bowls, ladles, &c. of white poplar, and in fabricating baskets of different descriptions and sizes. The smaller ones were made with great skill and neatness, and the splits of maple or black ash, of which they were constructed, were dyed with brilliant and lasting colours—purple, red, yellow, &c. were the prevailing colours. These dyes were entirely prepared from the vegetable kingdom. Their natural taste for hunting had not been much diminished by their intercourse with the whites, and much of the time of the men was passed in roaming through the woods, fields, and about the hedges, with their guns, or bows and arrows, in search of game; the latter instrument they used with great dexterity. They were also fond of angling, but not contented with the usual sports of the field or brook, they furthermore made a most destructive and unsportsman-like attack upon the unoffending land-tortoises of the neighbourhood, which, after capture, were, without mercy, uniformly condemned to be burnt alive: their mode of cooking them being to cover them with hot coals and embers; and when sufficiently roasted, they were eaten with a small portion of salt, and were equally delicious to their unsophisticated taste, and as highly valued as a luxury by them, as the terrapin is by the more refined epicure of civilized life. It is not many years since the remains of the shells of these tortoises disappeared in the orchard.

This little colony, although without recognised laws or regulations, were not without an implied leader. The eldest appeared to be the patriarch, and old Indian Caleb, as he was familiarly called, stood at the head of the little community, and exercised his influence over it with apparent mildness, but, at the same time, with much of that dignity, so uniformly observed in the aboriginal sons of our forests.

This company consisted of men, women and children, and were, for several seasons, remarkable for their general sobriety and inoffensive demeanour. But the last summer they quartered here, several of them were intemperate, and when intoxicated, were quarrelsome with one another. They frequently cut timber without license from the owner, under a plea which prevailed amongst them, that when the country was sold to William Penn, the Indians reserved the privilege of cutting basket stuff where they chose.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

The following is one of several productions from the same hand, which we have had in reserve on our files. We deem it among the best efforts of his muse, and both in style and conception not unfitting the exalted theme.

SACRED ODE.

By CHARLES W. THOMSON.

"For ye are the temple of the living God."—St. Paul.

Where is thy dwelling-place?—
Is it in the realms of space,
By angels and just spirits only trod?—
Or is it in the bright
And everlasting light
Of the sun's flaming disk, that thou art thron'd,
O God?

Does fair Arcturus shine
Upon the seat divine,
Whence thou thy matchless mercy dost display?—
Or does Orion's zone,
Thy glorious presence own,
Thou who didst breathe through Night and kindled up the Day?

Or must we search for thee
Beyond the galaxy,
Far in the unmeasured, unimagined heaven—
So distant, that its light
Could never reach our sight,
Though with the speed of thought for endless ages driven?—

Or does thy spirit still,
Its purpose to fulfil,
Move o'er the face of waters unexplored—
As when thou didst of old
Thy embryo world behold,
And raised it from the deep by thy almighty word?

Hast thou thy throne on high,
In the empyrean sky,
Where saints adore the wonders of thy grace?
Or is it fix'd elsewhere,
In glories yet more rare?
O! thou all glorious God, where is thy dwelling place?

Hosanna unto thee,
God of Eternity!
For thou thy Spirit on all flesh hast poured—
And in thy boundless love,
Descended from above,
And made the hearts of men thy temple, mighty Lord!

O! for a voice to sing
To thee, all bounteous King,
That heavenly song, by angels sung of yore,
When from the azure plain,
They breathed the blessed strain,
"Glory to God on high, and peace for evermore!"

FOR THE FRIEND.

NEGRO SLAVERY.

"Disguise thyself as thou wilt, still, slavery, still thou art a bitter draught."

There are but few subjects that so well deserve the serious attention of the philanthropist, the statesman, and the patriot, as that of negro servitude in the United States. To behold a portion of the human race held in a state of bondage so vile and degrading, as to reduce them almost to a level with the brute creation, in a land whose government is professedly founded on the unalienable rights of man, is a spectacle so anomalous and extraordinary in its nature and consequences, that it ought to awaken the deepest interest in every bosom. It is a reproach to our free institutions, a dark spot on the broad disk of our country's glory, which every citizen should be anxious to efface: it is the fruitful cause of misery and suffering, over which every benevolent heart must mourn: the unrighteous instrument of galling oppression, against which every generous and noble principle of our nature revolts; and in every moral and political point of view, it is an evil, so serious in its character, so alarming in its magnitude, and yet so difficult of remedy, as to excite the most lively and painful apprehensions in every reflecting mind.

Under the influence of such views and feelings, we have read with intense interest a recent publication entitled "A sketch of the laws relating to slavery in the several states of the United States of America," by GEORGE M. STROUD. The avowed object of the work is to exhibit the state of slavery in this country, so far as it can be ascertained from the laws of the several independent sovereignties which belong to our confederacy. The author has undoubtedly attained the end of his labours, in a manner that at once evinces industry, fidelity, and capacity, in the execution of a difficult, perplexing, and delicate undertaking. We venture to affirm, that no one can read his work without feeling and acknowledging that he has rendered an essential service to his country, and to the cause of humanity. He has presented a distinct and accurate view of the condition of this degraded portion of the human family, so far as it results from positive legislation; and although this is not the only source from which we would seek light, when inquiring into the actual state of the slave population of the United States, yet it is one so important and unerring in the general conclusions to which it leads, that we cannot but feel it to be a matter of congratulation, that it no longer remains in the mist and obscurity which have hitherto surrounded it. It is justly observed by the author, that "in representative republics, like those of these United States, where the popular voice so greatly influences all political concerns, where the members of the legislative departments are dependent for their places upon annual elections, the laws may be safely regarded as constituting a faithful exposition of the sentiments of the people, and as furnishing therefore strong evidence of practical enjoyments and privations of those whom they are designed to govern. To the condition of the passive members of the community, such as slaves, this latter deduction is emphatically applicable."

The remarks and annotations of the author in illustration of the principles and spirit of the statutes which he cites, are characterized by a temper and forbearance, but at the same time by a due regard for the immutable principles of justice, which enhance the merit, and will add to the utility of this work where the moral influence of such an exposition is most needed.

There are but few to be found in this free land, at the present day, so hardy as to justify slavery upon any other than the tyrants plea—necessity. There are still fewer, who do not promptly admit it to be utterly at variance with the genius and spirit of our institutions, and (in its moral and political consequences) the worst feature of our colonial condition. Yet deep and general as is now the conviction on this subject, it cannot but be increased by the circulation and perusal of this book. It will rouse into action the sensibilities of those, who, while themselves in the full enjoyment of liberty, and all its blessings, have hitherto turned a cold and careless eye on the enslaved African: while those who have sympathized warmly with that unhappy race in their sufferings and their wrongs, will derive from it accurate and well defined notions of the odious character of slavery, in a country which waged a seven years war in support of these "self-evident truths—that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that amongst these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

FOR THE FRIEND.

Among the many novelties that have grown up with the difficulties that are now distracting the religious Society of Friends, is a sentiment which our fathers probably never thought of, much less attempted to bring into practice. I allude to an apprehension, industriously propagated by a certain class of individuals, that the decisions of our meetings for discipline are to be dependent upon majorities. Majority and minority are terms no where to be found in our code of discipline; nor has the principle which they imply ever been recognised by the Society, in the transaction of its business.

The practice indeed of all our meetings for discipline has ever been opposed to a recognition of this principle. And why? Because the subjects coming before those meetings are connected with religion—with right and wrong—and because religion and right rest upon a foundation that is immutable, not accessible to discovery by the privilege of suffrage, nor obnoxious to change, though all men should deny them. Correct conclusions upon these subjects are attainable by the whisperings of that "still small voice," that is neither in the earthquake, nor in the whirlwind of human passion or caprice. To look for them in any other source, would be to lay waste one of the fundamentals of Quakerism, and to decline a reliance upon that gracious declaration, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

Shall decisions upon religious subjects in the outward church be sought in the voice of the multitude? Shall the momentous truths of religion be tested by plurality of voice, when even natural philosophy is allowed to owe its deductions to the efforts of reason? Who ever thought of determining the truth or falsity of the Newtonian system of philosophy by a vote in the British parliament, or would decide upon the concentric spheres of Captain Symmes, by reference to a trial of strength in our own national legislature?

Because, in the days of Noah, all the world lay in wickedness, does it follow that there is indeed no future state of rewards and punishments? When France, in the days of Robespierre and Danton, declared that there was no object of worship but the goddess of Reason, did she prove that there was really no Supreme Being? When her National Convention resolved that there was no religion but that of nature, did this resolution prove Christianity an imposture? Or, because at this moment two-thirds at least of the great bulk of mankind cling to Judaism, Mahometism, and Heathenism, must we therefore infer that the Christian religion has its foundation in error?

Republican in principle, we are ever ready to concede, that the affairs of civil life should be determined by the will of the people—that doctrines in philosophy shall be tried and passed upon by reason, the distinguishing attribute of man: but, that the doctrines of religion,—that the principles of truth, should witness the degradation of being tested by numbers, is, we believe, a proposition as much opposed to the genuine spirit of Christianity, as it ever has been to the practice of the religious Society of Friends. FALL OF DEISM, AND TRIUMPH OF THE GOSPEL.

In turning over the leaves of a volume published in London during the current year, containing the epistolary correspondence between Edmund Burke and Dr. French Lawrence, our attention was forcibly arrested by an article appended to the introductory part of the volume, in the form of a note; and considering it as conveying one of the most impressive lessons on the subject of infidelity which has ever come under our notice, we have not hesitated to transcribe it for "The Friend." Free from every thing like cant, and without the least appearance of an endeavour to make more of the case than is justified by the facts the narrative carries on the face of it a composed, unartificial air of sincerity and truth, that must recommend it to the attention of all, even to minds of a similar cast to that of the individual who is the subject of it. The interest which the account is calculated to inspire, is greatly enhanced by the general character of that individual—no fool-hardy voluptuary, like the famous Lord Rochester, subdued under the overpowering compunctions of a guilty and burdened conscience, in the last extremity of a life exhausted by dissipation and disease;—the subject of the present narrative appears to have been an accomplished, learned, philosophical, and sedate character—of correct and unobtrusive habits, associated with some harmless eccentricities—benevolent, charitable—and both respected and beloved by his fellow townsfolk. His great misfortune seems to have been an early bias on the side of unbelief; and the most remarkable feature perhaps in the whole story is, that his ultimate most wonderful conversion from the dark spirit of a cold philosophical infidelity to the saving faith of the gospel, was evidently effected independently of any secondary helps, or of what is commonly understood by the term outward means—and is another instructive exemplification of the verity of those declarations, "the grace of God, which bringeth salvation, hath appeared unto all men;" "my grace is sufficient for thee."

"An account of the extraordinary conversion of Mr. John French, by Mr. Rogers, then Vicar of Westminster. In a letter to the Bishop of Salisbury.

"Upon my first being placed in this large and populous parish, by Bishop Sherlock, it was not only my duty, but at the same time my pleasure, to get acquainted with, and be informed of, the characters, disposition, and opinions of those, whom I was sent to instruct. Among them, I soon found a gentleman, much respected for his sense and understanding, (Mr. John French,) and looked upon as an oracle within the circle of his acquaintance. He was tolerably well skilled in the mathematics, and read the classics with ease. 'Twas very rare, and somewhat extraordinary must have happened, if ever he neglected attending church on Sundays. He always brought with him his Greek Testament, in which he read, with the minister, the several portions of Scripture, as they were appointed. But I soon learnt, that all his friends held him to be a rank deist, and quickly discovered, that, at church, the One Supreme God was the sole object of his faith and worship—for whenever the 'Gloria Patri' was said, or sung, I could not but observe his inattention, by wiping his spectacles, shutting his book, gazing about him, or the like. The same was observable at the repeating of either of the creeds. He was, however, always decent, and whatever were his particular notions, he never troubled the world with them. I lived with him in strict harmony and friendship many years, almost eighteen. He had many moral excellences—was, in particular, very charitable, and much beloved by the poor. He would never enter on any religious points, and if at any time they happened to be started, was generally silent, or, at the most, said but little. We styled him 'the Philosopher,' a character he much affected, both in his garb and carriage, being altogether careless in the one, and not a little unpolished in the other. About six months since, his health began to be impaired, and his decline seemed to be coming on apace. I watched every opportunity to get at his religious notions, and instill others. Unhappily for him, he was too reserved, (as he afterwards confessed,) nor could he venture to open his mind to me, when he could not but know that his end was drawing near. The Monday before he died on the Friday following, I went to see him, purposely to lay hold on any favourable opportunity that might then offer, of my inculcating the necessity and importance of faith. But I left him as I found him, fully convinced in my own mind, that he was resolved to leave the world in the faith of those principles he had embraced, whatever they were, without communicating them to me, or any one else. I did not, however, think his time so very near as it afterwards proved, for he walked out, and dined abroad the next day, and 'better' was his reply to all who kindly asked how he was. On the Thursday following, in the afternoon, as I was visiting another sick person, three messengers came after me, on the heels of each other, to hasten me to him. They all urged, he was impatient to see me immediately. I soon went, and found him sitting by his fire, in his chair, as usual. He thanked me for coming, hoped it was not inconvenient, and then calmly desired me to do my office by him. I asked him, what part? His answer was, to administer to him the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. This gave me the opportunity I had long wished for; I immediately put the following question to him, viz. Whether he renounced those principles he must know himself to be charged with; of which, too, he could not suppose me to be ignorant; and whether he embraced the faith of a crucified Saviour, Jesus, through whom alone he could be saved? With a becoming warmth, he replied, "I do." And with indignation he added, that he renounced and abhorred those principles that had, all his days, misled him—wither, reflecting on the folly and unhappy circumstances of those who build their hopes of security on the moral fitness of things. "In proof of my sincerity, look there, sir," says he, pointing to the fire, "you see the ashes of two books, not quite consumed. They are the remains of two that have helped to mislead me, ('Woolston against the Miracles,' and a volume of deistical tracts;) I intended to have burnt them before you, as a mark of my sincerity, but was impatient with resentment against their contents, and will, if it please God I ever get to my closet again, where are more of the same stamp, burn the remainder." Thus, upon the fall of deism, an opening was given me to implant the saving truths of the gospel. To inculcate its truths, indeed, was needless: he had read, heard, and fully remembered them; and to enforce them in their spiritual sense, here the grace of God prevented me; for I had no sooner attempted it, than he freely acknowledged, that he had found and felt the power of the Gospel of Christ unto salvation. He found, he said, all other schemes ineffectual, and the gospel alone efficacious to his comfort and support. He then witnessed, as to place and posture, wherein it pleased God to illuminate his understanding, to embrace those saving truths he had long rejected, and he rejoiced in the light thereof."

The letter relates some further conversation respecting the penitent's desire of compliance with the forms in use on such occasions in the Episcopal Church, which, however, was deferred to the next morning. It then proceeds;—"Friday morning, at nine o'clock, I accordingly attended him, not a little surprised to find him so weak as to be unable to rise out of his bed; I found him, however, quite composed, much rejoiced to see me, and full of the same good thoughts I had left him in the night before. I then administered to him the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, which he received with all the outward marks of faith and devotion, and, as he was pleased to tell me, with the highest satisfaction and comfort. Being engaged to visit another sick person, I soon left him, with a promise to call upon him morning and evening, as long as he lived—but I saw him no more; for about three o'clock in the afternoon, after having said to those about him, he thought he should not live to see me fulfil the kind promise I had made him, he expired without a groan."

Such was the conversion of Mr. John French, justly, I think, so called, beyond many modern ones the world has of late been made acquainted with: a marvellous work of God, as it must be acknowledged to have been. To him be the glory given, and may a like degree of light break in upon the hearts of all others, who are as yet in unbelief, that they may all be brought to the acknowledgment of the truth as it is in Jesus."

FOR THE FRIEND.

THE ELDERS OF PHILADELPHIA AND ELIAS HICKS.

Although the distractions in our religious Society has grown out of causes which have long existed, and which must, in the nature of things, have sooner or later produced a schism, there can be no doubt that they owe their present aspect and condition in a great measure to the peculiar character and doctrines of Elias Hicks. It was the attempt of the Elders of Philadelphia, in the year 1822, to obtain from him a candid exposition of his opinions, that first roused into activity that spirit of opposition to the discipline and usages of the Society which has since committed such ravages. As we may date the commencement of this revolutionary schism from that period, it has become an era in the history of the Society, of which it is important to ascertain the circumstances. A minute narrative of the events which transpired during that visit is due to those friends at a distance, who, having imperfectly understood the affair, have been ready to suppose, that a zeal for the truth may have led their brethren beyond the line of duty prescribed by the discipline. It is due to the reputation of the society among our Christian neighbours; to the fair character of the present generation in the eyes of posterity. Having had access to many original and interesting documents, furnished me by an acute observer of the progress of this sad dissension, I have thrown them together in a narrative form for publication in "The Friend."

The peculiar tenets of Elias Hicks are now well known throughout our Society, and have been proved upon him in a manner which no evasion or denial on the part of him or his followers can ever elude. But the case was very different at the period of which I am about to speak. Many discerning Friends, it is true, had for a long time disapproved of his doctrines and his ministry, and had faithfully fulfilled their duty in expostulating with him. Such, however, were the charms of his eloquence with his admirers, so great the respect felt for his age, his character, and the station which he filled, that few were qualified or inclined to scrutinise the tendency of the doctrines which he proclaimed with such warmth and boldness. Wherever he travelled he attracted disciples, and became the all engrossing subject of conversation. His letter to Wm. B. Irish, and a small pamphlet, entitled "Wisdom justified of all her Children," both of which betray his real sentiments, had been circulated before this period. But of the few who had read them, some were his blind admirers; some, having no jealousy on the ground of unsoundness in the faith, had read them without being aware of the extent of their scepticism; and those who saw into their real character were generally regarded as prejudiced. His sermons were not, at that early period, so undisguised as they have since been, and few were able to abstract their minds so as to estimate at its true value the torrent of language which he poured forth, and the sentiments of free thinking which he clothed in the language of Scripture.

Under all these circumstances, it was natural, not only for the elders, but for other faithful friends in these parts, to be somewhat concerned at the intelligence, that he had obtained a minute from his meeting to pay a religious visit to Philadelphia and the neighbouring meetings. There can be no doubt, that, under these circumstances, the elders would have found it to be their duty to warn the flock under their care from the pernicious doctrines of this individual. Two circumstances, which occurred previously to his arrival, left them no alternative as to the course they should pursue.

Joseph Whitall, a highly respected Friend in the ministry, residing near Woodbury, N. J. who is generally known throughout the Society, came to the city, and placed in the hands of some of the elders the following narrative, viz.

"Having attended the last Yearly Meeting at New York, I heard Elias Hicks declare in public testimony, in a large meeting at the north house, 'The same power that made Christ a Christian, must make us Christians; and the same power that saved him, must save us.' Being very uneasy with the doctrine, I took a private opportunity to state to him my uneasiness. I informed him, that for several years, reports had been in circulation unfavourable towards him, and that on these occasions I had vindicated his character, from a belief that he must have been misunderstood; until last fall I met with a piece in writing, said to be from his pen, in which he called Christ the Jewish Messiah, that he was alone the Saviour of the Jews, and that he was not the Son of God until after the baptism of John and the descent of the holy Ghost. To this I offered my objections as unscriptural, but he justified them. He also declared that he considered it a matter of the greatest encouragement to believe that Christ was no more than a man; for if he were any thing more, it would destroy the effect of his example to him. He admitted that he had not till of latter time held up the doctrine that Christ was liable to fall like other men. When I quoted the testimony of John, that the Word was made or took flesh, he said it was impossible. I offered my sentiments, that if he persisted in preaching these doctrines, so contrary to the Scriptures, and the testimonies of our ancient friends, it would produce one of the greatest schisms that had ever happened. He allowed it would produce a schism, but that it would soon be over, for he believed his doctrine must and would prevail. Seeing that we differed so widely in sentiment on these points, I proposed to him to have a few solid friends, ministers and elders, convened, that a discussion might be had, but he would not consent thereto, saying that he was so confirmed in his sentiments, that he would persevere therein, let the consequences be what they might."

JOSEPH WHITALL.

The truth of this statement respecting the sermon preached by E. Hicks, is fully confirmed by many respectable friends who were present, and also by Elias himself, as will be seen in the course of this narrative. The reader cannot fail to remark the utter unsoundness of E. Hicks' doctrines as exhibited in the narrative, and that he himself was perfectly aware, that he would produce a schism, and was determined at all hazards to maintain his opinion, and risk the consequences.

THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.

It is a favourite object with many in the present day to persuade the people that the Scriptures are of no authority—that they were written, nobody knows when, or by whom—that they have been in a number of instances corrupted by transcribers and translators. Let us hear on this latter point the evidence of a learned and diligent searcher into the sacred volume. “The Old and New Testament,” says Horne, “in common with all other ancient writings, being preserved and diffused by transcription, the admission of mistakes was unavoidable; which increasing with the multitude of copies, there arose a great variety of different readings. Hence the labours of learned men have been directed to the collation of manuscripts, with a view to ascertain the genuine reading; and the result of their researches has shown, that these variations are not such as to affect our faith or practice in any thing material; they are mostly of a minute, sometimes of a trifling nature. The worst manuscript extant would not pervert one article of our faith, or destroy one moral precept. It is therefore a very ungrounded fear, that the number of various readings, particularly of the New Testament, may destroy the certainty of the Christian religion.”

STANZAS BY ROBERT GRANT.

When gathering clouds around I view,
And days are dark, and friends are few,
On him I lean, who not in vain
Experienced every human pain:
He knows my wants, allays my fears,
And counts and treasures up my tears.

If aught should tempt my feet to stray
From heavenly virtue's narrow way,
To fly the good I would pursue,
And do the ill I would not do;
Still he who felt temptation's power
Shall guard me in that trying hour.

When anxious thoughts within me rise,
And, sore dismayed, my spirit dies,
Yet he who once vouchsafed to hear
The sick'ning anguish of despair,
Shall sweetly soothe, shall gently dry
The throbbing heart, and streaming eye.

If injur'd love my bosom swell,
Deceived by those I prized too well;
He shall his pitying aid bestow,
Who felt on earth severer woe;
At once betrayed, denied, and fled
By all who shared his daily bread.

When sorrowing o'er some stone I bend,
Which covers all that was a friend;
And from his voice, his hand, his smile,
Divides me for a little while;
Thou, Saviour! seat the tears I shed,
For thou hast wept o'er Lazarus dead.

And Oh! when I have safely past
Thro' every conflict but the last,
Still, still unchanging, watch beside
My parting couch, for Thou hast died,
Then point to realms of endless day,
And wipe the latest tear away.

COMMUNICATION.

TEXT.

“We feel an ardent desire, that in all our proceedings tending to this end, our conduct towards all our brethren, may, on every occasion, be marked with love and forbearance.”

Green Street Address of the 4th mo.

COMMENTARY.

The object of the present communication is to relate the circumstances attendant on the exclusion of Friends from their meeting house at Frankford; and, although they are not accompanied with any of those acts of violence by which the proceedings of the followers of Elias Hicks have, in several instances, been marked, yet their conduct in the present case is particularly unfair and oppressive.

At the close of their meeting for worship, on the first day following their quarterly meeting in the 11th month, Joseph Churchman, a conspicuous member of the new sect, informed the assembly, that, by a late arrangement, (which was concluded upon at the late meeting of the followers of Elias Hicks at Horsham,) Frankford midweek meeting would be held for the future on 6th instead of 5th day. It would seem as though the design of this change was to harass Friends, and to try how far they would submit to be governed by the conclusions of the new sect; and in the expectation probably, that, rather than acknowledge the authority of the separatists, they would peaceably retire from the meeting house, and leave it and the appurtenances in the possession of their opponents. It is obvious, indeed, that Friends could not recognise this assumption of control over the meetings, by persons who had formally seceded from the Society; and, accordingly, on the following fifth day, the usual time for their meeting, Friends convened at the meeting house, which they found securely locked up to prevent their entrance. Two Friends immediately waited on the person appointed to the care of the house, who is one of the new sect, and respectfully requested him to open it for the meeting. He declined doing so, and informed them, that some of the trustees, and others, of the followers of Elias Hicks, had directed him not to do it. They then asked him for the key of the meeting house, but he told them that the key was his property, and he should not give it up. It appears to us somewhat extraordinary, that men's notions of justice should be so strangely perverted, as to induce them to suppose, that the mere circumstance of a man being hired to open and close a meeting house, to make the fires and keep it clean, should give him absolute control over it, and actually make the key his own property. Such, however, were the prerogatives he assumed, and Friends concluded quietly to submit and suffer the wrong. A person residing in the vicinity of the meeting house, perceiving the unpleasant situation in which Friends were placed, kindly made them the offer of his house to meet in, which was accepted, and the meeting held there for that time. As it was obviously the intention of the followers of Elias Hicks to take exclusive possession and control of the property, Friends believed it proper to look out for a suitable meeting place, and a house was accordingly procured in the town of Frankford, and fitted up for the occasion, where the meetings of Friends are now regularly held on first and fifth days. We before said, that the conduct of the followers of Elias Hicks was, in this instance, peculiarly unfair and oppressive, and we are supported in the assertion by their own favourite, though erroneous maxim, that “the majority must govern.” It appears from actual enumeration, that, of the whole number of members of Frankford meeting, a considerable majority are Friends, and consequently ought, in conformity with the often repeated professions of the new sect, to have the use of the property. What signify all the high professions of “condescension, love, forbearance, and brotherly kindness,” which have been so liberally made in their epistles and addresses? They may serve the temporary purpose of deceiving the uninformed, but the disappointment and disgust of these will, in the end, be proportioned to the wide contrast between the professions and the practice. Where shall we look in the proceedings of the new society for a practical illustration of those excellent precepts and advices which their printed documents contain? The search, alas, is vain and fruitless! It only adds another to the many humiliating proofs of the inconsistency and frailty of human nature, and may serve to show us, that those, whose professions are the fairest, are not always the most exemplary in their practice.

SELECTED FOR THE FRIEND.

Between Christians, whose judgments disagree only about a form of prayer or manner of worship, I apprehend there is no more essential difference than between flowers which bloom from the same kind of seed, but happen to be somewhat diversified in the mixture of their colours. Whereas, if one denies the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and degrades the incarnate God to the meanness of a mere creature; if another cries up the worthlessness of human works, and depreciates the alone meritorious righteousness of the glorious Mediator; if a third addresses the incommunicable honours to a finite being, and bows to the image, or prays to the saint—these are errors extremely derogatory to the Redeemer's dignity, and not a little prejudicial to the comfort of his people; against these to remonstrate, against these to urge every argument and use every dissuasive, bespeaks not the censorious bigot but the friend of truth, and the lover of mankind. Whereas, to stand neuter and silent, while such principles are propagated, would be an instance of criminal remissness rather than of Christian moderation. For the persons, we will not fail to maintain a tender compassion; we will not cease to put up earnest intercessions; we will also acknowledge and love whatever is excellent in their character; yet we dare not subscribe their creed; we cannot remit our assiduous, but kind endeavours, if, by any means, we may reconcile them to a more scriptural belief and a purer worship.—Hervey.

The economical rule, “take care of the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves,” may, with great benefit, be applied to morals. Few persons, comparatively, are exposed to the danger of committing great crimes, but all are daily and hourly tempted to commit little ones. Beware, therefore, of slight deviations from purity and rectitude, and great ones will take care of themselves; and the habit of resistance to trivial vices will make you able to resist temptation to errors of a more culpable nature; and as those persons will not be likely to exceed improperly in pounds, who are laudably saving in pence; and as little lies are to great ones, what pence are to pounds, if we acquire a habit of telling truth on trivial occasions, we shall never be induced to violate it on serious and important ones.—A. Oris.

FOR THE FRIEND.

BENEVOLENT ECCENTRICITY.

The following newspaper article excited so much interest in ourselves, that we thought proper to introduce it in "The Friend" for the gratification of such of our readers as may not have seen it. The phrase by which we have designated it, is rather in compliance with the manner in which it will probably strike people in general; on the contrary, we consider it as a rational and altogether praiseworthy exercise of genuine philanthropy. We have sometimes indulged in the contemplation of what might be the result of a more general faithfulness to the precept and spirit of the gospel dispensation. The effects which this would necessarily produce would be seen in greater degrees of dedication, in the multiplication of disinterested acts of benevolence, in deeds of charity and offices of love. There would be less regard to popular favour—to the applause or to the censures of the many, and more to the due fulfilment of our individual stewardship; the consideration would be whatever thy hand findest to do—in other words, what is right for thee to do, that do, with fidelity, and with a single eye to the good to be effected; thus proceeding in the straight forward course of simple duty, each one would be inclined to seek out his peculiar field of labour—his proper allotment of service, contributing, in his relative proportion, to the general harmony, and the promotion of universal righteousness.

PROVIDENCE, Dec. 4.

We observed the other day in the Newport Mercury, under date of October 18, the following advertisement: "A person offers to teach a school in Coventry four months, without any compensation, and supply the same school with an instructress five months at his own expense. A letter addressed to A. B. New Ipswich, New Hampshire, and conveyed by mail, will be faithfully regarded."

We cannot willingly remain silent in reference to the disinterested conduct of this individual designated as A. B., though it would give us cause of sincere regret, if the relation of the following facts, which we derived from the representatives of the towns alluded to, should in the slightest degree be unacceptable to one who has for so long a period practised upon the maxim, which teacheth the truly benevolent when they do a good action, to let not the left hand know what the right hand doeth. Such examples are so rare, that the benefit of them ought not to be withheld from the public.

In 1824, an advertisement similar to the above, purporting that a person would teach a school gratuitously in West Greenwich, in this state, induced some gentlemen in that town to write to A. B. at the place designated, expressing a desire to avail themselves of his offer. Soon after, a person arrived in West Greenwich, and opened a school, which he taught in the best manner for three months, refusing to receive any compensation, and even insisted on paying his board, and other incidental expenses, which those whose children had been benefited by his instructions were solicitous to relieve him from. The instructor was only known by the appellation of Mr. A. B. and the Master, and at the end of the school departed, leaving his best wishes with the people. The following winter, 1825, the same offer was made by A. B. to teach a school in Richmond, on application by letter to Brattleborough, Vermont. He was immediately written to, agreeably to the direction, and soon after opened his school in Richmond, which was continued for three months, and which gave more satisfaction to the parents than any school ever taught in the town. The instructor not only refused all pecuniary consideration, and insisted on bearing his own expenses, but, on leaving the place, put forty-six dollars into the hands of a female, who had attended his school, and was qualified for the task, as a compensation for her continuing to keep the school during the summer months, which was accordingly done. Last year, the same benevolent gentleman, whose real name had not been ascertained, gave notice that he should teach a school in Hopkinton, if written to at Amherst, N. H. Colonel Barber, of that place, immediately wrote as directed, and the gentleman soon arrived. His school was attended by upwards of fifty pupils. His qualifications as an instructor were of a high order, and the children improved more under his tuition than they had ever done before. He again refused the most earnest solicitations of the parents to be allowed to pay for his board and the incidental expenses of the school, permitting them only to furnish the wood and school-room, himself gratuitously supplying the scholars with nearly all the books necessary in their studies. The inhabitants, with becoming politeness, never pressed the disclosure of the name of the individual, to whom they were so much indebted, and he left them at the close of his school entirely ignorant whether he possessed any other designation than the initials by which he had uniformly been known. Letters, &c. directed to him, bore only the superscription, to Mr. A. B. He was a young gentleman of prepossessing and amiable manners, and possessing a well cultivated mind.

We have been induced to state these facts, not with a wish of attracting public attention towards an individual as unassuming as he has shown himself benevolent; but for the purpose of conveying, in some slight degree, an expression of the gratitude felt by those persons whose children have been benefited by his instructions. Curiosity, without much regard to consequences or feelings, is supposed to be a prevailing trait in the character of the inhabitants of country towns, and it is not a little creditable to those of the towns that have enjoyed the benefits of this gentleman's instructions, that he has never, during his stay with them, been subjected to an idle scrutiny, that would have rendered the preservation of his incognito extremely inconvenient.—American.

FOR THE FRIEND.

The writer of the following notice, who is a constant reader of the Friend, has been much gratified by observing the elevated standard both of style and sentiment, which has been adopted and maintained in the management of its literary department. The selections have been such as were calculated at the same time to instruct by the value of their matter, and to please and improve that taste by the purity of their style; and the original articles, while entirely destitute of glare and tinsel, are characterized, in general, by a solidity of thought and a correctness of diction, which, if continued, will establish the journal in public estimation, and thus enable it to exercise a most beneficial influence over that portion of the community in which it circulates. It is therefore anxiously to be desired, that all communications, before admission into its pages, may be scrupulously examined, lest, by becoming the vehicle of error, it should be lowered in the estimation of those who are capable of appreciating its merits, and prove injurious in its operation upon others, who may be disposed to confide implicitly in its statements and opinions. This remark is the more applicable, as there is reason to fear, that, in a recent instance, the vigilance which has usually watched over the literary execution of the journal has been somewhat deficient; and sentiments have been permitted to pass into circulation which would not have borne the test of strict inspection. Allusion is made to a paper in the last number of the Friend, containing some critical observations on a recent production of Montgomery, entitled "The Pelican Island." The author of these observations is evidently young in the art of criticism, and has been induced, by a very natural ambition, to trust to his own unfledged powers in an attempt in which success could be expected only from maturer strength and more practised skill. The opinions which he has advanced upon the merits of the poem are such as his own riper judgment will probably condemn, and, so far from being confirmed, are, in fact, directly contravened by the unfortunate illustrations he has adduced in support of them. A more striking example of the genuine bathos could scarcely be found, within the range of English poetry, than is afforded by the following effusion, which is pronounced "sublime," and "worthy of Milton."

—whose judgments are a mighty deep,
Where plummet of archangel's intellect
Could never yet find soundings, but from age
To age let down, drawn up, then thrown again
With lengthened line and added weight, still fails;
And still the cry in Heaven is "O the depth!"

We might truly reiterate, "O the depth!"

The "bold and forcible metaphor" sinks, when properly estimated, into a far-fetched image, which becomes ridiculous by the attempt, towards its close, to increase the force of expression by triplicating eternity.

—To trace
The Nile of thinking to its secret source,
And thence pursue its infinite meanders,
Not lost amid the labyrinth of time,
But o'er the cataract of death down rolling,
To flow for ever, and for ever, and for ever,
Where time nor space can limit its expansion.

In the remaining extracts, there is some beauty of thought and expression; but far too little to justify the high commendation bestowed upon the author. The description of the storm at sea is debased by the low and rather singular image of

"Mountains each other swallowing;"

and weakened by the hacknied comparison contained in the following lines:

Now Alps and Andes, from unfathomed valleys
Upstarting, joined the battle; like those sons
Of earth—giants, rebounding as new-born
From every fall on their unwearied mother.

The poetical talents of Montgomery have been overrated in this country. It is true, that so long continued a popularity as that which he has enjoyed, must have some foundation in the merit of his productions; and many of his minor pieces are marked by a kindliness of feeling, a pleasing succession of imagery, and occasionally by an energy of expression which entitle them to approbation. But circumstances, unconnected with poetical merit, have greatly contributed to exalt his reputation. The vein of pious feeling which runs through his works, the uniform regard they exhibit for the moral duties, and all the decencies of life, and a disposition, apparent on every occasion, to advocate the cause of the injured and oppressed, have enlisted the heart in his favour; and a strong desire to be pleased often supplies the place of real desert in the objects of our attention.

The style of Montgomery, in his more extended productions, is almost always loose and feeble, often exceedingly careless in its structure, and in many places, quite prosaic. Figurative language, however, is not wanting. On the contrary, his imagination appears to be frequently tasked for metaphors; and when they do not present themselves to his invention, he hesitates not to resort to the store-house of his memory. It would indicate a spirit rather of hostility than of justice to affirm, that his imagery is never pleasing nor beautiful; but, in strict truth, it may be said, that it seldom, if ever, rises into strength or sublimity—is often exceedingly ill arranged, and abounds in those faults which a cultivated taste condemns. A few extracts from the Pelican Island will show that this last assertion is not without foundation.

Describing the effects of a breeze at sea, the author says

————— bubble armies fought
Millions of battles on the crested surges,
And where they fell, all covered with their glory,
Traced in white foam on the cerulean main,
Paths, like the milky-way among the stars.

This is pure bombast.

Many instances, such as the following, might be given, in which the original idea is debased by the comparison. Speaking of the Pelicans, he observes:—

Or, when the flying-fish, in sudden clouds,
Burst from the sea, and flutter through the air,
These giant-fowlers snapt them like mosquitoes
By swallows hunted through the summer sky.

The motions of the flying-fish are thus described:

On wing-like fins, in bow-and-arrow figures,
The flying-fishes darted to and fro.

Great coral islands emerging from the ocean are compared with the leaves of water-lilies in a pool.

They spread like water-lilies, whose broad leaves
Make green and sunny islets on the pool, &c.

Of a tiger on the watch for prey, the poet says:

————— his fire-ball eyes
Made horrid twilight in the sunless jungle.

Numerous other examples of disregard for the rules of good writing might be adduced from this poem; but these afford sufficient evidence that the style of Montgomery is not one which can be recommended for imitation, or upon which the taste of the young reader can be advantageously formed. Our attention is too much directed away from our older and truly classical writers; and, it is to be feared, lest the torrent of verbiage which is now poured forth upon the reading public, may sweep away all the barriers of good taste, which the genius and industry of past time have erected, and overwhelm our language in its chaotic confusion. The periodical press is contributing rather to swell the deluge than to stay its course: and, it is therefore especially incumbent upon those journals, which, like the Friend, are devoted to the maintenance of sound principles in literature, as well as religion, to be exceedingly cautious, lest, by giving to error the sanction of their authority, they should weaken the very defences they are intended to strengthen.

FOR THE FRIEND.

I know not whether the enclosed will meet the views of the editor of the Friend, as it inculcates no distinct moral sentiment. It may, however, be acceptable as a specimen of the poetry of Spain, with whose literature, in general, we are not, perhaps, so familiar as with that of some other modern nations. The original from which this rude but very literal translation has been attempted, displays great sensibility to the beauty and sublimity of nature, enriched by a fine vein of poetic imagery. The close resemblance which it bears in many passages to the beautiful Address to the Ocean, in the third canto of Childe Harold, induces the supposition that Lord Byron must have been familiar with it, and perhaps have been indebted to it for some of his most noble thoughts and splendid images. Z.

TO THE OCEAN.

Immortal Ocean! calm thy rushing waves!
Lull their proud swell—nor to my feeble voice
Send from thy breast the turbulent response.
Soothe thy unquiet surface into smiles!
And grant my sight o'er all thy wide expanse
To roam at pleasure.—How my mind is fill'd
With contemplation of thy power, immense,
Unbounded—and on India's distant shores,
Or on the farthest borders of the West,
I gaze, where'er thy glorious sway extends,
And bow for ever at thy lofty shrine.
Swift where imagination's fervid power
Leads on, I follow—with unmix'd disdain
Bursting the narrow circle, which confined
My bounded view, I course my rapid flight
To where the eternal pyramids arise
On Egypt's plain; or to the Tempean vale,
Whence proud Olympus rears his lofty brow.
Then, with a daring step, ascend the heights
Of labouring Ætna, view the vast abyss
Where flame the unceasing fires, whence bursting forth

The burning lava pours its glowing waves
Over the mountain's side; swift fly the rocks
Upheaved to Heaven—while at the thunder's roar
Trinacria trembles. But not all the grand,
Sublime, or beautiful, in nature's works,
Oh, sacred Ocean! gives me such delight,
Such rapture, or enjoyment so intense,
As to disport me on thy ample breast.
For, I have joined myself to thee; have linked
My happiness with thee: thy boiling foam
Flinging its whiteness o'er the rugged rock
With ceaseless dash, awakens in my mind
A pleasing awe, with admiration joined.
In gorgeous splendour when the sun descends
The western Heaven, he shrouds his beaming brow
Amid thy waves, whose restless scintillations
Betray his course. Where are thy bounds, O Sea?
Can the eye trace thy limits? With swift course
Thou spread'st thy waste of waters o'er the globe:
If on the sounding north wind borne, I fly
To equatorial regions, I behold
Thy waves, upheaving to the torrid beams:
If to the utmost pole, lo! thou art there—
My spirit sinks within me, o'erwhelmed,
Lost, and annihilated, in thy immensity.
Has destiny decreed thee to embrace
The Earth, as with a girdle, thus to mark
Her limits, and protect her distant shores?
Or art thou fated in thy terrible rage,
To pour destruction o'er her proudest realms?
Ah! how that turbulent, resounding surge
My heart depresses. Often have I seen
The summer winds sweep o'er the ripening harvest,
Prostrating all its pride, while bow'd to earth,
In moaning sounds it deprecates their wrath.
I've seen the furious whirlwind flinging high
Columns of dust—or viewed the lofty pines
Tremble and groan beneath the raging blast.
But never yet this blind, this passionate life—
These swelling surges, which with ceaseless course,
Come, fly, return, lashing the sounding shore,

Still on, and on, unwearied; at the rush
Of this dread music, quake the mountains round;
Even echo deafens, at the awful roar.
Cease, cease thy fury, Ocean! deign to look Compassionate upon the frail support,
To which, exhausted, spiritless, I cling.
Hear'st thou me not? and lashest thou thyself
To added fury? lo! unlooked for comes
The fearful hurricane, thy voice to join!
What barrier can resist thee? What retreat
Is sacred from thy fury? Black as night
Thy mountain waves upheave, or in deep gulfs
Of raging foam, seem threatening to o'erwhelm me.
Behold I then that day of dreadful war!
When thy victorious waters, sweeping o'er
Earth's fairest regions, blindly shall engulf,
Men, kingdoms, empires, in thy dark abyss!
Thus in thy whelming wave submerged, was lost,
Where now the Atlantic's foaming billows swell,
A wide spread continent. The thick-ribb'd Earth
Bound in her firmest zone, essayed in vain
To mock thy fury—at thy powerful strokes,
Impetuous and redoubled, surge on surge,
The mighty axis shook—till burst at last
Her firmest barriers—then her trembling orb
Was rent asunder, and with awful roar,
Into the vast abyss, where once outspread
Her blooming plains, thy world of waters rush'd—
Where wave with wave encountering, o'er the wreck
Swell'd thy broad surge, and veil'd it from the view.

On reading the above, we are tempted to exclaim,
So chafest thou, in thy wild and wrathful mood,
Thou turbulent, unconquerable main!
Yet art thou but the creature of His will
Who spake thee into being—at whose voice
In gentle accents whispering—"Peace, be still,"—
Thy mountain billows sink, and all is calm.

Literature has its fashions, as well as other things, and we hear of different schools of poetry; the popular taste, or, perhaps more properly speaking, the popular prejudice, is ever fluctuating, and, consequently, several of those different schools, after having flourished out their day—had for a time their respective advocates and worshippers, have dwindled into merited insignificance. Just taste has triumphed over temporary caprice, and the good old standard works of the age of Queen Anne have resumed their pre-eminence. But a few names have since appeared, whose efforts, to use the language of Milton, "by certain vital signs" are "likely to live." Among these, Montgomery deservedly has a place, but in our opinion, a secondary one. Literary competition, however, is, we think, a fair subject for critical animadversion, and the admirers of the several candidates for fame, have an equal right to be heard in support of their respective favourites. These remarks are elicited by the appearance of another criticism on the "Pelican Island," &c. which we insert in the present number. It was found in the letter box, and we are totally ignorant who wrote it, but, being pleased with it, merely as a literary production, we thought ourselves bound to publish it. Both essays will be now before our readers, and they are left to form their own conclusions.

SAVONAROLE, THE ITALIAN REFORMER.

(Concluded.)

The career of Savonarole now hastened to its close. Throughout the city all who showed themselves attached to his cause, were exposed to the reproaches of the people, while the magistracy unhappily taking part with his enemies, and anxious to give proof of their hatred of the austere manners of the Reformer, and of the hypocrisy which they laid to his charge, did not hesitate to encourage those games and amusements and even the vices which he had so severely reprimanded. But among the enemies of Savonarole, none were more anxious for his destruction than the Pope, who felt that his own safety would be compromised by that of the courageous partizan. He rewarded the Florentines for his arrest, by restoring them to the bosom of the Church and by the grant of indulgences, and demanded with importunity that the prisoner should be delivered into his hands. It was however determined that the trial should take place at Florence, and Alexander sent thither two deputies to assist at the ceremony, at the same time anticipating their judgment by pronouncing the accused a heretic, a schismatic, and a seducer of the faithful. The tribunal before which the unhappy man was conducted, consisted entirely of his enemies, and their proceedings commenced, in the spirit of the age, with the application of torture. Of an enfeebled constitution and nervous temperament, Savonarole could not endure the torments to which he was subjected. To procure a cessation of his agony, he consented to make confessions, which as soon as he was relieved from torture he again retracted—declaring that he knew his own weakness, but that the truth was to be found only in the words which he uttered when pain or terror no longer suspended his control over himself. Thus was he submitted to repeated tortures, alternately confessing and retracting, and was finally condemned to the flames, without reading in his presence, as was the custom of the times, confessions which he would not have hesitated to disavow. During the month that Savonarole passed in prison, he employed himself in composing his commentary on the 51st psalm, which he had omitted when writing his exposition of the other psalms, observing that he would reserve that for the period of his own calamity. At length, on the 13th May, 1498, a new pile was erected on the site on which his disciples had hoped to have witnessed his triumph; and Savonarole and his two friends, one of whom was the faithful Dominick, after having been degraded from the sacerdotal office, were attached to the same stake. When the ecclesiastic who performed the ceremony of degradation declared that he separated him from the Church, Savonarole replied, "from the Militant Church;" thus intimating his faith that he was about to be united to the Church triumphant. He added nothing to these few but significant words, and the pile was fired by one of his enemies, who anticipated the office of the executioner. Thus perished in the midst of his two disciples, at the age of 45 years, Jerome Savonarole—a man of singular courage, and if his history may be relied upon, of singular purity of purpose. He may be designated emphatically, the Italian Reformer. It was the fate of Luther to be born among a people who reasoned—it was that of Savonarole to preach to a nation who felt. Luther naturally appealed to the judgment of his hearers as the faculty they most exercised. Savonarole's success depended upon the influence which he exerted over their imagination.—While Luther was led to combat corruption in doctrine, Savonarole attacked corruption in morals, and it may perhaps be remarked, that the results which the two reformers obtained, were such as were to be expected from the different classes of mind on which they acted. Luther's reform was enduring, because the judgments of his hearers were convinced; Savonarole's was transient, because the sensibilities of his audience only were moved. The German survived to see the system of religion which he had inculcated, flourish under the protection of enlightened minds and accurate habits of thinking—the Italian perished by the hands of those whose imaginations he had made the instrument of their conversion to good works, and whose excitability, acted upon by some more powerful influence, prompted them to deeds of violence against himself.

A secret assurance of worthiness, though it be never so well clothed in modesty, yet always lives in the worthiest minds.

We see many men among us, who hold themselves contented with the knowing of untruth, without seeking after the truth; and with mocking superstitions, without seeking the pure and true religion.

It many times falls out, that we deem ourselves deceived in others, because we first deceived ourselves.

All honest hearts feel that trust goes beyond advancement.

FOR THE FRIEND.

PALESTINE, NO. 3.

Three miles from Bethlehem, on the road to Jaffa, lies the celebrated Terebinthine vale, or valley of Elah, renowned for nineteen centuries as the field of the victory gained by the youthful David over the uncircumcised champion of the Philistines, who had "defied the armies of the living God." Nothing has ever occurred to alter the appearance of the country. The very brook whence David chose him five smooth stones, has been noticed by many a thirsty pilgrim journeying from Jaffa to Jerusalem, all of whom must pass it in their way.

The narrow Valley of Hinnom lies at the foot of Mount Zion, and is memorable for the inhuman and barbarous, as well as idolatrous worship here paid to Moloch; to which idol, parents sacrificed their smiling offspring, by making them pass through the fire. To drown the lamentable shrieks of the children thus immolated, inusical instruments (in Hebrew termed Toph) were played; whence the spot, where the victims were burnt, was called Tophet. From the same circumstance, Ge-Hinnom, (from which the Greek Gehenna is derived,) is sometimes used to denote hell, or hell-fire.

The country of Judea, being mountainous and rocky, is full of caverns, to which the inhabitants were accustomed to flee for shelter from the incursions of their enemies. Some of these appear to have been on low grounds, and liable to inundations when the rivers, swollen by torrents or dissolving snows, overflowed their banks, and carried all before them with resistless fury. To the sudden destruction thus produced, Isaiah probably alludes. (xxviii. 17.) Therefore to enter into the holes of the rocks, and into the caves of the earth, for fear of the Lord, was to the Jews a very proper image to express terror and consternation. The prophet Hosea has carried the same image further, and added great strength and spirit to it, which image, together with this of Isaiah, is adopted by the sublime author of the Revelation, (vi. 15, 16.)

The vast desert of Arabia, in which the children of Israel sojourned after their departure from Egypt, is in the sacred writings particularly called The Desert: very numerous are the allusions made to it, and to the divine protection and support which were extended to them during their migration. Moses, when recapitulating their various deliverances, terms this, a desert land and waste howling wilderness, and that great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents, scorpions, and drought, where there was no water. The most minute description of it is in Jeremiah ii. 6., a land of deserts and of pits, a land of drought, and of the shadow of death, a land that no man passed through, and where no man dwelt. These characteristics of the desert will account for the repeated murmurings of the Israelites, both for food and water. The extremity of their sufferings is thus concisely but most emphatically portrayed by the Psalmist, "Hungry and thirsty, their souls fainted in them."

Perhaps the most terrible scourge to which Palestine was subject, was the visitation of locusts. By the prophet Joel, they are termed the army of the Lord, from the military order which they appear to observe—disbanding themselves and encamping in the evening, and in the morning resuming their flight in the direction of the wind, unless they meet with food. They fly in the most countless hosts, occupying a space of two or three miles in length by a mile in breadth, so as to obscure the sun and bring a temporary darkness on the land. Wherever they settle, they darken the earth, climbing or creeping in perfect order. Regardless of every obstacle, they mount the walls of houses and cities, and enter the very apartments. They devour every green herb, and strip the bark off every tree, so as to render the land which before was as the garden of Eden, a desolate wilderness, as if it had been laid waste by fire. The noise made by them when committing their depredations, is compared to the crackling noise of fire among the dry stubble, or a mighty host set in battle array. So painful were the effects of their devastation that every one was filled with dismay, and vainly attempted to prevent them from settling on their grounds by making loud shouts (Jer. ii. 14.) as the Persian husbandmen, the inhabitants of Egypt, and the Nogai Tartars do to this day. On their departure from a country, they leave their fetid excrements behind them, which pollute the air, and myriads of their eggs deposited in the ground, whence issues in the following year a new and more numerous army. They are generally carried off by the wind into the sea, where they perish: and their dead bodies putrefying on the shore, emit a most offensive, and, it is said, sometimes even fatal smell. These predatory locusts are larger than those which sometimes visit the southern parts of Europe, being five or six inches in length, and as thick as a man's finger. From their heads being shaped like that of a horse, the prophet Joel says that they have the appearance of horses, and, on account of their celerity, they are compared to horsemen at full gallop, and to horses prepared for battle (Rev. ix. 7.) They are frequently pickled in vinegar, or toasted before the fire. The locusts which formed part of John the Baptist's food, were these insects, and not the fruits of the locust tree.

The devastations of these insects were frequently followed by absolute famine. M.

Elizabeth Payne, forty years of age, and having five children, died on Sunday week, at Bethnel Green, from taking tobacco water as a cure for worms. A quack doctor, named Gabriel Ore, recommended the "specific!" Verdict "manslaughter," and the doctor committed to Newgate.—London Paper.

THE ENGLISH CLASSIC, No. 1.

We commence with the present number of the Friend a series of selections under the above title, which we design to continue regularly. The periodical essays which have obtained the name of the British Classics, are a species of composition in which English literature stands unrivalled. They abound in happy sketches of character and manners, in lively satire, in humour and pathos; and in the more grave and valuable qualities of sound criticism, pure morality, and religious sentiment. They furnish some of the best models in the language on which to form the style of a youthful writer. As the fashions of one age are revived in another, their satire often portrays living manners with exquisite felicity, and in colours which we cannot hope to rival.

In making our selection for this series, we shall not restrict ourselves to the pages of these periodical essays, nor to grave treatises in prose. Our wish is, in the first place, to present to the readers of the Friend, good examples of classical English composition; and in the next to adapt the selection, as much as lies in our power, to the circumstances of the present times. It may sometimes happen that we can read a lecture to modish folly from the Spectator, the World, or the Mirror, which would seem out of place if delivered by so grave a personage as the Friend in his proper character.

At the hazard of being thought impertinent we shall occasionally submit our own criticisms and annotations; and shall take the liberty of making several authors contribute to a paper when we find them to have fallen upon the same subject, and to have viewed it each one in a peculiar light.

The essay which we have selected for the present number is a happy example of the inimitable pleasantry and familiar wisdom of Addison. It would be presumptuous to expect to fare better than the Spectator, yet we may be allowed to hope that there are no moles at work in the neighbourhood of the Friend.

THE SPECTATOR, No. 124, Monday, July 3, 1711.

BY ADDISON.

Μεγα βιβλίον, μέγα κακόν.

A great book is a great evil.

A man who publishes his works in a volume, has an infinite advantage over one who communicates his writings to the world in loose tracts and single pieces. We do not expect to meet with any thing in a bulky volume, till after some heavy preamble, and several words of course, to prepare the reader for what follows: nay, authors have established it as a kind of rule, that a man ought to be dull sometimes; as the most severe reader makes allowances for many rests and nodding places in a voluminous writer. This gave occasion to the famous Greek proverb which I have chosen for my motto, That a great book is a great evil.

On the contrary, those who publish their thoughts in distinct sheets, and as it were by piece-meal, have none of these advantages. We must immediately fall into our subject, and treat every part of it in a lively manner, or our papers are thrown by as dull and insipid: our matter must lie close together, and either be wholly new in itself, or in the turn it receives from our expressions. Were the books of our best authors thus to be retailed to the public, and every page submitted to the taste of forty or fifty thousand readers, I am afraid we should complain of many flat expressions, trivial observations, beaten topics, and common thoughts, which go off very well in the lump. At the same time, notwithstanding some papers may be made up of broken hints and irregular sketches, it is often expected that every sheet should be a kind of treatise, and make out in thought what it wants in bulk: that a point of humour should be worked up in all its parts; and a subject touched upon in its most essential articles, without the repetitions, tautologies, and enlargements that are indulged to longer labours. The ordinary writers of morality prescribe to their readers after the Galenic way; their medicines are made up in large quantities. An essay writer must practise in the chemical method, and give the virtue of a full draught in a few drops. Were all books reduced thus to their quintessence, many a bulky author would make his appearance in a penny paper; there would be scarce such a thing in nature as a folio: the works of an age would be contained on a few shelves; not to mention millions of volumes that would be utterly annihilated.

I cannot think that the difficulty of furnishing out separate papers of this nature has hindered authors from communicating their thoughts to the world after such a manner; though I must confess I am amazed that the press should be only made use of in this way by news writers, and the zealots of parties; as if it were not more advantageous to mankind, to be instructed in wisdom and virtue, than in politics: and to be made good fathers, husbands, and sons, than counsellors and statesmen. Had the philosophers and great men of antiquity, who took so much pains in order to instruct mankind and leave the world wiser and better than they found it; had they, I say, been possessed of the art of printing, there is no question but they would have made such an advantage of it, in dealing out their lectures to the public. Our common prints would be of great use were they thus calculated to diffuse good sense through the bulk of a people, to clear up their understandings, animate their minds with virtue, dissipate the sorrows of a heavy heart, or unbend the mind from its more severe employments with innocent amusements. When knowledge, instead of being bound up in books, and kept in libraries and retirements, is thus obtruded upon the public; when it is canvassed in every assembly, and exposed upon every table; I cannot forbear reflecting upon that passage in the Proverbs, "Wisdom crieth without, she uttereth her voice in the streets; she crieth in the chief place of concourse, in the openings of the gates. In the city she uttereth her words, saying, How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity? and the scorners delight in their scorning? and fools hate knowledge?"

The many letters which come to me from persons of the best sense in both sexes, (for I may pronounce their characters from their way of writing,) do not a little encourage me in the prosecution of this my undertaking: besides that, my bookseller tells me, the demand for these my papers increases daily.

I am not at all mortified, when sometimes I see my works thrown aside by men of no taste nor learning. There is a kind of heaviness and ignorance that hangs upon the minds of ordinary men, which is too thick for knowledge to break through. Their souls are not to be enlightened.

—Nox atra cava circumvolat umbra.

VINO. ÆN. 2. v. 360.

Dark night surrounds them with her hollow shade.

To these I must apply the fable of the mole, that after having consulted many oculists for the bettering of his sight, was at last provided with a good pair of spectacles; but upon his endeavouring to make use of them, his mother told him very prudently, "That spectacles, though they might help the eye of a man, could be of no use to a mole." It is not therefore for the benefit of moles that I publish these my daily essays.

But besides such as are moles through ignorance, there are others who are moles through envy. As it is said in the Latin proverb, "That one man is a wolf to another;" so, generally speaking, one author is a mole to another author. It is impossible for them to discover beauties in one another's works; they have eyes only for spots and blemishes: they can indeed see the light, as it is said of the animals which are their name-sakes, but the idea of it is painful to them; they immediately shut their eyes upon it, and withdraw themselves into a wilful obscurity. I have already caught two or three of these dark, undermining vermin, and intend to make a string of them, in order to hang them up in one of my papers, as an example to all such voluntary moles.

FOR THE FRIEND.

PROSE WORKS OF MILTON.

There is a noble self-respect—an ingenious consciousness of intellectual wealth and superiority, common perhaps to highly gifted minds, and by no means incompatible with a becoming sense of humility. Something like this is perceptible in the first part of the selection which we have made for the present number, where reference is made to his juvenile performances at school, and to his flattering reception among the literati of Italy, “whither,” says he, “I was favoured to resort;” and no one, familiar with the great epic by which the fame of Milton has been rendered at least commensurate in duration with the English language, and taking the passage in connexion with that which immediately follows, can fail to discover the germ—the crude conception—the incipient state—of that august poem, which, as he himself expresses it—

“Pleas’d me, long choosing, and beginning late.”

In the concluding paragraph, we have further evidence of the predominating religious feeling which pervades all his writings, and that he aspired to a higher and purer source of inspiration than to that of the famed Castalian fount—as witness the termination of his sublime apostrophe to light, Paradise Lost, B. III. where, after the most touching allusion to his loss of sight, he proceeds—

“So much the rather thou, celestial Light,
Shine inward, and the mind through all her powers
Irradiate; there plant eyes, all mist from thence Purge and disperse, that I may see and tell
Of things invisible to mortal sight.”

And again, in his invocation to the divine Urania, Book VII.

“The meaning, not the name, I call: for thou
Not of the muses nine, nor on the top
Of old Olympus dwelt’st, but, heav’nly born,
Before the hills appear’d, or fountain flow’d,
Thou with eternal Wisdom didst converse,
Wisdom thy sister, and with her didst play
In presence of th’ Almighty Father, pleas’d
With thy celestial song. Uplift by thee
Into the heav’n of heav’ns I have presum’d,
An earthly guest, and drawn empyreal air,
Thy temp’ring—”

“I should not choose this manner of writing, wherein knowing myself inferior to myself, led by the genial power of nature to another task, I have the use, as I may account, but of my left hand. And though I shall be foolish in saying more to this purpose, yet since it will be such a folly as wisest men go about to commit, having only confessed and so committed, I may trust with more reason, because with more folly, to have courteous pardon. For although a poet, soaring in the high region of his fancies, with his garland and singing robes about him, might, without apology, speak more of himself than I mean to do; yet for me sitting here below in the cool element of prose, a mortal thing among many readers of no empyreal conceit, to venture and divulge unusual things of myself, I shall petition to the gentler sort, it may not be envy to me.

“I must say, therefore, that after I had for my first years, by the ceaseless diligence and care of my father, whom God recompense! been exercised to the tongues, and some sciences, as my age would suffer, by sundry masters and teachers both at home and at the schools, it was found, that whether aught was imposed on me by them that had the overlooking, or betokened to of mine own choice in English, or other tongue, prosing or versing, but chiefly this latter, the style, by certain vital signs it had, was likely to live. But much later in the private academies of Italy, whither I was favoured to resort, perceiving that some trifles which I had in memory, composed at under twenty or thereabout, (for the manner is, that every one must give some proof of his wit and reading there,) met with acceptance above what was looked for; and other things, which I had shifted in scarcity of books and conveniences to patch up amongst them, were received with written encomiums, which the Italian is not forward to bestow on men of this side the Alps; I began thus far to assent both to them and divers of my friends here at home, and not less to an inward prompting which now grew daily upon me, that by labour and intent study, which I take to be my portion in this life, joined with the strong propensity of nature, I might perhaps leave something so written to after times, as they should not willingly let it die.

“These thoughts at once possessed me, and these other; that if I were certain to write as men buy leases, for three lives and downward, there ought no regard be sooner had than to God’s glory, by the honour and instruction of my country. For which cause, and not only for that I knew it would be hard to arrive at the second rank among the Latins, I applied myself to that resolution which Ariosto followed against the persuasions of Bembo, to fix all the industry and art I could unite to the adorning of my native tongue; not to make verbal curiosities the end, that were a toilsome vanity, but to be an interpreter and relater of the best and sagest things among mine own citizens throughout this island in the mother dialect, that what the greatest and choicest wits of Athens, Rome, or modern Italy, and those Hebrews of old did for their country, I, in my proportion, with this over and above, of being a Christian, might do for mine, not caring to be once named abroad, though perhaps I could attain to that, but content with these British islands as my world, whose fortune hath hitherto been, that if the Athenians, as some say, made their small deeds great and renowned by their eloquent writers, England hath had her noble achievements made small by the unskillful handling of monks and mechanics.

“Time serves not now, and perhaps I might seem too profuse to give any certain account of what the mind at home, in the spacious circuits of her musing, hath liberty to propose to herself, though of highest hope, and hardest attempting; whether that epic form whereof the two poems of Homer, and those other two of Virgil and Tasso, are a diffuse, and the book of Job a brief model; or whether the rules of Aristotle herein are strictly to be kept, or nature to be followed, which, in them that know art and use judgment, is no transgression, but an enriching of art; and lastly, what king or knight before the conquest, might be chosen in whom to lay the pattern of a Christian hero. And as Tasso gave to a prince of Italy his choice, whether he would command him to write of Godfrey’s expedition against the infidels, or Belisarius against the Goths, or Charlemain against the Lombards; if to the instinct of nature and the emboldening of art aught may be trusted, and that there be nothing adverse in our climate, or the fate of this age, it haply would be no rashness from an equal diligence and inclination, to present the like offer in our own ancient stories; or whether those dramatic constitutions, wherein Sophocles and Euripides reign, shall be found more doctrinal and exemplary to a nation. The Scripture also affords us a divine pastoral drama in the song of Solomon, consisting of two persons, and a double chorus, as Origen rightly judges. And the Apocalypse of St. John is the majestic image of a high and stately tragedy, shutting up and intermingling her solemn scenes and acts with a sevenfold chorus of hallelujahs and harping symphonies; and this my opinion the grave authority of Pareus, commenting that book, is sufficient to confirm. Or if occasion shall lead, to imitate those magnificent odes and hymns wherein Pindarus and Callimachus are in most things worthy, some others in their frame judicious, in their matter most an end faulty. But those frequent songs throughout the law and prophets beyond all these, not in their divine argument alone, but in the very critical art of composition, may be easily made, appear over all the kinds of lyric poesy, to be incomparable.

“These abilities, wheresoever they be found, are the inspired gift of God rarely bestowed, but yet to some, though most abuse, in every nation; and are of power, beside the office of a pulpit, to inbreed and cherish in a great people the seeds of virtue, and public civility, to allay the perturbations of the mind, and set the affections in right tune; to celebrate in glorious and lofty hymns the throne and equipage of God’s almightiness, and what he works, and what he suffers to be wrought with high providence in his church; to sing victorious agonies of martyrs and saints, the deeds and triumphs of just and pious nations, doing valiantly through faith against the enemies of Christ; to deplore the general relapses of kingdoms and states from justice and God’s true worship; lastly, whatever in religion is holy and sublime, in virtue amiable or grave, whatsoever hath passion or admiration in all the changes of that which is called fortune from without, or the wily subtleties and refluxes of man’s thoughts from within; all these things with a solid and treatable smoothness to paint out and describe, teaching over the whole book of sanctity and virtue, through all the instances of example, with such delight to those especially of soft and delicious temper, who will not so much as look upon truth herself, unless they see her elegantly dressed, that whereas the paths of honesty and good life appear now rugged and difficult, though they be indeed easy and pleasant, they will then appear to all men both easy and pleasant, though they were rugged and difficult indeed. And what a benefit this would be to our youth and gentry, may be soon guessed by what we know of the corruption and bane, which they suck in daily from the writings and interludes of libidinous and ignorant poetasters, who, having scarce ever heard of that which is the main consistence of a true poem, the choice of such persons as they ought to introduce, and what is moral and decent to each one, do for the most part lay up vicious principles in sweet pills to be swallowed down, and make the taste of virtuous documents harsh and sour.

“But because the spirit of man cannot demean itself lively in this body, without some recreating intermission of labour and serious things, it were happy for the commonwealth, if our magistrates, as in those famous governments of old, would take into their care, not only the deciding of our contentious law cases and brawls, but the managing of our public sports and festival pastimes, that they might be, not such as were authorized a while since, the provocations of drunkenness and lust, but such as may civilize, adorn, and make discreet our minds by the learned and affable meeting of frequent academies, and the procurement of wise and artful recitations, sweetened with eloquent and graceful enticements to the love and practice of justice, temperance, and fortitude, instructing and bettering the nation at all opportunities, that the call of wisdom and virtue may be heard every where, as Solomon saith: ‘She crieth without, she uttereth her voice in the streets, in the top of high places, in the chief concourse, and in the openings of the gates.’

“The thing which I had to say, and those intentions which have lived within me ever since I could conceive myself any thing worth to my country, I return to crave excuse that urgent reason hath plucked from me, by an abortive and foredated discovery. And the accomplishment of them lies not but in a power above man’s promise; but that none hath by more studious ways endeavoured, and with more unwearied spirit that none shall, that I dare almost aver of myself, as far as life and free leisure will extend. Neither do I think it shame to covenant with any knowing reader, that for some few years yet I may go on trust with him toward the payment of what I am now indebted, as being a work not to be raised from the heat of youth, or the vapours of wine, like that which flows at waste from the pen of some vulgar amorist, or the trencher fury of a rhyming parasite, nor to be obtained by the invocation of dame Memory and her siren daughters, but by devout prayer to that eternal Spirit, who can enrich with all utterance and knowledge, and sends out his seraphim, with the hallowed fire of his altar, to touch and purify the lips of whom he pleases. To this must be added industrious and select reading, steady observation, insight into all seemingly and generous arts and affairs; till which in some measure be compassed, at mine own peril and cost, I refuse not to sustain this expectation from as many as are not loth to hazard so much credulity upon the best pledges that I can give them."

ORIGINAL POETRY.

It will readily occur to our readers, that the following lines are founded on a short article in our seventh number, with the same title. At the time of its insertion, we thought it might well admit of poetical embellishment, and it must be admitted that our fair correspondent has very happily succeeded in the attempt.

THE ALPINE HORN.

When varying hues of parting day
O'er evening's portals faintly play,
The Alpine horn calls far away,
Praised be the Lord.

And every hill and rock around
(As though they loved the grateful sound)
Send back, 'mid solitudes profound,
Praised be the Lord.

Just Heaven! has man so thankless grown,
He brings no anthems to thy throne,
When voiceless things have found a tone
To praise the Lord?

Ah, no! for see, the shepherds come,
Though hardly heard, the "welcome home"
From toil of day—they quickly come
To worship God.

The look that taught their hearts to bow,
And childhood's laugh and sunny brow,
All, all by them forgotten now
In praise to God.

Kneeling—the warry vault beneath,
With spirits free as air they breathe,
O pure should be their votive wreath
Of praise to God.

How lovely such a scene must be,
When prayer and praise ascend to Thee,
In one glad voice of melody,
Eternal Lord!

All space thy temple—and the air
A viewless messenger to bear
Creation's universal prayer
On wings to Heaven.

Oh! that for me, some Alpine horn
(Both closing eve and wak'ning morn)
Would sound, and bid my bosom scorn
The world's vain joys:

Its treasured idols all resign,
That when life's cheating hues decline,
The one undying thought be mine,
To praise the Lord.

MARIAN.

The Camelopard.—A curious circumstance recently happened, with reference to the Camelopard of the museum at Paris. Some Egyptians going to see it in the dress of their country, the animal gave evident signs of joy, and loaded them with caresses. This fact is explained by the lively affection which the Camelopard entertains for the Arab to whose care it is entrusted.—Edin. Phil. Jour.

FOR THE FRIEND. NEGRO SLAVERY.

The remarks which follow, are taken from the ninth number of that excellent journal, "The African Observer." They place the influence of the price of slaves upon emancipation in a strong light, and prove decisively that whatever renders the negro more valuable to his master, diminishes the hope that the slave-holder will combine in any effort to rid the country of slavery.

The remarks are extracted from a discourse delivered in the Franklin Institute of Pennsylvania, by Professor Jones, "on the advantages of employing the labour of slaves in manufactures." Apart from the soundness or unsoundness of Dr. Jones's views as a political economist, it appears to me that there is an incongruity between the subject of the discourse and the place in which it was delivered, that is offensive as well to sound morals as to good taste.

That an argument should have been delivered in the city of Penn. in a hall bearing the name of the first president of the Abolition Society of Pennsylvania, upon the best method of rendering the slave more valuable to his master, and thereby perpetuating slavery in our land, seems almost like a contradiction in terms.

The question as to the pecuniary advantage of introducing manufactures in the southern states, can only be determined by experiment; for the elements which enter into the calculation of the problem are so numerous, and so difficult to estimate, that the most sagacious economist would find himself embarrassed in the attempt. There is but one thing certain about it; and that is, that the only argument by which the proposition is supported, and the only benefit to be derived from the scheme, lie in the increased value of the slave. If it should succeed, the strongest obstacle to emancipation will be strengthened, and the chains of slavery may be riveted for ages to come.

So strong is the disapprobation which I have felt on this occasion, that I am not willing to conceal it. I think that it was entirely beside the business of a lecturer in a scientific association of Philadelphia, to deliver such a discourse in the hall of the Franklin Institute. If the southern capitalists choose to venture upon the trial, let them do so. But let it not be said that the strongest recommendations of the plan came from Philadelphia. Consistently with the genius of our institutions, the fair fame of our ancestors, and our own unaffected and rooted dislike of slavery, it becomes us to take neither part nor lot in any scheme which may increase the difficulties of emancipation. We may be assured, that so long as the people of the south derive wealth from the labour of their slaves, they will be loth to sacrifice its indulgences to avoid remote dangers. We find accordingly, that it is only in those parts where the negroes are becoming a burden, and where almost the only profitable management of a stock, is one at which generous minds revolt, that a real interest is taken in the emancipation of the blacks, the substitution of free labourers, and the deliverance of the whites from the thraldom, in which, by a just retribution of Providence, a servile population must always hold its masters. †††

Upon "An Address on the Progress of Manufactures and Internal Improvements in the United States, and particularly on the advantages to be derived from the employment of Slaves in the manufacturing of Cotton and other goods. Delivered in the Hall of the Franklin Institute, November 6, 1827, by Thomas P. Jones, M. D."

In calling the attention of my readers to this address, I am far from desiring to intimate an opinion, which the author expressly deprecates, that he is an advocate of slavery, or willing to promote any measures which are calculated to perpetuate that harsh institution. It would be with the greatest reluctance that I should adopt such an opinion, and certainly could not justify to myself, the attempt to stamp such a stigma upon so respectable a character. I must, however, be allowed to suppose, that the tendency of the doctrines contained in some parts of the address, and those not the least prominent, is unfavourable to the cause of emancipation. The establishment, for which he so earnestly pleads, and which, he asserts, the philanthropist and political economist must hail with equal pleasure, appears to me, if carried into effect, likely to rivet more firmly the fetters of slavery. The author has, indeed, advanced an opinion, that the formation of extensive manufactories, in which the operatives are slaves, or at least negroes, will improve the condition of the slaves, and pave the way to their ultimate emancipation. The manner in which these effects are to be produced, is not clearly stated; we have, therefore, ample room to suppose that a contrary result may arise.

We are told, that, for a considerable period, the planters, in many places, have found it extremely difficult to pay their current expenses, and to feed and clothe their negroes, from the annual produce of their lands; and thousands have removed to the more fertile regions in the western states, not with a view of accumulating wealth, but merely for the purpose of obtaining a ready and abundant supply for their negro families; thousands more of our southern fellow citizens will be compelled to adopt the same expedient, unless some new resource be obtained. This is, in effect, an acknowledgment that the exhausted soil no longer supports the expenses of slave cultivation; or, in other words, that the labour of the slaves will no longer support their masters and themselves, and that the slave-holding system requires, for its support, some new source, or a richer soil. This, to the philanthropist, affords a pleasing, rather than a painful prospect. Not that the masters should be embarrassed, but that the value of the slaves should be small. The subject of regret is, that the new and fertile soils of the west should be subjected to the same depleting regimen, and slavery find an asylum in which to maintain a sombre existence for ages to come. Disinterested benevolence is lovely in theory, and not less so in practice, where it can be found; but the experience of mankind, I fear, will warrant the conclusion, that motives of interest point the course, and stimulate the exertions of a majority of our race. The Author of our existence has diffused into the nature of things, a principle, by which moral evils tend to exhaust their own supplies. This principle is the vis medicatrix of nature. In regard to slavery, it is particularly important. Slave cultivation, by exhausting the soil, diminishes the profits of labour, and thence the value of slaves. When the labour of the slave will no longer afford a surplus beyond the expense of rearing and supporting him, the temptation to retain him in that unnatural state is removed, and his emancipation becomes a natural result. If this state of things can be avoided only by emigration, attachment to the land of their birth, and aversion to encountering the hardships attendant on the formation of a new settlement, will unquestionably prevent many from resorting to that expedient. Hence, under such circumstances, emancipations will be more frequent than where slave labour is profitable. In most of the British colonies, official returns have been made within a few years, of the slave population, the number of manumissions, and the average value of slaves. And the number of manumissions appears, as might be expected, generally, if not always, greatest, where the price of slaves is least. Thus, in Barbadoes and Demerara, where the slave population is nearly the same, and the legal obstructions very similar, the number of manumissions effected in a given time, is nearly in an inverse ratio to the price of slaves. In the former, where the average value of a slave was £28, the number of manumissions was 408. In the latter, where a slave was worth £86, the manumissions amounted to 142. In Berbice, where the slaves appear to have been worth about £90 each, we find 49 manumissions out of a population of 22,000; but in the Bahamas, where the average value of a slave was £21 8s., the manumissions, for the same time, are stated at 176, out of a population of 9,500 slaves, or a ratio, on equal numbers, of more than 8 to 1. If, when by exhaustion of the soil, the value of slaves employed in the labours of the field has been nearly annihilated, the introduction of manufactory should furnish new and profitable employment for this class of labourers, the necessary consequence would be, that their value must rise, and the temptation to augment their numbers, by importations or otherwise, must increase. Hence, instead of a disposition on the part of the masters to prepare them for freedom, and to promote their emancipation, they would cling more closely to what they would consider their valuable property, and frown upon every attempt which might be made to enlighten the minds of this servile class. For it is generally well understood, that knowledge in a slave, beyond what is requisite for the performance of his allotted service, is dangerous to his master.

The Doctor appears to suppose that when the condition of the master is prosperous, the comforts of the slave must be increased. This, however, is not necessarily the case. When the slave is employed in the production of commodities intended for exportation, the exactions of the master will increase, as the value of the exports advances. With the improvement of the foreign market, the attention must be directed from cultivation for home consumption, and the support of slaves be rendered more dependent on foreign supplies. This is illustrated by the case of the Bahamas compared with Jamaica, Demerara, and Berbice. In the first, where the soil is too much exhausted for the production of sugar, the slaves are generally well fed, and their numbers increase; in the others, where the staple productions are designed for exportation, the poor slaves are gradually wasting away from excess of toil, or deficiency of food.

FOR THE FRIEND.

JUSTIN MARTYR.

Amidst the apathy which so generally prevails respecting the support of sound religious principles, it would be well to recur to the cruel persecutions which the early Christians endured. The firmness with which they advocated the doctrines of the New Testament, in the face of their fiercest enemies, ought to rouse the lukewarm professor, who, rather than risk his popularity, or sacrifice a little temporal ease, shrinks from an open avowal of those sacred truths, for which they encountered death, before they would abandon, or conceal them in the hour of danger. Absorbed in worldly pursuits, many seem to overlook the cause of religion and the salvation of their immortal souls. Scarcely can they spare a few hours for serious reflection and the public acknowledgment of their duty and gratitude to an almighty Protector, whilst hundreds of the primitive believers, of whom the world was not worthy, passed months and years immured in dreary cells for their testimony to the name and cause of the Lord Jesus. Liberty of conscience has been the purchase of their blood, accompanied by every species of torture which the ingenuity of man could invent. We read their sufferings, and approve and applaud their constancy. We pride ourselves upon the freedom of sentiment which that constancy has procured; but where are the fruits of the privileges we enjoy? Are we redeemed from all undue attachments to earthly enjoyments, and with hearts fixed on heaven, engaged to confess before men, that we are the true followers of a despised yet omnipotent Saviour? Is our love to a gracious Benefactor manifested by our humility, by obedience to his law, by the purity of our lives, and by the fervour and sincerity of our devotions? We may hold the same religious principles which they did, but if our lives bear testimony that we are unchanged in heart, the infidel and the profligate will glory in the renunciation of a religion, which, from our example, may appear to effect nothing more for its professors than for its avowed enemies.

The subjoined extract is taken from Cox's Narrative of the Lives of the Fathers, and furnishes an instance of zeal and devotedness in the cause of Christianity worthy of our emulation.

"Justin, surnamed the Martyr, was a native of Neapolis, a noted city in Samaria, anciently called Sychem. He was born about the sixth year of Trajan's reign, and about the year of our Lord 103. He appears to have been the first writer, after those who are termed apostolical, that was eminent in the church of Christ. At a very early period, he was instructed by suitable masters in the rudiments of gentle philosophy. After our young philosopher had made considerable progress in various branches of literature, he travelled into foreign parts for the improvement of his mind in knowledge, making observations upon every thing that appeared worthy of notice, and contracting acquaintance with the most celebrated scholars of the day. At length he came to Alexandria, a city at that time of no small renown in the literary world; and visited the cells, where the celebrated seventy translators performed their great and elaborate work. Interested with the various objects around him, Justin determined to take up his residence in this seat of learning, and proceeded to investigate, in succession, the different systems of philosophy which were then maintained. He soon, however, discovered, that none could give him satisfactory information respecting the Deity, which was the chief object of his researches; though the Platonic system, which was the last he studied, appeared to him the most specious and attractive. During this period, as he himself afterwards mentioned, he was convinced, from the courage and constancy of the persecuted Christians, that they were not a profligate and debauched people; and that consequently the horrid charges brought against them were radically false. Still, however, he was bewildered amidst the intricate mazes of philosophy. He felt, indeed, a supreme reverence for the as yet 'unknown God;' and his inquiry was, 'O that I knew where I might find him! that I might come even to his seat.'

"He first applied to the Stoics, hoping that they were in possession of genuine philosophy; but finding that his master was not only unable to give him any information respecting the nature of God, but even professed to regard such knowledge as unimportant, he left him, and repaired for instruction to one of the Peripatetics. The sordid spirit, however, which this man manifested, in settling the price of his tuition, led Justin to conclude, that truth could not dwell with him. A Pythagorean next attracted his attention, who, requiring of him a previous knowledge of music, astronomy, and geometry, dismissed him for the present, as he was unfurnished with these preparatory qualifications. At length he applied to a Platonic philosopher, was much struck with his intellectual notions, and resolved, according to the practice of that school, to give himself up to solitude and contemplation. Adhering to these resolutions, Justin seemed likely to be established in the doctrines of his new master, when an unforeseen occurrence took place, which led to his conversion to Christianity. Whilst walking alone, on a certain day, by the sea-side, he met an aged person, of a most venerable appearance. They regarded each other with mutual attention, and soon entered into conversation. One question led to another, till at length Justin referred to the pleasure he took in private meditation; and on the stranger's hinting at the absurdity of expecting satisfaction in his soul from merely abstract reasoning, he declared that his earnest desire was to arrive at the knowledge of God, and then proceeded to expatiate on the praises of philosophy. The venerable stranger took the occasion to show, that he attached too much importance to the sentiments of Plato and Pythagoras, and at length recommended him to read the writings of the Old Testament prophets, as more ancient, and infinitely wiser, than all the works of heathen philosophers. He then unfolded to him some of the evidences and leading doctrines of Christianity, and concluded his discourse with this truly important advice—'Above all things, pray that the gates of light may be opened to you, for these things cannot be discerned or understood by any man, except God and his Christ impart to him the knowledge of them.' The words of this venerable man made a deep and abiding impression on the mind of Justin. 'A divine flame,' he remarks, 'was immediately kindled in my soul, and I felt a sincere affection for those prophets and excellent persons who were the friends of Christ.' From this period he carefully read the Scriptures, felt an increasing interest in their important contents, and in due time experienced that genuine consolation which Christianity alone can confer on the troubled mind. To use Justin's own expressions, he 'found Christianity to have a formidable majesty in its nature, admirably adapted to terrify those who are in the way of transgression, as well as a sweetness, peace, and serenity, for those who are acquainted with it.'

"The secession of the philosophical Justin from the cause of paganism, excited no little astonishment and indignation in the minds of his late literary associates. But he was not to be shaken from his principles either by their reproaches or threatenings. After the deliberate exercise of his judgment, he had cordially embraced the religion of a despised Master, and was now prepared to sacrifice every worldly consideration, or even lay down his life in its defence. His first employment was to compose his 'Exhortation to the Greeks or Gentiles,' in which he ably vindicates his conduct in embracing Christianity, and contrasts the absurdity and falsehood of their religion, with the truth and excellency of the one which he had now embraced. In the early part of the reign of Antoninus Pius, and about six years after his own conversion to Christianity, Justin visited Rome. During his residence in this celebrated city, he wrote his book against heresies, in which he especially opposed the blasphemous errors of Marcion. About the year 150, Justin wrote his first Apology for the Christians, in refutation of the dreadful calumnies which were currently reported against them. Scurrilous reports, when once currently circulated, are with difficulty suppressed. 'The malice of bad men, and the credulity of weak men, are alike instrumental in preserving them in existence. By these glaring misrepresentations, the rage of the heathens was for a time inflamed to the utmost against the Christian name, and a handle was afforded for the most barbarous treatment of the best of men. Time, however, at length detected the falsehood of these accusations; and all who made any pretensions to candour, became, at last, ashamed of affecting to believe a charge which was equally devoid of probability and destitute of evidence.'

"In his Dialogue with Trypho, Justin illustrates the wonderful increase of the Christians, under dreadful persecutions, by the following beautiful and appropriate simile. 'We are slain with the sword, we are crucified, we are cast to the wild beasts, we are bound with chains, tortured and burned, and yet we depart not from our profession; the more we are persecuted, the more believing worshippers are added to our numbers. As a vine, by being pruned, and cut close, puts forth new shoots, and bears a greater abundance of fruit; so is it with us, who are the vine which God and his Christ have planted."

"Justin Martyr suffered death about A. D. 167, during the persecutions under Aurelius. In his examination, with several others, before Junius Rusticus, prefect of Rome, he acknowledged the Christians and their doctrines. 'What is their doctrine?' inquired Rusticus. 'It is this,' rejoined the martyr. 'We believe in the one only God to be the Creator of all things, visible and invisible; and we confess our Lord Jesus Christ to be the son of God, foretold by the ancient prophets. He is now the Saviour and Teacher of all those who humbly submit to his instructions—and he will hereafter be the Judge of mankind. As for myself, I am too mean to say any thing becoming his infinite Deity. This was the employment of the prophets, who, many ages ago, foretold the coming of the Son of God into the world.' Being threatened with torture, unless they sacrificed to the gods, 'There is nothing we more sincerely desire,' exclaimed Justin, 'than to endure tortures for the sake of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to be saved. For this will promote our happiness, and give us confidence before the awful tribunal of our Lord and Saviour, before which God hath appointed the whole world to appear.'"

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH, 29, 1827.

The Epistle from our brethren at their late Yearly Meeting in North Carolina has, at length, come to hand, and is inserted in our present number. We hope it will obtain a serious and attentive perusal from all our readers. In the progress of the unhappy dissension which for some time past has agitated the once peaceful Society of Friends, the seceding party have clearly manifested that they have swerved from the ancient principles of our worthy predecessors, and adopted opinions relative to some of the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion, incompatible with our religious profession, and at variance with the Holy Scriptures. Under these circumstances, it has become the imperative duty of the religious Society of Friends to express their disunity with the new doctrines attempted to be introduced amongst their members; and to re-assert their ancient and steadfast testimony to the proper divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, his propitiatory sacrifice on the cross for the sins of the world, as well as his various offices in the great work of man's salvation; and also in the authenticity and divine authority of the Holy Scriptures.

The Yearly Meeting of Friends in Indiana, set a worthy example in the fulfilment of this Christian duty; North Carolina has followed; and we sincerely desire that other Yearly Meetings may "do likewise." The holy apostle exhorted his fellow believers in Christ Jesus, "earnestly to contend for the faith once delivered unto the saints;" and we believe the same causes which rendered it necessary in that day, exist at the present period.

The followers of Elias Hicks boast much of their numbers, and affect to despise and scorn the concern and labours of Friends, for the support of their doctrines and discipline.—They practically adopt the swelling words of a Jewish antagonist of old, "What do these feeble Jews? Will they fortify themselves? Will they sacrifice? Will they make an end in a day? Will they revive the stones out of the heaps of the rubbish, which are burned?" We earnestly desire that Friends everywhere, may be enabled through Divine assistance, to meet these taunts in the meek and gentle spirit of our holy Redeemer; that they may not suffer the weakness of human nature to draw them from the path of duty; but relying on the all-sufficiency of his holy aid, in all their movements, they may experience him to be "a spirit of judgment to those who sit in judgment, and strength to them who turn the battle to the gate."

The acclamations of the multitude are not always an evidence of the justice or righteousness of the course in which they have engaged. While we are fully convinced that the separating party vastly overrate their numbers, and that the Society of Friends are by no means the little handful which some would represent them; we desire to remind all our brethren, and especially those who meet together in small companies, for the purpose of religious worship; that our blessed Lord and Saviour emphatically styled his believing and tribulated disciples, "a little flock"—they were few in number, and weak and despised, when compared with the enemies by which they were surrounded. And the company of Christ's companions may still be called "a little flock"—but if these "hold fast the profession of their faith without wavering, bearing his cross and despising the shame;" however the world may deride them, they will finally be found among the number of those, "to whom it is the Father's good pleasure to give the kingdom," being made "more than conquerors through him that hath loved them, and given himself for them."

Anxious to elude the force and weight of these testimonies, the followers of Elias Hicks, industriously circulate the idea, that the one from Indiana was issued by a few persons only, while the majority was opposed to it. This is entirely incorrect—the expression in the meeting, with but very few exceptions, was decidedly in favour of the measure—and as regards the one from North Carolina, it was unanimously adopted. These documents are of the highest importance as official declarations from the religious Society of Friends, testifying that they do not hold or approve the sentiments of Elias Hicks—and drawing a clear line of distinction between him and his followers, and the Society of Friends.

In the present Epistle, it appears to have been thought unnecessary to quote much of the language of Elias Hicks. Enough however is given to show what the doctrines are which the meeting testifies against. Those who wish to see them more fully developed, may refer to pages 22, 29, 38, and 51, of the Friend, and to an Essay signed Luther in the present number.

An Epistle from the Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at New Garden, Guilford County, North Carolina, by adjournment, from the 5th of the 11th month, to the 9th of the same, inclusive, 1827.

To the Quarterly, Monthly, and Preparative Meetings, within the Limits, and to all its Members.

Dear Friends—This meeting having been brought under a lively concern for the preservation of the members of our religious Society in the unchangeable truth as it is in Jesus, has been deeply impressed with the importance of our adhering to the faith once delivered to the saints, and which we find so conspicuously set forth in the writings of our early friends: under a precious covering of gospel love, we earnestly desire to caution our dear friends of every class, against reading any of those pernicious books which have of late been so industriously circulated in various sections of the country, and which are calculated to spread the desolating principles of infidelity among us. The views of our early friends with regard to the Holy Scriptures, are beautifully stated by Robert Barclay in his 3d proposition,* namely, "In this respect above mentioned, then, we have shown what service and use the Holy Scriptures, as managed in and by the Spirit, are of to the church of God; wherefore we do account them a secondary rule. Moreover, because they are commonly acknowledged by all to have been written by the dictates of the holy Spirit, and that the errors which may be supposed by the injury of time to have slipped in, are not such but that there is a sufficient clear testimony left to all the essentials of the Christian faith, we do look upon them as the only fit outward judge of controversies among Christians, and that whatever doctrine is contrary unto their testimony, may therefore justly be rejected as false. And for our parts, we are very willing that all our doctrines and practices be tried by them, which we never refused, nor ever shall, in all controversies with our adversaries, as the judge and test. We shall also be very willing to admit it as a positive certain maxim, that whatsoever any do, pretending to the Spirit, which is contrary to the Scriptures, be accounted and reckoned a delusion of the devil."

And we are engaged at this time to bring also into view, as being in accordance with the principles of our Society to the present day, the following extract from a declaration of the Christian faith and doctrines of the Society of Friends by our worthy predecessor George Fox, namely: "Whereas many scandalous lies and slanders have been cast upon us, to render us odious; as that 'We deny God, Christ

* New-York ed. p. 85.

Jesus, and the Scriptures of truth," &c. This is to inform you, that all our books and declarations, which for these many years have been published to the world, clearly testify to the contrary. Yet for your satisfaction we now plainly and sincerely declare "that we own and believe in the only wise, omnipotent, and everlasting God, the creator of all things in heaven and earth, and the preserver of all that he hath made; who is God over all, blessed for ever; to whom be all honour, glory, dominion, praise and thanksgiving, both now and for evermore! And we own and believe in Jesus Christ, his beloved and only begotten son, in whom he is well pleased, who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary, in whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins, who is the express image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature, by whom were all things created that are in heaven and in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, dominions, principalities, or powers; all things were created by him." "And we own and believe that he was made a sacrifice for sin, who knew no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth; that he was crucified for us in the flesh, without the gates of Jerusalem; and that he was buried, and rose again the third day by the power of his Father, for our justification; and that he ascended up into heaven, and now sitteth at the right hand of God. This Jesus, who was the foundation of the holy prophets and apostles, is our foundation; and we believe there is no other foundation to be laid but that which is laid, even Christ Jesus; who tasted death for every man, shed his blood for all men, is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world: according as John the Baptist testified of him when he said, "Behold the lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world." John i. 29. "We believe that he alone is our Redeemer and Saviour, the captain of our salvation, who saves us from sin, as well as from hell and the wrath to come, and destroys the devil and his works; he is the seed of the woman that bruises the serpent's head, to wit: Christ Jesus, the Alpha and Omega, the first and the last. He is, as the scriptures of truth say of him, our wisdom, righteousness, justification and redemption; neither is there salvation in any other, for there is no other name under heaven given among men, whereby we may be saved. He alone is the shepherd and bishop of our souls: he is our prophet, whom Moses long time since testified of, saying, "A Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things, whatsoever he shall say unto you: and it shall come to pass, that every soul that will not hear that Prophet shall be destroyed from among the people." Acts ii. 22, 23. "He is now come in spirit, and hath given us an understanding, that we know him that is true." He rules in our hearts by his law of love and life, and makes us free from the law of sin and death. We have no life, but by him; for he is the quickening spirit, the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, by whose blood we are cleansed, and our consciences sprinkled from dead works, to serve the living God. He is our mediator, who makes peace and reconciliation between God offended and us offending; he being the path of God, the new covenant of light, life, grace and peace, the author and finisher of our faith. This Lord Jesus Christ, the heavenly man, the Emanuel, God with us, we all own and believe in; he whom the high priest raged against, and said he had spoken blasphemy; whom the priests and elders of the Jews took counsel together against and put to death; the same whom Judas betrayed for thirty pieces of silver, which the priests gave him as a reward for his treason; who also gave large money to the soldiers to broach a horrible lie, namely: "That his disciples came and stole him away by night whilst they slept." After he was risen from the dead, the history of the Acts of the Apostles sets forth how the chief priests and elders persecuted the disciples of this Jesus, for preaching Christ and his resurrection. This, we say is that Lord Jesus Christ, whom we own to be our life and salvation.

"Concerning the holy scriptures, we believe they were given forth by the holy Spirit of God, through the holy men of God, who, as the scripture itself declares, 2 Pet. i. 21. "spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." We believe they are to be read, believed, and fulfilled; he that fulfils them is Christ; and they are "profitable for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works," 2 Tim. iii. 19. and are able to "make wise unto salvation, through faith in Christ Jesus."

In the pernicious books above alluded to, are sentiments wholly opposed to what we have here quoted from Barclay and Fox. In a volume of sermons attributed to Elias Hicks, we find the following expressions, (see page 50.) "We must never look for the way, without us. I am the way, the truth, and the life, Jesus declared, when he was outwardly present, as a teacher and Messiah to Israel. They did not look any higher. He was their director, their Saviour. He it was that saved them from their outward sicknesses. He was only an outward Saviour, that healed their outward diseases, and gave them strength of body to enjoy that outward good land. This was a figure of the great Comforter, which he would pray the Father to send them; an inward one, that would heal all the diseases of their souls, and cleanse them from all their inward pollutions, that thing of God, that thing of eternal life. It was the soul that wanted salvation, but this no outward Saviour could do, no external Saviour could have any hand in it." And again, in another sermon,

"If we believe that God is equal and righteous in all his ways, that he has made of one blood all the families that dwell upon the earth, it is impossible that he should be partial: and therefore he has been as willing to reveal his will to every creature as he was to our first parents, to Moses and the Prophets, to Jesus Christ and his apostles. He never can set any of these above us, because if he did he would be partial." (Phil. Sermons, page 202.) And in a letter bearing the signature of the same individual, and addressed to Dr. N. Shoemaker, are these words, speaking of the offering upon Calvary's mount, "Surely, is it possible, that any rational being that has any right sense of justice or mercy, would be willing to accept forgiveness of his sins on such terms!!! Would he not rather go forward, and offer himself wholly up to suffer all the penalties due to his crimes, rather than the innocent should suffer. Nay—was he so hardy as to acknowledge a willingness to be saved through such a medium, would it not prove that he stood in direct opposition to every principle of justice, and honesty, of mercy and love, and show himself to be a poor selfish creature, and unworthy of notice!!!" (E. H.'s letter to Shoemaker.)

Here is a plain denial of the divinity of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, of his propitiatory sacrifice for sin, contrary to scripture testimony, and to the well known principles and discipline of our religious society, as it may be seen by the following passage from our book of discipline. "If any in membership with us shall blaspheme, or speak profanely of Almighty God, Christ Jesus, or the Holy Spirit, or deny the divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the immediate revelation of the Holy Spirit, or the authenticity of the scriptures, as it is manifest, that they are not one in faith with us, the monthly meeting to which they belong, having extended due care for the benefit of such individuals without effect, should disown them." (See book of Discipline, pages 11 and 12.) And we believe it especially needful in the present day, that we should attend to the exhortation of the apostle John, "Beloved—believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God, because many false prophets are gone out into the world, hereby know ye the spirit of God, every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God—and every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God, and this is that spirit of Anti-Christ, whereof ye have heard that it should come, and even now already is in the world. Also, be ye therefore followers of God as dear children, and walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God, for a sweet smelling savour."

And, dear friends, the language is verified in the present day, "by their fruits ye shall know them;" for, it cannot be concealed, that facts do exist, which prove the awful and separating tendency of these principles of infidelity which have been privily brought in, and have latterly spread, by their effects upon many individuals, distress and desolation, even to producing a departure from the good order and discipline of Friends, by the establishment of separate meetings within the limits of a yearly meeting on this continent, against which, as well as against the principles which have led to these things, we believe it our duty to bear our testimony, and to warn all our members against any connexion with them.

Finally, we would revive a passage in our discipline, as calculated to impress and instruct all our members, viz. We tenderly advise and exhort all parents and heads of families to advise and instruct their children and families in the doctrines and precepts of the Christian religion, as contained in the scriptures; and that they excite them to the diligent reading of those excellent books." (See Book of Discipline, page 27.) And, it is our earnest desire, that it may please the Shepherd of Israel to grant unto us the blessing of preservation, that we may increasingly experience the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

FOR THE FRIEND.

"Doctrines held by one part of society, and which we believe to be sound and edifying, are pronounced by the other part to be unsound and spurious. From this has resulted a state of things that has proved destructive of peace and tranquillity," &c.—Green-street Address of the 4th month last.

The quotations from the writings of our primitive friends, and those from the Sermons of Elias Hicks, given in my last number, present a contrast so striking, that I apprehend every dispassionate reader will be convinced that the views of Friends and those of the preacher, in regard to the holy scriptures, are entirely incompatible. It follows, therefore, that the light which he follows, must be something entirely different from the holy Spirit which guided them, inasmuch as this is ever unchangeably the same, and cannot contradict itself.

In the present essay I propose to make some extracts from the sermons, illustrating the views of Elias Hicks respecting our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ and his offices.

In the Philadelphia sermons he says—"Who was his father? He was begotten of God. We cannot suppose that it was the outward body of flesh and blood that was begotten of God; but a birth of the spiritual life in the soul. We must apply it internally and spiritually. For nothing can be a Son of God, but that which is spirit—and nothing but the soul of man is a recipient for the light and spirit of God. Therefore, nothing can be a Son of God, but that which is immortal and invisible—Nothing visible can be a Son of God." P. 10. This sentence is a plain and positive denial of the narrative of the Evangelists Matthew and Luke, relative to the miraculous conception and birth of our blessed Lord.

Speaking of the gift of divine grace, he declares, "Then it was not his [Jesus Christ's] grace, but the grace God communicated to him, as it was communicated to the rest of Abraham's children, to every one in a sufficient degree to enable them to come up to the law and commandments given them." P. 253. This assertion places our holy Redeemer on a perfect equality with every rational soul, and directly contradicts the Bible, which says, that, "of His fulness, have all we received," and "grace and truth came by Jesus Christ."

"Now, as I observed, when Jesus went into the last ritual, which was John's watery baptism, he received an additional power. And he certainly must have needed it; for we cannot conclude, that God ever communicated any thing superfluous to man, or any other creature." This amounts to a denial of those portions of holy scripture which declare that "God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto Him," "for in Him dwelleth all fulness of the Godhead bodily."

"Here now we find, that having an additional power, he had also additional trials to encounter—he was now brought to see his wilderness state—he was brought to see the trials and temptations that awaited him, arising from the propensities of his human nature, for he stood in need of all things in the same manner as we do, to eat, to drink, and to seek knowledge."

On the passage where the evangelist says our Lord was led by the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil, Elias Hicks remarks: "Now, let us pause a little, and consider what is here meant. Can it be supposed that he was driven into an outward wilderness? Or, shall we not suppose, that he was brought, by the power of Divine light, to see the wilderness state in his own mind?" As the figure of "a wilderness" is used to convey the idea of an impure, unregenerated, and desolate state of mind, these expressions of Elias Hicks's amount to an assertion, that our blessed Lord was in this deplorable condition, they are directly at variance with the concurrent testimony of the inspired writers, who invariably represent him as inherently pure and perfect—"holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners."

Speaking of the "natural desires" of men, he declares—"He (Jesus Christ) had all these desires. The desire after knowledge, and the things of the world, presented itself to his animal part, and thus it is said to have driven him into the wilderness." "Here the tempter led him up to aspire after the glory of the world." Now, it is obvious, that if our Lord so far yielded to "the tempter" as "to be led by him to aspire after the glory of this world," he must have sinned. It was not a mere temptation to do wrong, but a giving way to the temptation—obeying the tempter, and worshipping him, and it will follow that Christ sinned. All this is directly contrary to the testimony of our Lord himself, "the prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me," and to that of the apostles, who declared, concerning their crucified Saviour, that "he knew no sin"—"was tempted as we are, yet without sin"—"who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth"—"he was manifested to take away our sins, and in him is no sin."

"We read," says Elias Hicks, "that he was taken up, and set upon the pinnacle of the temple. And do you suppose, there was some power which actually took him up, and set him upon a pinnacle? No, I hope there are none so ignorant!" (That is to say, he hopes there are none so ignorant as to believe the testimony of those "holy men, who spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost"—none so ignorant as to credit the Bible!) "It was a temptation to exalt him for his righteousness—his goodness. And have not you, many of you been set upon this pinnacle of high honour? Have you not a little religious pride?" These expressions convey a direct charge of spiritual pride, and self-exaltation against our blessed Lord. Elias Hicks makes the temptation of Jesus Christ to exalt himself for his righteousness, his goodness, to have been so powerful, and his compliance with it so great, that it elated him to a height of religious pride, compared to a pinnacle of the temple. In this, he contradicts our Lord's declaration, "I am meek and lowly in heart."

"He was tempted in all points as we are. Now, how could he be tempted, if he had been fixed in a state of perfection, in which he could not turn aside?" The object of this sentence is to prove, that Christ could fall away—that he was a frail, peaceable man, who, in common with the rest of the species, might sin, and finally be lost. Hence, it is evident, he could not be our Saviour, because he must himself have needed a Saviour. Again, Elias Hicks says, "We must never look for the way, without us. I am the way, the truth, and the life, Jesus declared when he was outwardly present, as a teacher and Messiah to Israel. They did not look any higher. He was their director, their Saviour. He it was that saved them from their outward sicknesses. He was only an outward Saviour; that healed their outward diseases, and gave them strength of body, to enjoy that outward good land. This was a figure of the great Comforter, which he would pray the Father to send them—an inward one, that would heal all the diseases of their souls, and cleanse them from all their inward pollutions—that thing of God—that thing of eternal life. It was the soul that wanted salvation, but this no outward, no external Saviour could have any hand in it."

Here is a positive denial that Jesus is the Christ. He declares unconditionally, that our Lord was only an outward Saviour, to heal outward diseases of the body—that he was a mere figure of the inward Saviour of the soul—and that he could have no hand in the salvation of the soul. These presumptuous and irreverent assertions, are contrary to the whole tenor of the scriptures of truth; they evince a degree of arrogance and hardihood, which, we apprehend, can only be the result of long continued unbelief.

The angelic host announced to the shepherds the birth of Jesus of Nazareth, the babe of Bethlehem, in these words: "Fear not, for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people, for unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." The angel which appeared to Joseph told him, "thou shalt call his name Jesus (which is a Saviour) for he shall save his people from their sins." Our Lord says of himself, "The Son of man is come to save that which was lost."—"I came not to judge the world, but to save the world." The Pharisees of old appear to have entertained opinions concerning our blessed Saviour, very similar to those of Elias Hicks—for when in the exercise of his divine prerogative, he addressed the paralytic man with the language "Son, thy sins are forgiven thee," they exclaimed, "Who is this which speaketh blasphemies? Who can forgive sins but God alone?" But when Jesus perceived their thoughts, he again asserted his pardoning power, and confirmed his declaration by a signal miracle; "that ye may know that the Son of man hath power upon earth to forgive sins, I say unto thee, arise, take up thy couch, and go into thine house."

PALESTINE, No. 4.

In the east anciently, as well as in modern times, there were no inns in which the traveller could meet with refreshment. Shade from the sun, and protection from the plunderers of the night, are all the caravanseras afford. Hence, hospitality was deemed a sacred duty incumbent on every one. The sacred writings exhibit several instances of hospitality exercised by the patriarchs, and the writings of modern travellers show that similar hospitality still exists in the east. Abraham received three angels, invited them, served them himself, and stood in their presence. Sarah, his wife, took care of the kitchen, and baked bread for his guests. Lot waited at the city gate to receive guests. When the inhabitants of Sodom meant to insult his guests, he went out, he spoke to them, he exposed himself to their fury for the protection of his guests. The same is observable in the old man of Gibeah, who had received the young Levite and his wife. St. Paul uses Abraham's and Lot's example to encourage the faithful to hospitality, saying, that they who have practised it, have merited the honour of receiving angels under the form of men. The primitive Christians made one principle part of their duty to consist in the exercise of this virtue. Our Saviour tells his apostles, that whoever received them, received him himself; and that whosoever should give them even a glass of water, should not lose his reward. At the day of judgment he will say to the wicked, "depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire: I was a stranger, and ye received me not—inasmuch as ye have not done it unto the least of these, ye have not done it unto me." St. Peter requires the faithful to use hospitality to their brethren, without murmuring and complaint. St. Paul, in several of his epistles, recommends hospitality; but he recommends it particularly to bishops. The primitive Christians were so ready in the discharge of this duty, that the very heathens admired them for it. They were hospitable to all strangers, but especially to those of the same faith and communion. Believers scarcely ever travelled without letters of communion, which testified the purity of their faith; and this procured them a hospitable reception wherever the name of Jesus Christ was known. Calmet is of opinion that the two last epistles of St. John, may be such kind of letters of communion and commendation, as were given to Christians who travelled.

Instances of hospitality among the early Greeks abound in the writings of Homer, whose delineations of manners and customs reflect so much light on the Old Testament, especially on the Pentateuch; and that ancient hospitality, which the Greeks considered as so sacred and inviolable, is still partially preserved. When the traveller makes a second tour through the country, he can hardly do any thing more offensive to the person by whom he was entertained in his first journey, than by not again having recourse to the kindness of his former host.

Travelling, in the greater part of Greece, seems to have been, anciently at least, as difficult as it is at the present day: and that circumstance gave rise to the laws of hospitality. This reciprocal hospitality became hereditary in families; and the friendship which was thus contracted, was not less binding than the ties of affinity. Those, between whom a regard had been thus cemented, by the intercourse of hospitality, were provided with some particular mark, which, being handed down from father to son, established a friendship and alliance between the families for several generations. This mark was the Sumbolon Zenikon of the Greeks, and the Tessera Hospitalis of the Latins. The former was sometimes probably of lead, which, being cut in halves, one half was kept by the host, and the other by the person whom he had entertained. On future occasions, they, or their descendants, by whom the symbol was recognised, gave or received hospitality on comparing the two tallies. The ancient Romans divided a Tessera lengthwise, into two equal parts, as signs of hospitality, upon each of which one of the parties wrote his name, and interchanged it with the other. The production of this when they travelled, gave a mutual claim to the contracting parties and their descendants, for reception and kind treatment at each other's houses, as occasion offered. These Tesserae were sometimes of stone, shaped in the form of an oblong square; and to them some critics have supposed that an allusion is intended in Rev. ii. 17., where it is said, "To him that overcometh will I give a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth, saving he that receiveth it." In this passage, the venerable translators of one authorized version, by rendering it a white stone, seem to have confounded it with the small globular stone which was commonly used for balloting, and on some other occasions. The original words do not specify either the matter or the form, but only the use of it. By this allusion, therefore, the promise made to the church at Pergamos, seems to be to this purpose: that the faithful among them should hereafter be acknowledged by Christ, and received into a state of favour and perpetual friendship.

FOR THE FRIEND.

THE CONVERTED JEW.

The following affecting narrative has appeared in some of the periodical journals both in this country and in England, and has excited so much interest and sympathy with the individual who forms the principal subject of it, as to induce considerable inquiry as to its correctness.

One of our friends has been at some pains to trace out the story, and we are assured that the result of his researches has been entirely satisfactory. After receiving various accounts, all of which tended to confirm the truth of the narrative, a clue was at length obtained, which led him to the person through whose means it was first published. The character of this gentleman is highly respectable, and he has politely furnished such data as place the reality of the facts, and the accuracy of the statement, beyond doubt.

Travelling lately through the western part of Virginia, I was much interested in hearing an aged and highly respectable clergyman give the following account of a Jew, with whom he had recently become acquainted.

He was preaching to a large and interesting audience, when his attention was arrested by seeing a man enter the house, the lineaments of whose countenance had every appearance of a Jew. The stranger was well dressed—his countenance was noble, though its expression seemed to indicate that his heart had lately been the habitation of deep sorrow. He took his seat, and was absorbed in attention to the sermon, while tears often stole unconsciously down his cheek. After the service was over, the clergyman was too much interested in the stranger to refrain from speaking to him. Fixing his eye steadily upon him, he said, "Sir, am I not correct in supposing that I am addressing one of the children of Abraham?" "You are," was the reply. "But how is it that I meet a Jew in a Christian assembly?" The substance of his narrative was as follows:—He was a very respectable man, of superior education, and handsome fortune; who with his books, his riches, and an only child, a daughter, in her seventeenth year, had found a beautiful retreat on the fertile banks of the Ohio. He had buried the companion of his bosom before he left Europe, and he now knew little pleasure except in the society of his beloved child. She was indeed worthy of a parent's love. Her person was beautiful; but her cultivated mind, and her amiable disposition, threw around her a charm superior to any of the tinselled decorations of the body. No pains had been spared in her education. She could read and speak with fluency several different languages; and her proficiency in other departments of literature was proportionate, while the ease and gracefulness of her manners captivated all who beheld her. No wonder then, that a tender father, whose head was now sprinkled with gray hairs, should place his whole affection on this only child of his love; especially as he knew of no source of happiness beyond this world. Being himself a strict Jew, he educated her in the strictest principles of his religion, and he thought he had presented that religion with an ornament.

It was but a little while ago that this beloved daughter was taken ill:—the rose faded from her cheek; her eye lost its fire—her strength decayed; and, it soon became apparent, that an incurable and fatal disease was preying upon her constitution. The father hung over the bed of his child with a heart fraught with the keenest anguish. He often attempted to converse with her, but could seldom speak, except by the language of tears. He spared no trouble or expense in procuring medical assistance; but no human skill could avert or arrest the arrow of death.

He had retired into a small grove not far from his house, where he was pensively walking, wetting his steps with tears, when he was sent for by his dying daughter. He immediately obeyed the summons, and, with a heavy heart, entered the door of her chamber; soon, alas! he feared, to be the chamber of death. The parting hour was at hand, when he was to take a last farewell of his endeared child; and his religious views gave him but a feeble hope of meeting her hereafter. She clasped the hand of her parent in her own, now cold with the approach of death, and summoning all the energy with her expiring strength would admit of, she thus addressed him:—"My father, do you love me?" "My child, you know that I love you—that you are now more dear to me, than all the world beside!" "But, father, do you love me?" "Oh, why, my child, will you give me pain so exquisite? Have I then never given you any proofs of my love?" "But, my dearest father, do you love me?" The afflicted father was unable to make any reply, and the daughter continued. "I know, my dear father, you have ever loved me—you have been the kindest of parents, and I tenderly love you—will you grant me one request? O, my father, it is the dying request of your daughter! will you grant it?" "My dearest child, ask what you will—though it take every cent of my property; whatever it may be, it shall be granted—I will grant it." "My dear father, I beg you never again to speak against Jesus of Nazareth!" The father was dumb with astonishment. "I know," continued the dying girl, "I know but little about this Jesus, for I was never taught; but I know that He is a Saviour—for he has manifested himself to me since I have been sick, even for the salvation of my soul. I believe that he will save me, although I never before loved him. I feel that I am going to him—that I shall ever be with him. And now, my father, do not deny me—I beg that you will never again speak against this Jesus of Nazareth! I entreat you to obtain a Testament, which tells of him; and I pray that you may know him; and, when I am no more, that you may bestow on him the love that was formerly mine."

The exertion overcame the weakness of her enfeebled frame. She stopped, and her father's heart was too full even for tears. He left the room in great horror of mind, and before he could compose himself, the spirit of his accomplished daughter had taken its flight; I trust into the bosom of that blessed Saviour, whom, though she scarcely knew, yet she loved and honoured. The first thing the parent did, after committing to the earth his last earthly joy, was to procure a New Testament. This he read diligently and devoutly; and taught by the Holy Spirit from above, is now numbered among the meek and humble followers of the once despised Jesus.

FOR THE FRIEND.

The following melancholy instance of religious persecution and cruelty, is related in the Seventh Report of the London Society for the Improvement of Prison Discipline, &c. It is difficult for the mind to realize that an act, worthy of the darkest age of bigotry, should have been perpetrated in the twenty-sixth year of the nineteenth century.

"An instance of the infliction of torture in Westphalia, has recently been made known to the committee. This occurred at Minden. The object of vengeance was not a capital offender, but a person who from conscientious motives, peculiar to the religious body of which he was a member, had refused to serve in the militia. He was placed in a cell, the floor and sides of which were closely studded with projecting spikes, or pieces of sharpened iron, resembling the blades of knives. The individual remained in this state for twenty-four hours, and the punishment was repeated at three distinct intervals. It is considered a rare occurrence for a person to survive the second infliction of this species of cruelty. In this instance, however, the sufferer did not fall a sacrifice. His property was confiscated, but has since been restored, in consequence of the representations which have been made from this country to the proper authorities."

STRIKING EXAMPLE OF THE PATHETIC.

The following pathetic speech is well authenticated. Gayashuta has long since slept with his fathers; but we believe Cornplanter, at an advanced age, remains to witness the once powerful Seneca nation, reduced in numbers, corrupted by association with civilized people, and to use their own figurative style, "wandering toward the setting sun, without a place of their own to spread their blankets."

The sons of Onas were moved by the appeal of the ancient chief, and the aid he sought was promptly afforded. We owe a large debt of gratitude to the remaining descendants of the aboriginal inhabitants, for the kindness with which they uniformly treated our ancestors at the settlement of Pennsylvania. Let us embrace every opportunity for paying what is due to the poor Indian; not only as the mere measure of justice, but with munificent hearts.

To the sons of Onas,* the speech of Gayashuta of the Seneca Nation, as given in charge by him to the Cornplanter, to be by him delivered to the sons of his old beloved brother Onas.

Brothers! the sons of my beloved brother Onas! When I was young and strong, our country was full of game, which the Good Spirit sent for us to live upon. The lands which belonged to us, extended far beyond where we hunted; I and the people of my nation had enough to eat, and always something to give to our friends when they entered our cabins; and we rejoiced when they received it from us. Hunting was then not tiresome; it was diversion, it was a pleasure.

Brothers! when your fathers asked land from my nation we gave it to them, for we had more than enough. Gayashuta was among the first of the people to say, "give land to our brother Onas, for he wants it," and he had always been a friend to Onas and to his children.

Brothers! your fathers saw Gayashuta when he was young; when he had not even thought of old age or of weakness; but you now are too far off to see him, now he has grown old. He is very old and feeble, and he wonders at his own shadow, it is grown so little. He has no children to take care of him, and the game is driven away by the white people, so that his younger friends must hunt all the day long to find game for themselves to eat—they have nothing left for Gayashuta! And it is not Gayashuta only who has become old and feeble; there yet remain about thirty men of your old friends, who, unable to provide for themselves or to help one another, are become poor, and are hungry and naked.

* The Indians having no word expressive of Penn in their language, called William Penn Onas, which signifies a quill.

Brothers! Gayashuta sends you a belt which he received long ago from your fathers, and a writing which he received but as yesterday from one of you. By these you will remember him and the old friends of your fathers in his nation.

Brothers! look on this belt and this writing, and if you remember the old friends of your fathers, consider their former friendship, and their present distress; and if the Good Spirit shall put it into your hearts to comfort them in their old age, do not disregard his counsel. We are men, and can therefore only tell you, that we are old, and feeble, and hungry, and naked; and that we have no other friends but you, the children of our beloved Onas.

Science useful as an auxiliary, but not essential to Religion.—Science, considered in itself, is highly desirable; and great attainments in literature, when consecrated to the service of God, qualify their possessor for greater usefulness. Such acquirements, however, are not essential to religion. It can exist, it can flourish without them. Witness the many pious persons in all ages, who, whilst in a high degree, "taught of God," have been but little acquainted with human learning! Witness also the generality of ministers in the two first centuries; who, from peculiar circumstances, were unable to make any considerable proficiency in literature, yet preached the gospel in its native purity, and were made eminently instrumental in the conversion of souls. Plain unlettered men of God! They could tell, in an artless and affecting manner, the story of Him who bought us with his inestimable blood: with a holy earnestness, they could invite poor perishing sinners to Him for succour; and manifest daily a readiness to go to prison and to death for the name of the Lord Jesus! Cox's Narratives.

Longevity.—I have often thought, that there is much more of sickness and pain in the world, as well as other natural evils, than is essentially consequent on even the present fallen state of human nature. Many, through excess of action and passion, sap the foundation of their constitution, and either exist as useless members of society, or die before their time; while others, perhaps in less favourable circumstances, make the best of life by being temperate in all things, having the peace of God to rule their hearts, and regularity and order to guide all the actions of life. Such persons, especially if born with good constitutions, may be long healthy and vigorous; be rather gradually and imperceptibly worn out with continued action, than pulled down by disease, and thus have the privilege, for which every good man may piously wish, to lay down his body with his charge, and cease at once to work and live.—Dr. A. Clarke.

The Beaver.—The hunters say of this animal, that the young are educated by the old ones. It is well known that in constructing a dam, the first step the beaver takes is to cut down a tree that shall fall across the stream, intended to be dammed up. The hunters in the early part of our voyage informed me, that they had often found trees near the edge of a creek, in part cut through and abandoned, and always observed that those trees would not have fallen across the creek; and that by comparing the marks left by the teeth on those trees with others, they found them much smaller, and therefore concluded not only that they were made by young beavers, but that the old ones perceiving their error, had caused them to desist. They promised to show me proofs; and in our voyage I saw several, and in no instance would the trees, thus abandoned, have fallen across the creek.—Brabury's Travels.

Young men, whose mutual attachment is dignified by principle, investigate together the fair and honourable course: self-deceit is unveiled, false shame is combated, and self-esteem is cherished. Truths which elevate the soul, are canvassed and pondered. Generous affections flow and mingle—existence is felt to be a blessing.—Home on Education.

"To be good and disagreeable, is high treason against virtue."—E. Smith.

BY ADDISON.

Ut nemo in sese tentat descendere!—

PERS. Sat. 4. v. 23.

None, none descends into himself, to find
The secret imperfections of his mind. DRYDEN.

Hypocrisy at the fashionable end of the town is very different from hypocrisy in the city. The modish hypocrite endeavours to appear more vicious than he really is, the other kind of hypocrite more virtuous. The former is afraid of every thing that has the show of religion in it, and would be thought engaged in many criminal gallantries and amours, which he is not guilty of: the latter assumes a face of sanctity, and covers a multitude of vices under a seeming religious deportment.

But there is another kind of hypocrisy which differs from both these, and which I intend to make the subject of this paper: I mean that hypocrisy, by which a man does not only deceive the world, but very often imposes on himself; that hypocrisy which conceals his own heart from him, and makes him believe he is more virtuous than he really is, and either not attend to his vices, or mistake even his vices for virtues. It is this fatal hypocrisy and self-deceit which is taken notice of in these words, Who can understand his errors? Cleanse thou me from secret faults.

If the open professors of impiety deserve the utmost applications and endeavours of moral writers to recover them from vice and folly, how much more may those lay a claim to their care and compassion, who are walking in the paths of death, while they fancy themselves engaged in a course of virtue! I shall endeavour, therefore, to lay down some rules for the discovery of those vices that lurk in the secret corners of the soul, and to show my reader those methods by which he may arrive at a true and impartial knowledge of himself. The usual means prescribed for this purpose are, to examine ourselves by the rules which are laid down for our direction in sacred writ, and to compare our lives with the life of that Person who acted up to the perfection of human nature, and is the standing example, as well as the great guide and instructor of those who receive his doctrines. Though these two heads cannot be too much insisted upon, I shall but just mention them, since they have been handled by many great and eminent writers.

I would therefore propose the following methods to the consideration of such as would find out their secret faults, and make a true estimate of themselves.

In the first place, let them consider well what are the characters which they bear among their enemies. Our friends very often flatter us as much as our own hearts; they either do not see our faults, or conceal them from us, or soften them by their representations, after such a manner, that we think them too trivial to be taken notice of. An adversary, on the contrary, makes a stricter search into us, discovers every flaw and imperfection in our tempers: and though his malice may set them in too strong a light, it has generally some ground for what it advances. A friend exaggerates a man's virtues, an enemy inflames his crimes. A wise man should give a just attention to both of them, so far as they may tend to the improvement of the one, and the diminution of the other. Plutarch has written an essay on the benefits which a man may receive from his enemies; and, among the good fruits of enmity, mentions this in particular, that by the reproaches which it casts upon us, we see the worst side of ourselves, and open our eyes to several blemishes and defects in our lives and conversations; which we should not have observed without the help of such ill-natured monitors.

In order, likewise, to come at a true knowledge of ourselves, we should consider, on the other hand, how far we may deserve the praises and approbations which the world bestow upon us; whether the actions they celebrate proceed from laudable and worthy motives, and how far they are really possessed of the virtues which gain us applause among those with whom we converse. Such a reflection is absolutely necessary, if we consider how apt we are either to value or condemn ourselves by the opinions of others, and to sacrifice the report of our own hearts to the judgment of the world.

In the next place, that we may not deceive ourselves in a point of so much importance, we should not lay too great a stress on any supposed virtues we possess, that are of a doubtful nature; and such we may esteem all those in which multitudes of men dissent from us, who are as good and wise as ourselves. We should always act with great cautiousness and circumspection in points where it is not impossible that we may be deceived. Intemperate zeal, bigotry, and persecution, for any party or opinion, how praiseworthy soever they may appear to weak men of our own principles, produce infinite calamities among mankind, and are highly criminal in their own nature; and yet how many persons, eminent for piety, suffer such monstrous and absurd principles of action to take root in their minds under the colour of virtues? For my own part, I must own, I never yet knew any party so just and reasonable, that a man could follow it in its height and violence, and at the same time be innocent.

We should likewise be very apprehensive of those actions which proceed from natural constitution, favourite passions, particular education, or whatever promotes our worldly interest or advantage. In these, and the like cases, a man's judgment is easily perverted, and a wrong bias hung upon his mind. These are the inlets of prejudice, the unguarded avenues of the mind, by which a thousand errors and secret faults find admission, without being observed or taken notice of. A wise man will suspect those actions to which he is directed by something besides reason, and always apprehend some concealed evil in every resolution that is of a disputable nature, when it is conformable to his particular temper, his age, or way of life, or when it favours his pleasure or his profit.

There is nothing of a greater importance to us than thus diligently to sift our thoughts, and examine all these dark recesses of the mind, if we would establish our souls in such a solid and substantial virtue as will turn to account in that great day, when it must stand the test of infinite wisdom and justice.

I shall conclude this essay with observing, that the two kinds of hypocrisy I have here spoken of, namely, that of deceiving the world, and that of imposing on ourselves, are touched with wonderful beauty in the hundred thirty-ninth psalm. The folly of the first kind of hypocrisy is there set forth by reflections on God's omniscience and omnipresence, which are celebrated in as noble strains of poetry as any other I have ever met with, either sacred or profane. The other kind of hypocrisy whereby a man deceives himself, is intimated in the two last verses, where the psalmist addresses himself to the great Searcher of hearts in that emphatical petition: 'Try me, O God, and seek the ground of my heart: prove me, and examine my thoughts. Look well if there be any of wickedness in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.'

FOR THE FRIEND.

THE GOLD MINES OF NORTH CAROLINA.

From two interesting articles on this subject, in the nineteenth, and in the last number of Silliman's Journal, I have compiled the following sketch of these mines. They extend over a space of about one thousand square miles, in Cabarrus and the neighbouring counties; and are contained in a circle, having a radius of eighteen miles, the centre of which is the junction of the Uwharre and the Yadkin. The gold is found in the alluvial deposits, as well as in veins; and the greater part of that hitherto obtained, has been procured from the former mines, which are worked in the rudest manner.

The gold diggers mostly consist of the less wealthy farmers of the neighbouring country, who seize on spare time from their regular pursuits, to work at the mines. Each man goes to the mine armed with a few necessary tools, such as a mattock, a shovel, a bucket, and a rocker; also, a stock of provisions sufficient to last during his stay. They all encamp out of doors; often with no other shelter from the night air, than that formed by the boughs of trees. Each man or set of men, having marked off their lot of ground, commence digging a few inches, or even feet, until they reach the layer in which the precious metal is deposited, throwing aside all the top earth. The girt, as they call it, is then carefully taken up, and removed to the water side, where the rocker, a simple trough, worked like a cradle, is placed. The auriferous sand is thrown into it, mixed with water, and by repeated agitations, and additions of fresh water, the earthy part is at length nearly all washed away, and the fine gold picked out with the point of a knife. The gold is generally divided every evening at the mine, where the proprietor or his agent attends with his gold scales, makes the division, and receives his share. Instead of beginning at one end of the deposit, and carrying on the digging regularly, pits are sunk without any regard to method, and the top earth thrown in heaps, or into the old pits. When the deposit is very rich, but little pains is taken to wash it clean, and the consequence is, that more gold is sometimes found at the second or third, than at the first search. Notwithstanding this loose and unskilful manner of working the mines, a large amount of gold is extracted.

No mine is considered as worth working, at which the labourer cannot make his pennyweight per day, clear of the proprietor's share. Good hands think they are doing a bad business, unless they can clear ten or twelve pennyweights per week.

These facts show, that the mines of North Carolina are much richer than the alluvial mines of Brazil, where two shillings sterling is rather more than any hand can average.

The discovery of gold in veins, is but of recent date. The rocks in which it is found are granite, and what is termed by geologists, green stone. In the south western part of the gold region, the veins are found from two to four feet in thickness, and have been traced more than a mile in length, which renders it probable that they sink to a considerable depth. The ores with which it is mixed in these veins, are iron and copper pyrites. The gold of this formation is about 22½ carats fine, and alloyed with iron and copper.

The second formation of veins in which gold is found, is more extensive than the first, and occasionally contains richer deposits of gold; though, perhaps, less to be relied on for regular profits. They chiefly occur in the eastern and northern section of the gold region. These veins are seldom more than twelve or fifteen inches thick, and do not, it is supposed, sink so deep as the former. The gold, and other ores, found in these veins, are enclosed in quartz. All the large masses of gold that have been found, belong to the veins of this formation. The gold of these veins varies in its fineness from 19 to 23 carats fine.

A third formation of veins occurs, which is more widely dispersed than the two others, and in which the gold is blended with a greater variety of other metals. It is from the destruction and washing away of the veins of this formation, that the gold of the alluvial deposits has originated.

The gold mines of North Carolina, when worked with more skill and capital, will, probably, yield a large income to the proprietors of the land. We may be allowed to doubt whether they are of any substantial benefit to the state. The influence of mines of the precious metals, in creating gambling and idle habits in the labourers, has often been the subject of remark.

"About every mine of note," says the author, from whom this account is taken, "there are generally to be seen a number of lazy worthless fellows, who resort thither as the place where they can most easily support themselves. They labour only enough to get bread and whiskey, perhaps a few hours in the day, or a few days in the week, and the remainder of their time they idle away in lounging from camp to camp, and in hanging about the whiskey carts, or huckster wagons, of which there are always several on the ground, with cider, spirits, provisions, and other articles, to sell."

Well may the hardy mountaineers of the northern states exclaim, in reference to the contrast between their own wintry climate and stubborn soil, and the slave-darkened, but fertile golden regions of the South—

With gold and gems, let Chilian mountains flow;
Here, freedom fires the soul, and sparkles in the eyes.

There has never been wanting in this country, some possessor of the golden secret of finding out mines with the hazel twig—some genuine representative of Dousterswivel, who knew the art of extracting from the ore, whatever metal his patron chanced to fancy that he possessed.

The common pyrites, which has gained the expressive name of fool's gold, is the material with which these alchemists generally play. The writer of this has seen a piece of block tin, which was passed upon the people of Zanesville by one of these worthies, for pure silver, and who thus was enabled to support himself for several months, while expensive borings, to the depth of some hundred feet, were made for the true vein, in which it was to be found. Professor Olmstead relates, that a vein of copper pyrites in Cabarrus county, was supposed to be pure gold ore. A German mineralogist was said to have obtained platinum from it. The professor examined into the matter, and found that the supposed platinum melted easily, and burnt with a blue flame—in short, that it was antimony. This was still an interesting discovery; but how was it obtained? The ore, charcoal, and borax, were put in a crucible. Ipecacuanha was added, to make the ore "spew out" the metal. It was not strong enough, and a more powerful medicine was tried. Emetic tartar, in considerable quantity, was administered in the crucible, and wonderful to relate, the ore "vomited out" a goodly quantity of metal!!

Such are the tricks which impudent impostors are able to play upon ignorance and credulity.

FOR THE FRIEND.

SCRAPS,

Or a page from my Port Folio.

Doubtless, we are a great and glorious people—
Free—moral—wise—religious—and what not;
Enjoying heartily, with other comforts,
Opinions most respectful of—ourselves.

Yes, doubtless, we are great, and every hour
Becoming greater, like a vast mushroom.
Towns rise, as if by magic, in the forest,
And where, of late, a troop of tuneful wolves
Howled their wild wood notes to the midnight moon,
Caper the hopeful youth, and fiddles squeak.

Our virtuous and enlighten'd population
Rolls onward like a deluge, scattering wide,
With most commendable, unsparing zeal,
The tawny, two-legg'd, and inferior vermin,
To dens obscure and deserts far remote,
To trapper and to squatter yet unknown.

Yes, doubtless, we're a wise, a moral people.
Ask ye for proof? and can ye not perceive
The scent of whiskey float on every gale?
Others may boast their floods of milk and honey;
Ours may be called a whiskey streaming land.
As flows life's current through the human frame
In countless rills meandering, so does whiskey
Flow through our country, but a copious tide,
Resembling more a torrent than a rill;
Marking its troubled and tumultuous course,
By poverty and crime, disease and death.

We kill the nations off, to get the soil;
The soil produces grain; the grain the whiskey;
The whiskey ruin, both to soul and body;
And thus we travel the delightful round.
And modern Solomons, who rule the nation,
Wisely decline to tax the precious fluid,
Lest haply they might check the growth of grain,
And raise a frown upon—a voter's brow.

Yes, doubtless, we're a free, a Christian people,
Holding this truth to be self-evident,
That all men are by Heaven created equal,
Endowed alike with right to liberty.
Doubt ye the fact? and have ye ne'er beheld
Upon our public ways, a group of beings,
Aye, human beings, with immortal souls,
Driven to the market, like a flock to slaughter,
Chain'd, sold, lash'd, mangled, at the sound discretion
Of worthies, doubtless, of superior nature,
Because envelop'd in a paler skin:
The dearest ties the heart can know dis sever'd;
The parent parted from her infant treasure;
The fainting maiden from her lover torn,
And doom'd to toil and slavery for ever.

Yes, doubtless, we're a moral, Christian people.
God hath commanded, thou shalt do no murder;
He, at whose bidding all things rose from nothing,
And at whose frown, would sink again to nought.
And lo! forth crawls the important duelist.
An evanescent worm, a thing of dust,
And dares his wrath, and tramples on his law.
The curse of Cain is on him—his right hand
His soul encrimson'd with a brother's blood,
A friend—a boon companion—one with whom,
A few short hours before, he had united,
Perhaps in scenes of folly and of crime:
What then? he mingles with congenial Christians,
Calls himself one, no doubt, and stands prepar'd
To enact the self same Christian part again.

Will human laws deter him? human laws
Were surely not designed for men of honour;
A starving wretch, in the pursuit of plunder,
Commits a murder, and he shall be hang'd;
Not so your man of honour—he may kill,
Arrange deliberately his mode of murder,
Become an adept by industrious practice,
And boast of his expertness at the trade;
He shall go free—he is a man of honour;
And laws, and those who ought to guard them, sleep.
O yes, no doubt—we are a Christian people.

Thou hopest, after death, in heaven eternal bliss to find,
An instantaneous change, a blessing vague and un-defin'd,
But ah! reflect in time, and fear, for there is cause to fear
That they will little know of heaven, who do not find it here;

True happiness, a flower of Heaven, is not ordain'd to bloom,
In full luxuriant loveliness, on this side of the tomb;
But here on earth, and in thy heart, the seed must first be sown,
And here on earth, and in thy heart, the immortal birth be known,
'Tis water'd by repentant tears, and fann'd with humble prayers,
And heedless of the lapse of years, eternal beauty wears.

When from the asylum of the chosen few,
O'er the drown'd world the dove of Noah flew,
Far, far she wandered, but could only spy
A boundless ocean and a frowning sky;
On the wild waters sought for rest in vain,
And hasten'd, trembling, to the ark again:
Even so the soul, a spark of heavenly flame,
Allied to dust, in this material frame,
Yet form'd by love divine in heaven to share,
Through endless ages, the Creator's care,
In vain would fashion of the toys of earth,
Enjoyments worthy her celestial birth;
In vain attempt in aught below to find
A rest befitting an immortal mind,
And homeward turns, where, every conflict o'er,
She knows that trouble shall molest no more.

Ye travellers in the narrow way, let not your courage fail,
Though dangers gather round your path, and evil
tongues assail;
But as the pilot eyes the star that guides him o'er the wave,
So let your souls be staid on Him, who died and rose to save;
For he hath said, whom Heaven, and earth, and death, and hell obey,
That he will those who come to him in no wise cast away;
And there's a glorious home ahead, a home for ever blest,
Where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.

The sum of Religion, by Sir Matthew Hale, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench.

He that fears the Lord of heaven and earth;
walks humbly before him, thankfully lays hold of the message of redemption, by Christ Jesus; strives to express his thankfulness by the sincerity of his obedience; is sorry with all his soul when he comes short of his duty; walks watchfully in the denial of himself, and holds no confederacy with any lust or known sin; if he falls in the least measure, is restless till he hath made his peace by true repentance; is true to his promise, just in his actions, charitable to the poor, sincere in his devotions, that will not deliberately dishonour God, though with the greatest security of impunity; that hath his hope in Heaven, and his conversation in Heaven; that dares not do an unjust act, though never so much to his advantage, and all this because he sees him who is invisible, and fears him, because he loves him; fears him as well for his goodness as his greatness: such a man, whether he be an Episcopalian, or a Presbyterian, or an Independent, or an Anabaptist; whether he wears a surplice, or wears none; whether he hears organs, or hears none; whether he kneels at the communion, or for conscience' sake, stands or sits; he hath the life of religion in him, and that life acts in him, and will conform his soul to the image of his Saviour, and walk along with him to eternity, notwithstanding his practice or nonpractice of these indifferents."

If it were the business of man to make a religion for himself, the deist, the theophilanthropist, the stoic, or even the epicurean, might be approved: but this is not the case. We are to believe what God has taught us, and to do what he has commanded.
All other systems are but the reveries of mortals, and not religion.—Elizabeth Smith.

FRAGMENTS FOR THE FRIEND.

The number of persons charged with criminal offences in France, in the year 1826, was, according to the official records, 7591; in England and Wales, in the same year, 16,147. The population of France, in round numbers, is 31 millions: of England and Wales, 14 millions. In the same year, 1200 criminals were condemned to death in England, and 150 in France.

In France there are 15,000 deaf and dumb persons, of whom only 500 have been instructed. In Pennsylvania, the number of mutes is about 600, nearly one-third of whom have had the benefit of instruction at the Institution in Philadelphia. These facts show the importance of providing the means of education for this afflicted part of our fellow beings, before the number be so great, as to render it difficult, if not impracticable, to confer that blessing on all who are capable of being taught.

Goodhugh's Library Manuals says, "of about 1000 books published annually in Great Britain, 600 are accompanied with commercial loss; on 200 there is no gain; on 100 the gain is trifling; and only on 100 any considerable profit. Six hundred and fifty are forgotten within the year; another hundred in 2 years; another 150 in 3 years; not more than 50 survive 7 years, and scarcely ten are thought of after 20 years. Of the 50,000 books published in the seventh century, not more than fifty are now in estimation; and of the 80,000 books published in the 18th century, not more than 300 are considered worth reprinting, and not more than 500 are sought after at the present time. Since the first commencement of writing, that is, in 32 centuries only, about 500 works of writers of all nations have sustained themselves against the devouring influence of time."

A French paper relates, that "At Neustrelitz, Prussia, Counsellor Hesse, in order to prove an apparatus for preventing injury to persons who may be buried alive, had himself buried two feet under ground, in a close coffin, to which two tin tubes were attached, one for breathing, and another for communicating with his assistants by means of a bell. He remained two hours in this situation, and was disinterred in good health, except that he was very hot. The thermometer, which stood at twelve (Reamur) outside, rose to nineteen in the coffin." [On the utility, or otherwise, of the apparatus in question, or the propriety of the experiment, we are not prepared to give an opinion, but it may not be improper to remark, that too much care cannot be exercised in respect to interments, lest they be prematurely made.]

They must be somewhat out of this world, who would be deep in the concerns of the next.—Centaur not Fabulous.

FOR THE FRIEND.

A NEAR OBSERVER, No. 3.

"Presumptuous man! the reason wouldst thou find, Why form'd so weak, so little, and so blind? First, if thou canst, the harder reason guess, Why form'd no weaker, blinder, and no less?"

When a Boyle and a Newton, treading with cautious steps the paths of science, were unfolding the system of nature by the safe inductions of experimental philosophy; their accurate and unclouded faculties enabled them to discover the line, which must, for ever, give limits to the rational powers of man, and separate his finite mind from the infinite mind of the great Creator of all things. They found an ample field of acceptable knowledge in the works of creation, and they knew, that it is from appearances only, that our inferences can be drawn, and that the manner in which the Almighty influences all things, is hidden from our view.*

Their conviction of the truth of the Christian religion, was the consequence of careful and accurate inquiry: they received, with gratitude, the light and knowledge which it revealed; and knowing, that neither genius nor learning could, of themselves, form even a conception of heavenly things, they carefully avoided all attempts to withdraw the veil which shrouds the majesty of heaven; and considered it as presumptuous, as it is vain, to form even conjectures on this awful subject; because it is a necessary consequence of this revelation, that all which is essential to our salvation, must have been imparted.

This is true Christian philosophy, which, in every step of its progress, discovers additional proof of the mighty power of the Creator, and the comparative nothingness of man: that a true acquaintance with God, is not a speculative knowledge, built on abstract reasonings, concerning his nature and essence; and that it can only be acquired by a compliance with his revealed will; and that even were we more fully instructed in the great scheme of the divine economy, however gratifying it might be to our curiosity, it could be no farther useful than as it instructs us in our duty; and that duty we already know, with a clearness sufficient for the great purpose of our lives.

This frame of mind is of the very nature and essence of a Quaker's faith; and yet, there has arisen in that society, a spirit of restless curiosity, and presumptuous confidence, which has unsettled the minds of many individuals, and which however it may be unintended, is making rapid inroads on the Christian religion, and will, I fear, lead many into the cheerless regions of infidelity.

Hence, we find many lofty pretenders to rational religion, who boast that their faith is limited to the bounds of analogous reasoning,* and who declare that they cannot believe what they do not understand;† and yet, who, (if believed,) know so much more than ourselves. If their knowledge of nature and religion is, indeed, so great, that, with all the curtailment which their maxims must necessarily occasion, they are so far superior to other men, their intellectual resources must be truly unbounded.

But men of observation will not be imposed on by such shallow pretensions; they see, that these persons, although so scrupulous about assenting to what they do not understand, are among the foremost in believing they understand things of which they are completely ignorant. And when we attempt to test their doctrines by their own standard, we find them completely ignorant of their own rules.

Such men cannot say with Socrates, when declared by the oracle to be the wisest man in Greece, "If it is true, it is because that I am not wise, and know it; while others are not wise, and know it not."

It is a truth confirmed by all history, that in all the dissensions and divisions in Christian communities, the priesthood are found to be either mediately or immediately the cause; and, in most, they are the principal actors; and though some of them may, in the pride of their hearts, exclaim, that "God makes ministers," we have sorrowful proof that they are not less fallible than other men.

Every Christian society owes its origin to zealous individuals, who, impressed with the importance of their religion, and having undoubting confidence in their own faith, unite for the purpose of strengthening each other in well doing; and such is the excellence of our holy religion, the purity of its moral precepts, and plainness of its instruction, in relation to its essential tenets; that so long as we retain an unshaken belief in the authority and divine origin of the sacred writings, and our confidence in the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith remains unimpaired, such associations will be productive of the most beneficial effects, however the ingenuity of man may be exerted in giving novel interpretations to particular passages in the scriptures, and however we may differ on speculative points of doctrine.

These sentiments will, we know, be regarded by the high-flyers among you, with pity or contempt: they will consider them as the grovelling ideas of a darker age: of those, who, content to tread the path their fathers trod before them, are shutting their eyes to the flood of light which now surrounds them, and are seeking instruction from those sources, which, however useful to man when in the A B C of religion,§ are rejected as food for babes and sucklings by the giants of the present day.

These men must excuse us, if we prefer the safe road of experience, to the aerial excursion.

sions of their balloons; and that as from childhood we have been taught that "the holy scriptures are able to make wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Jesus Christ;" if we still continue to regard them as "given by inspiration of God, and profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

Ambition is one of the passions which seems to be almost inherent in our nature; and although true religion chastens and regulates it, I suspect it is never wholly rooted out. Religion and reason control, and give it a right direction; and if it is thereby excited to such a course, as will entitle the individual to the approbation of the wise and good, it may be considered as a virtue. But it is too often the fruitful parent of evil; and he is the nearest to Christian perfection, who can the most completely eradicate it from his heart. And, if it is desirable for all, this state of mind is essentially necessary to the ministers of religion, because they are, from their situation, peculiarly liable to be influenced by a passion for popular applause; and as our reason is more frequently employed in devising plausible pretences for the indulgence of our inclinations, than in controlling them, that applause, which their self-love induces them to believe to be a proof of the efficacy of their labours, is too often the cause, and indication of their fall.

I am not opposed to the exercise of our reason on the subject of our religion, because I believe that "the Christian religion, rightly understood, is the choicest piece of philosophy that is:" but it ought to be always in the recollection of the great reasoners among your ministers, who attempt an explanation of its mysteries, and who

Of providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate," "reason high that they ought to be prepared to furnish their pupils with such ideas, as will enable them to form, by a right process of that reason, correct conclusions; or, they will, like the reasonings in the pandemonium of Milton, "find no end, in wandering mazes lost;" and the hearers may well exclaim, "vain wisdom all, and false philosophy."

Whatever may be the opinions of others, experience has taught me to believe, that such reasonings seldom produce any good; they are a challenge to examination and refutation, and are often conducted in a manner so contrary to reason itself, that our ingenious and better educated youth too frequently find in the argument its own refutation.

Happy for some of the ministers, I have described, did they, content with the talent allotted to them, endeavour to improve it in the humility of a Christian spirit, and leave to others the task of defending our religion by the process of human reason: to those, who, by labour and study, have instructed, and, by pious meditation, imbued their minds with human learning and Christian knowledge; to men, who in themes like these, can ask instruction;

"And chiefly Thou, O Spirit, that dost prefer
Before all temples, th' upright heart and pure,

Instruct me, for Thou knowest: Thou from the first
Wast present, and with mighty wings outspread,
Dove-like, sat'st brooding on the vast abyss,
And mad'st it pregnant: what in me is dark,
Illumine; what is low, raise and support;
That, to the height of this great argument,
I may assert eternal Providence,
And justify the ways of God to men."

But the hope is vain! "Fools will rush in, where angels fear to tread."

FOR THE FRIEND.

"Doctrines held by one part of Society, and which we believe to be sound and edifying, are pronounced by the other part to be unsound and spurious. From this has resulted a state of things that has proved destructive of peace and tranquillity, &c."—Greenstreet Address of the 4th month last.

These bold and unauthorized assertions of Elias Hicks, respecting our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, are in direct contradiction to the clearest and most emphatic testimonies of Holy Scripture. They contravene the whole scope of prophecy, from the fall of Adam to the period when the last page of the prophetic vision was closed; for "all the law and the prophets prophesied" "that Jesus is the Christ, the Saviour of the world." In a word, their tendency is to sap the very foundations of the Christian religion; to blight our highest and holiest hopes both in time, and for eternity; to deprive us of the purest comforts of life, and the only solid consolations in the hour of death—they abandon man to a system of cold and heartless infidelity, in which he can look neither to a God, a Redeemer, a Mediator, an Advocate, nor a Heaven, but what is limited to his own breast.

My readers will remember that the sentiments I have quoted, are a part of those doctrines which the Address of the 4th month declares are "held by one part of the Society, [the followers of Elias Hicks,] and which they believe to be sound and edifying"—while Friends "pronounce them to be unsound and spurious;" thus drawing a clear distinction between their views, and those held by the Society of Friends, on the most important and essential doctrines of the Christian religion.

To make the contrast more striking, I shall turn from the unhallowed sentiments of Elias Hicks, to the devout and reverent expressions of our worthy primitive Friends, when speaking of the character and offices of our holy Redeemer.

In an essay written from Worcester prison, in 1682, "In answer to all such as falsely say the Quakers are no Christians," George Fox says:—"And Christ has purchased his church with his own blood. And we give thanks unto the Father, who hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light, who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son, in whom we have redemption through his blood, that is, the forgiveness of sins. Who is the image of the invisible God, the First-begotten of every creature; for by Him were all things created, which are in Heaven, and which are in earth; things visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, dominions, principalities or powers;

all things were created by Him and for Him, and he is before all things, and in him and by him all things consist. And He is the Head of the body, the church; who is the Beginning, and the First-begotten from the dead—that in all things he might have the pre-eminence, for it pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell. And many other Scriptures we might bring, which do prove that Christ is the head of the church. And Christ saith, all power in heaven and in earth is given to me: and we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding that we may know him that is true, and we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ, this is the true God, and eternal life."

Robert Barclay thus speaks of Jesus Christ in his Confession of Faith, viz.—"Article 4th. Concerning the Divinity of Christ, and his being from the beginning.—In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God—the same was in the beginning with God; all things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made. Whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting; for God created all things by Jesus Christ; who being in the form of God, thought it no robbery to be equal with God; and his name is called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace; who is the image of the invisible God, the Firstborn of every creature, the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his substance; who was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood, and his name is called the Word of God. In Him dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily; and in him are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge."

The passages in the writings of our early Friends, which set forth their Christian belief in the eternal divinity and glorious offices of the Lord Jesus, are so numerous, that it would be easy to fill a volume with pertinent quotations. But I apprehend it is unnecessary, since every person who is at all conversant with their history or works, must be convinced that this was an article of faith on which they strongly insisted. If we take the language of the Address, placed at the head of this article, in its fullest meaning, it will follow that as the "doctrines held by one part of the Society, are pronounced by the other to be unsound and spurious;" and as the Society of Friends declare the sentiments of Elias Hicks and his followers to be antichristian and unscriptural, so the converse is also to be inferred, viz. that the latter condemn the doctrines of Friends, "as unsound and spurious," as "prescribed modes of faith, framed in the will and wisdom of the creatures."

Having passed through the neighbourhood of Philadelphia without entering the city, Elias Hicks attended the southern quarterly meeting on the 28th of the eleventh month. Two days afterwards, a number of Friends, (all of them members of the select meeting,) being met together on business relating to our religious society, Ezra Comfort, an approved minister of Plymouth monthly meeting, called to see the Friend at whose house they were assembled. He was on his way home from a religious visit in the southern quarter, and had attended the quarterly meeting on the 28th.

He stated, in the course of conversation, that he had been much distressed with the doctrines preached by Elias Hicks in the general meeting, which immediately succeeded the quarterly meeting; but that, owing to several circumstances, he had been prevented from speaking with him thereon.

He expressed a strong desire to have an interview with Elias, in order to unburden his mind, and discharge a duty, which, he conceived, he owed to him—of pointing out the nature and tendency of his doctrines. He also left, with these Friends, the following written statement of some of the exceptionable expressions used by Elias.

"Jesus Christ was the first man who introduced the gospel dispensation. The Jews being under an outward and ceremonial law or dispensation, it was necessary there should be some outward miracles, as the healing the outward infirmities of the flesh, and raising the outward dead bodies, in order to introduce the gospel dispensation. He (Jesus) had no more power given him than man, for he was no more than man, he had nothing to do with healing the soul, for that belongs to God only. Elisha, also had the same power to raise the dead. He then stated, that man, being obedient to the Spirit of God in him, could arrive at as great, or a greater degree of righteousness than Jesus Christ; then endeavoured to show, how, by righteous acts, man was to arrive at it, for being innocent was not righteous. Then said Jesus Christ thought it not robbery to be equal with God; neither do I think it robbery for man to be equal with God. Then endeavoured to show, that by attending to that stone cut out of the mountain without hands, (alluding to Nebuchadnezzar's dream,) or the seed in man, it would make man equal with God, for that stone in man, he said, was the entire God."

(Signed)

EZRA COMFORT,
ISAIAH BELL.

It appeared to the Friends then assembled, that their duty towards Elias Hicks imperiously demanded, that he should be informed of the charges thus made against him, and be afforded an opportunity of clearing them up, and refuting them, if they had arisen from misunderstanding his language. They, therefore, requested Dr. Samuel Powell Griffiths and Ellis Yarnell to visit him for that purpose upon his coming to the city. They accordingly called at his lodgings on the 7th of the twelfth month, the evening after his arrival. Elias saw them in company with his companion David Seamen. They informed him that certain reports had been spread concerning him, particularly, that he had declared in public, that Christ was no more than man; that they had come, as elders, to inform him thereof—that if he disavowed the doctrine, his way would be open with them; if not, that they could not unite with him. Elias explicitly denied that such had ever been his opinions or expressions, that Christ was the son of God, but that we had only his word for it. He showed them his certificates from the monthly and quarterly meetings of Long Island, with endorsements of the Baltimore and southern quarterly meetings, expressive of unity with him. It was remarked to him, that this avowal was grateful, but that a Friend was in the city, who had been at the southern general quarterly meeting after the endorsement of the certificate, who was much pained by his doctrine, and wished to see him in company with his companion and some of the elders. He said they had no right to meddle with him for what he had declared elsewhere, and would not consent to see the Friend.

In the course of the conversation, Elias said, he had never been called to account before, except once by a Friend in this city, on a very trifling occasion; that he thought the certificate from the quarterly meeting of Long Island, the first in the United States, would be sufficient to silence all objections;—that he knew whence all these false reports had originated—they were from an individual in New York, who had been striving for years to injure him.

He observed, concerning human reason, that it was but of little avail, until divinely illuminated, and then it was all things;—that many spoke of the divinity of Jesus Christ, who did not know what it meant; that he had been grossly misunderstood in his public communications. It was suggested to him, that more plainness and clearness, and less speculation, might obviate these difficulties. He did not dissent from the first remark, but denied that he ever speculated. On leaving him at the door, the elders again requested him to see the Friend who had been at the southern quarterly meeting, and he again declined it.

The reader must perceive that in this interview, Elias Hicks, even in denying the charge of having declared that Christ was no more than man, used evasive language; and that his reception of the Elders amounted to a total rejection of their counsel and care over him. He told them they had no right to meddle with him for what he had declared elsewhere. As this is the only plausible argument that has been raised against the proceedings of the Elders, it becomes necessary to state it clearly, that the reader may perceive its weakness. In order to do this, we must first examine into the nature and character of the office of Elder, as it exists under the regulations of our Yearly Meeting.

These are briefly, but comprehensively stated in the Discipline. The Elders are prudent, solid Friends, chosen in each monthly meeting, to sit with the ministers in the select meeting.

"It is earnestly and affectionately recommended, that ministers and elders watch over one another for good. If any ministers shall misapply or draw unsound inferences, or wrong conclusions from the texts, or shall misbehave themselves in points of conduct or conversation, let them be admonished in love and tenderness by the elders or overseers where they live; and if they prove refractory, and refuse to acknowledge their faults, let them be further dealt with, in the wisdom of truth as the case may require."

In the select meetings, the question is regularly asked, and it is enjoined that a clear and distinct statement of the answer be transmitted to the superior meeting: "Are ministers sound in word and doctrine?"

"The elders are designed to be as nursing fathers and mothers to those that are young in the ministry, and with all care and diligence to advise and admonish them; and if they see occasion, reprove them in a tender and Christian spirit, according to the rules of our discipline, and counsel of Friends in that respect."

"We tenderly recommend faithful Friends, and especially ministers and elders, to watch over the flock of Christ in their respective places and stations."

These extracts from the book of Discipline, which comprehend nearly all that relates to the elders, clearly show that one of the most important of their duties, is to keep a guard and watch over the ministry. This duty is to be performed by them in the first place, towards the members of their own select meeting, whom they are to advise, admonish, and reprove, as the occasion may require. But they are also to watch over the flock of Christ in their respective places and stations. A minister travelling in the service of the gospel, becomes the object of care and concern to the elders of the meetings he visits. If he draw unsound inferences or wrong conclusions from the texts, he is to be admonished in love and tenderness by the elders or overseers, wherever he may be. In the particular case before us, a Friend had been much pained with the doctrines preached at the southern quarterly meeting. He had sought an interview with Elias Hicks, and had not been able to obtain it. He was compelled to go away without unburdening his mind; and on his way home, requested several of the elders of Philadelphia to endeavour to procure an interview for him. Could they do otherwise? Would it have been performing their duty towards the Friend, to have withheld from him the information that a brother had somewhat against him, and wished to expostulate with him? The case was evidently one of those in which elders and ministers are earnestly recommended to watch over one another for good.

The course pursued by the elders in respect to the application of Ezra Comfort, would have been proper in relation to any similar expression of uneasiness with a minister, the soundness of whose faith was unimpeached.

But in the present instance, they would have been justified in taking much higher ground than was actually assumed.

The views of Elias Hicks respecting the most important articles of christian faith, were incompatible with those of the Society of Friends; and that duty of self-preservation, which all societies owe to themselves, rendered it necessary to prevent, if possible, the authorized promulgation of his sentiments. He was unquestionably entitled to be heard in his own defence; and it would therefore have been proper for the elders to afford him an opportunity of clearing himself of the charge of wilful error, or of a deliberate intention of severing the Society. But to try the measures rendered necessary in an extreme case of this kind, by the rules of ordinary proceedings, is neither fair nor reasonable. Several circumstances had occurred, which threw the case entirely out of the statutes of the discipline—for in the first place Elias Hicks carried with him the sanction and approbation of his own monthly and quarterly meetings; the presumption, therefore, under the discipline, must be that all was right with him. The framers of that code never supposed, no legislator can suppose, that the laws which he establishes will be abandoned by a whole people. The entire frame of the discipline is constructed in the faith that every department of the Society will, each in its proper place, support the duty which is assigned to it. That any meeting for discipline should so far forsake the faith and testimonies of the Society, as to give its official sanction to unchristian principles, as to grant a certificate for performing a religious visit abroad, to a member upon whom the fact of unsoundness had been proved, was never to be supposed. But when this is once done, and the preacher set at large, those meetings which he visits must protect themselves as they can from the intrusion. This case is an exception to all the ordinary rules of the discipline, and must form its own rule. Let us suppose for a moment, that a minister were to come among us with all the regular testimonies of the unity of his friends at home with his doctrines and his mission, and that his first sermon here were to be a laboured vindication of the duty of citizens to bear arms, or of the lawfulness of taking oaths. Can any one doubt that it would be the duty of the elders at once to stop his progress, and inform his friends at home of his apostacy? And would not every voice in the Society be lifted up in support and approbation of their conduct in so doing? And what then is the cause, that for simply attempting to gain an explanation from Elias Hicks himself, of his real views upon doctrines in which he was believed to err; doctrines which constitute the very basis of Christianity; in respect to which, those I have alluded to above, are secondary; what, I repeat, can be the cause, that they have drawn upon themselves, for thus doing, so much bitter hostility, and alienated the feelings of many of their brethren? The only assignable cause, is a secret or avowed partiality for the doctrines in question, or ignorance of their nature and tendency, and of all the circumstances of the case. So far at least as my own observation extends, it confirms this opinion. I have never known an individual that had been deceived by these false doctrines, and returned to his early faith, whose opinions respecting the conduct of the elders had not also changed, upon hearing the correct statement of their proceedings. It appears to me to be impossible to have correct views respecting these doctrines, and to condemn the elders for their endeavours to support them.

I consider it therefore as perfectly clear, that if the elders of Philadelphia had satisfied themselves of the unchristian character of Elias Hicks's doctrines, they would have been justified in refusing him at once the privilege of our meeting houses, and in transmitting a clear statement of his doctrines, as a charge against him, to the meeting of which he is a member.

FIRST MONTH, 5, 1828.

We should be deficient in gratitude towards our literary coadjutors and correspondents were we to omit the expression of thanks for the generous support we have hitherto received. But from the continued accession to our list of subscribers, from various parts of our country, near and remote, and other unequivocal demonstrations of approbation, we feel the responsibility of our duties, and the importance of sustaining the respectability of the paper, especially in its literary department, proportionably increased. We would, therefore, once more remind our friends, that a letter-box is placed at the publisher's door, for the reception of communications intended for 'The Friend.'

By the immediate insertion of 'Scraps from my Port Folio,' we have shown our readiness to welcome favours from that quarter.

Several other articles have been recently received, and are under consideration.

The article entitled 'the Rainbow,' is placed in the hands of the publisher, with notes for alterations; in its present form it will not do.

The communications from A. and M. T. H., though not destitute of merit, do not sufficiently come up to the test.

Due heed has been given to the strictures of Emsaul on our use of the pronoun We; but without adverting to the fact, that 'The Friend,' in common with most periodicals, is indebted to the co-operation of several literary fellow-helpers, the circumstance of the editor and the publisher having a joint interest in its management, is a full justification for their use of the plural number. This observation applies to the editorial department; if a correspondent chooses to assume that mode of address, the editor is not responsible.

We feel obliged for the friendly hints of a subscriber from New Bedford, Mass., and hope that the course of our latter numbers has evinced our readiness to take advantage of them.

HYMN.—Psalms 19th.

Thy glory, Lord, the heavens display;
Thy work the firmament declares;
The circling change of night and day,
The message of thy wisdom bears.

That message needs nor voice nor sound
To spread its tale of power abroad;
Light's silent march alone, around
Proclaims to all the worlds their God.

High mid those worlds, the giant force
Of yon bright sun, thy might obeys;
Thy word impels his morning course,
Thy word recalls his evening rays.

Forth from the chambers of the night,
He rushes to his glad career,
And spreads through all the paths of light
The splendours of his welcome year.

Thus rising in a brighter morn,
In cloudless majesty sublime,
The sun of righteousness shall dawn,
Through heaven, through earth, through space and time.

And scattering broad the piercing gleam,
O'er worlds around, above, beneath,
The Christ of God, the living beam,
Shall brighten all the glooms of death.

Second Part.

Oh, Saviour, life, and love, and light,
Pour on my heart thy quickening ray,
And give thy peace to every night,
And heaven's own dawn to ev'ry day.

Oh! cleanse me from the sins unknown
To my own proud and careless eye!
Oh! pitying, hear the conscious groan,
(Awaken'd guilt's full agony!)

And save me from the deeper stain
Of wild presumption's rebel will,
And save me from the last worst reign
Of sin, once quell'd, but victor still.

Oh! let each thought, each look, each word,
Each path in joy or sorrow trod,
Be pleasing in thy sight, O Lord,
My hope, my strength, Redeemer, God.

ANCIENT JEWISH MEDAL.

The following account is extracted from "A brief notice of some Ancient Coins and Medals, as illustrating the progress of Christianity," which is printed in the Amulet, for 1828. Whether the medal alluded to will bear the test of antiquarian research, we have no means of ascertaining, but it must, unquestionably, be of high antiquity, and the account possesses great interest.

"In the year 1812, a peasant, in the county of Cork, in Ireland, was digging potatoes, accompanied by his daughter, who picked them up as they were thrown above the ground. Among them she found, encrusted with clay, what she thought to be a large button, and handing it to her father, he rubbed the edge on the sleeve of his coat, and in a short time it became bright like gold. He now imagined that he had gained a prize, and proceeded with it to his landlord, Mr. Corlett, a gentleman of Cork, of the society of Friends. He further cleaned it, and found it to be an antique medal of singular structure and device. On one side was the head of our Saviour, and on the other a Hebrew inscription; both, however, considerably injured by time. As the place where the potatoes were planted, had been the site of a very ancient monastery, coeval with the first introduction of Christianity into Ireland, but of which even the ruins had long since disappeared, it was imagined, with every probability, that this medal had been brought into Ireland by some of the religious community at a very early period, and as such, was an object of great interest. Fac similes, therefore, were taken from it, and sent about, and in a short time, it excited, in no slight degree, the attention of the learned, and various conjectures were made as to its age and origin. About this time, a medal of similar kind came into my possession, obtained from a Polish Jew, at Rostoc in Germany; and on comparing it with that found in Ireland, it appeared to be an exact counterpart and struck from the same die. As it had not suffered the same injuries from attrition and erosion, it was in a highly perfect state of preservation, and the letters, which were much injured in the former, and caused some obscurity in the inscription, were in this sharp and distinct as when they were struck. But the bust of Christ was singularly beautiful; it had a pensive sublimity in its air and character, that exactly accorded with our ideas of its great prototype, as if he had sat for the picture; and the execution denoted it to be of an era when the arts were in their highest vigour.

"It appeared by a memoir presented with it to the Royal Irish Academy, that it was first mentioned by Theseus Ambrosius, and after him had been a subject of inquiry by the learned of Europe for more than two centuries; that it made its first appearance in Rome, under Julius II., when the Vases de Medici and other long lost productions of ancient art, were again brought to light; that inferior copies of it were multiplied with slight variations, but the original was not a coin but a tessera or die, struck by the first Jewish converts to Christianity, and worn by them as a pious memorial of their master; and finally, that the date was indicated by the Hebrew letter Aleph on the obverse,* which then, as well as now, represented the numeral 1, and indicated that it was struck in the first year after the resurrection.

"The obverse of the medal represents the head of our Saviour, as described in the letter said to have been sent by Lentulus to Tiberius; his hair divided after the manner of the Nazarenes, plain to his ears, and waving on the shoulders; his beard thick, not long, but forked, the face beautiful, and the bust fine; over the whole, the tunic falls in graceful folds. On the obverse is the Hebrew letter Aleph, representing the numeral 1,† and supposed to stand for the date. On the reverse, is this inscription on the field, in Hebrew—"The Messiah has reigned—he came in peace—and being made the light of man, he lives."

* In speaking of coins, the obverse means the principal face on which the head of the monarch is generally placed; the reverse, the opposite side, on which is generally some device. The whole surface is called the field; letters on the field are called the inscription; letters round the edge, the legend.

† Many learned modern Jews, to whom I showed the medal, concurred in this conjecture.

FOR THE FRIEND.

I send a few extracts from some passages of the life and death of the Earl of Rochester, written by his own direction, on his death-bed, by Gilbert Burnet, D. D., London, 1680; a work, says Dr. Johnson, "which the critic ought to read for its elegance, the philosopher for its arguments, and the saint for its piety." However familiar this little book may be to some of the readers of the Friend, there are probably many who have not seen it, or have not read it lately; and in either case, a perusal of the following extracts can hardly fail to be both interesting and instructive. They are the chief parts of some discourses concerning morality and religion; and the arguments of Burnet for the truth of Christianity are so forcible and striking, and his manner at the same time so pleasing and attractive, that we cannot wonder if they were instrumental in producing the conversion of Rochester, practised as he was in the ways of his infidelity. There could scarcely, indeed, be found a more signal instance of true conversion; so sincere was he in his repentance, "that he was not unwilling to take shame to himself, by suffering his faults to be exposed, for the benefit of others;" having given it in charge to his biographer, "not to spare him in any thing which he thought might be of use to the living."

"As for the government of the world, says Burnet, if we believe the Supreme Power made it, there is no reason to think he does not govern it: for all that we can fancy against it is, the distraction which that infinite variety of second causes, and the care of their concerns, must give to the first, if it inspects them all. But as among men, those of weaker capacities are wholly taken up with some one thing, whereas those with more enlarged powers can, without distraction, have many things within their care; as the eye can, at one view, receive a great variety of objects, in that narrow compass, without confusion, so if we conceive the divine understanding to be as far above ours, as his power of creating and framing the whole universe is above our limited activity, we will no more think the government of the world a distraction to him; and if we have once overcome this prejudice, we shall be ready to acknowledge a providence directing all affairs; a care well becoming the great Creator.

"As for worshipping him, if we imagine our worship is a thing that adds to his happiness, or gives him such a fond pleasure as weak people have to hear themselves commended; or that our repeated addresses to overcome him through our mere importunity, we have certainly very unworthy thoughts of him. The true ends of religious worship come within another consideration, which is this; a man is never entirely reformed, till a new principle governs his thoughts. Nothing makes that principle so strong, as deep and frequent meditations of God, whose nature, though it be far above our comprehension, yet his goodness and wisdom are such perfections as fall within our imagination; and he that thinks often of God, and considers him as governing the world, and as ever observing all his actions, will feel a very sensible effect of such meditations, as they grow more lively and frequent with him; so the end of religious worship, either public or private, is to make the apprehensions of God have a deeper root and a stronger influence on us. The frequent returns of these are necessary; lest if we allow of too long intervals between them, that impressions may grow feebler, and other suggestions may come in their room. And the returns of prayer are not to be considered as favours extorted by mere importunity, but as rewards conferred on men so well disposed and prepared for them; according to the promises that God has made for answering our prayers; thereby to engage and nourish a devout temper in us, which is the chief root of all true holiness and virtue.

"It is true, we cannot have suitable notions of the divine essence; as, indeed, we have no just idea of any essence whatsoever, since we commonly consider all things either by their outward figure, or by their effects, and from thence make inferences what their nature must be. So, though we cannot frame any perfect image in our minds of the divinity, yet we may, from the discoveries God has made of himself, form such conceptions of him, as may possess our minds with great reverence for him, and beget in us such a love of those perfections as to engage us to imitate them. For when we say, we love God, the meaning is, we love that being that is holy, just, good, wise, and infinitely perfect; and loving those attributes in that object, will certainly carry us to desire them in ourselves. For whatever we love in another, we naturally, according to the degree of our love, endeavour to resemble it. In sum, the loving and worshipping God, though they are just and reasonable returns and expressions of the sense we have of his goodness to us; yet they are exacted of us, not only as a tribute to God, but as a mean to beget in us a conformity to his nature, which is the chief end of pure and undefiled religion.

"If some men have at times found out inventions, to corrupt this, and cheat the world, it is nothing but what occurs in every sort of employment, to which men betake themselves. Mountebanks corrupt physic; petty-foggers have entangled the matters of property; and all professions have been vitiated by the knaveries of a number of their calling."

"He (Rochester) said, they were happy that believed; for it was not in every man's power.

"And upon this we discoursed long about revealed religion. He said, he did not understand that business of inspiration. He believed the penmen of the Scriptures had hearts and honesty, and so writ; but could not comprehend how God should reveal his secrets to mankind. Why was not man made a creature more disposed for religion, and better illuminated? He could not apprehend how there should be any corruption in the nature of man, or a lapse derived from Adam. God's communicating his mind to one man, was the putting it into his power to cheat the world. For prophecies and miracles, the world had been always full of strange stories; for the boldness and cunning of contrivers meeting with the simplicity and credulity of the people, things were easily received; and being once received, passed down without contradiction. The incoherencies of style in the Scriptures, the odd transitions, the seeming contradictions, chiefly about the order of time, the cruelties enjoined the Israelites in destroying the Canaanites, circumcision and many other rites of the Jewish worship, seemed to him unsuitable to the divine nature; and the first three chapters of Genesis, he thought, could not be true, unless they were parables. This was the substance of what he objected to revealed religion, in general, and to the Old Testament, in particular.

"I answered, to all this, that believing a thing upon the testimony of another, in other matters, when there was no reason to suspect the testimony, chiefly where it was confirmed by other circumstances, was not only a reasonable thing, but it was the hinge on which all the government and justice in the world depended; since all courts of justice proceed upon the evidence given by witnesses; for the use of writings is but a thing more lately brought into the world. So then, if the credibility of the thing, the innocence and disinterestedness of the witnesses, the number of them, and the publicest confirmations that could possibly be given, do concur to persuade us of any matter of fact, it is a vain thing to say, because it is possible for so many men to agree in a lie, that therefore they have done it. In all other things, a man gives his assent when the credibility is strong on the one side, and there appears nothing on the other side to balance it. So, such numbers agreeing in their testimony to these miracles; for instance, of our Saviour's calling Lazarus out of the grave, the fourth day after he was buried, and his own rising again after he was certainly dead; if there had been never so many impostures in the world, no man can, with any reasonable colour, pretend this was one. We find, both by the Jewish and Roman writers that lived in that time, that our Saviour was crucified; and that all his disciples and followers believed certainly that he rose again. They believed this upon the testimony of the apostles, and of many hundreds who saw it, and died confirming it. They went about to persuade the world of it, with great zeal, though they knew they were to get nothing by it, but reproach and suffering; and by many wonders which they wrought, they confirmed their testimony. Now, to avoid all this by saying it is possible this might be a contrivance, and to give no presumption to make it so much as probable that it was so, is in plain English to say, we are resolved, let the evidence be what it will, we will not believe it.

"He said, if a man says he cannot believe, what help is there? for he was not master of his own belief; and believing was, at highest, but a probable opinion. To this I answered, that if a man will let a wanton conceit possess his fancy, against these things, and never consider the evidence for religion on the other hand, but reject it upon a slight view of it, he ought not to say he cannot, but he will not believe; and whilst a man lives an ill course of life, he is not fitly qualified to examine the matter aright. Let him grow calm and virtuous, and upon due application examine things fairly, and then let him pronounce according to his conscience, if, to take it at its lowest, the reasons on the one hand are not much stronger than they are on the other. For I found he was so possessed with the general conceit, that a mixture of knaves and fools had made all extraordinary things be easily believed, that it carried him away to determine the matter, without so much as looking on the historical evidence for the truth of Christianity, which he had not inquired into, but had bent all his wit and study to the support of the other side. As for that, that believing is at best but an opinion, if the evidence be but probable, it is so; but if it be such that it cannot be questioned, it grows as certain as knowledge; for we are no less certain that there is a great town called Constantinople, the seat of the Ottoman empire, than that there is another called London. We as little doubt that Queen Elizabeth once reigned, as that king Charles now reigns in England. So that believing may be as certain, and as little subject to doubting as seeing or knowing.

"There are two sorts of believing divine matters; the one is wrought in us by comparing all the evidences of matter of fact, for the confirmation of revealed religion, with the prophecies in the Scripture; where things are punctually predicted some ages before their completion; not in dark and doubtful words, uttered like oracles, which might bend to any event, but in plain terms, as the foretelling that Cyrus by name, should send the Jews back from captivity, after the fixed period of seventy years; the history of the Syrian and Egyptian kings, so punctually foretold by Daniel, and the prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, with many circumstances relating to it, made by our Saviour; joining these to the excellent rule and design of the Scripture in matters of morality, it is at least as reasonable to believe this as any thing else in the world. Yet such a believing as this is only a general persuasion in the mind, which has not that effect, till a man, applying himself to the directions set down in the Scriptures, (which, upon such evidence, cannot be denied to be as reasonable as for a man to follow the prescriptions of a learned physician, and where the rules are both good and easy, to submit to them for the recovering of his health,) and by following these, finds a power entering within him, that frees him from the slavery of his appetites and passions, that exalts his mind above the accidents of life, and spreads an inward purity in his heart, from which a serene and calm joy arises within him; and good men, by the efficacy these methods have upon them, and from the returns of their prayers, and other endeavours, grow assured that these things are true, and answerable to the promises they find registered in Scripture. All this, he said, might be fancy. But to this I answered, that as it were unreasonable to tell a man that is abroad, and knows he is awake, that perhaps he is in a dream, and in his bed, and only thinks he is abroad, or that, as some go about in their sleep, so he may be asleep still; so good and religious men know, though others may be abused by their fancies, that they are under no such deception; and find they are neither hot nor enthusiastic, but under the power of calm and clear principles. All this, he said, he did not understand; and that it was to assert or beg the thing in question, which he could not comprehend.

It is very surprising that praise should excite vanity: for, if what is said of us be true, it is no more than we knew before, and cannot raise us in our own esteem; if it be false, it is surely a most humiliating reflection, that we are only admired because we are not known; and that a closer inspection, would draw forth censure, instead of commendation. Praise can hurt only those who have not formed a decided opinion of themselves, and who are willing, on the testimony of others, to rank themselves higher than their merits warrant, in the scale of excellence.

ELIZA SMITH.

He that never extends his views beyond the praises or rewards of men, will be dejected by neglect and envy, or infatuated by honours and applause. But the consideration that life is only deposited in his hands to be employed in obedience to a master, who will regard his endeavours, not his success, would have preserved him from trivial elations and discouragements, and enabled him to proceed with constancy and cheerfulness, neither enervated by commendation, nor intimidated by censure.

DR. JOHNSON.

ADVENTURER.

FOR THE FRIEND.

An address "to the Ocean" translated from the Spanish, published in the last number of "The Friend," brings to my recollection an address "to the Cataract of Niagara," from the same language, which, although not without its imperfections, I think equals the former both in sublimity and tender pathos. From the similarity of the address, I have been induced to suppose, they may be productions of the same pen.

VERUS.

12th Mo. 24, 1827.

NIAGARA.

From the Spanish of Jose Maria Heredia.

My lyre! give me my lyre! my bosom feels
The glow of inspiration. O, how long
Have I been left in darkness, since this light
Last visited my brow! Niagara!
Thou, with thy rushing waters, dost restore
The heavenly gift that sorrow took away.
Tremendous torrent! for an instant hush
The terrors of thy voice, and cast aside
Those wide involving shadows, that my eyes
May see the fearful beauty of thy face.
I am not all unworthy of thy sight,
For, from my very boyhood, have I lov'd,
Shunning the meaner track of common minds,
To look on Nature in her loftier moods.
At the fierce rushing of the hurricane,
At the near bursting of the thunderbolt,
I have been touched with joy; and when the sea,
Lash'd by the wind, hath rock'd my bark, and show'd
Its yawning caves beneath me, I have loved
Its dangers, and the wrath of elements.
But never yet the madness of the sea
Hath moved me, as thy grandeur moves me now.

Thou flowest on in quiet, till thy waves
Grow broken midst the rocks; thy current then
Shoots onward, like the irresistible course
Of destiny. Ah, terribly they rage!
The hoarse and rapid whirlpool's there! My brain
Grows wild, my senses wander, as I gaze
Upon the hurrying waters, and my sight
Vainly would follow, as toward the verg
Sweeps the wide torrent—waves innumerable Meet there and madden—waves innumerable
Urge on, and overtake the waves before,
And disappear in thunder and in foam.

They reach—they leap the barrier—the abyss
Swallows, insatiable, the sinking waves.
A thousand rainbows arch them, and the woods
Are deafened with the roar. The violent shock
Shatters to vapour the descending sheets.
A cloudy whirlwind fills the gulf, and heaves
The mighty pyramid of circling mist
To Heaven. The solitary hunter near,
Pauses with terror, in the forest shades.

What seeks my restless eye? Why are not here,
About the jaws of this abyss, the palms?
Ah! the delicious palms, that on the plains
Of my own native Cuba spring and spread
Their thickly foliaged summits to the sun;
And in the breathings of the ocean air,
Wave soft beneath the Heaven's unspotted blue.

But no, Niagara, thy forest pines
Are fitter coronal for thee. The palm,
The effeminate myrtle, and frail rose, may grow
In gardens, and give out their fragrance there, Unmanning him who breathes it. Thine it is
To do a nobler office. Generous minds
Behold thee, and are moved, and learn to rise
Above earth's frivolous pleasures; they partake
Thy grandeur, at the utterance of thy name.

God of all truth! in other lands I've seen
Lying philosophers, blaspheming men,
Questioners of thy mysteries; that draw
Their fellows deep into impiety;
And, therefore, doth my spirit seek thy face
In earth's majestic solitudes. Even here,
My heart doth open all itself to thee.
In this immensity of loneliness,
I feel thy hand upon me. To my ear,

The eternal thunder of the cataract brings
Thy voice, and I am humbled as I hear.

Dread torrent! that with wonder and with fear
Dost overwhelm the soul of him that looks
Upon thee, and dost bear it from itself,
Whence hast thou thy beginning? who supplies,
Age after age, thy unexhausted springs?
What power hath ordered, that, when all thy weight
Descends into the deep, the swollen waves
Rise not, and roll to overwhelm the earth?

The Lord hath opened his omnipotent hand,
Covered thy face with clouds, and given his voice
To thy down rushing waters; he hath girt
Thy terrible forehead, with his radiant bow.
I see thy never resting waters run,
And I bethink me how the tide of time
Sweeps to eternity. So pass off man—
Pass, like a noon day dream, the blossoming days,
And he awakes to sorrow. I, alas!
Feel that my youth is withered, and my brow
Ploughed early with the lines of grief and care.

FOR THE FRIEND.

A prospectus for publishing a newspaper in the Cherokee Nation, is one of the extraordinary circumstances of these eventful times, entitled to especial remark. It gives us pleasure, therefore, to introduce the editor's design, in his own neat and modest style, sincerely commending the enterprise to the patronage of our readers. Every attempt to illustrate the character, and elevate the condition of the remnant of the aboriginal proprietors of the land we occupy, who remain on the skirts of what is called civilization, ought, we think, to be embraced by those whose ancestors were so kindly received by their progenitors. This is peculiarly the duty of Pennsylvanians. The history of the Indian natives is full of interest; the truth—the whole truth of their case remains to be told. The wrongs dispensed to those people on this continent, from the first arrival of the northern colonists, more than two centuries ago, down to the recent dislodgment of an improving tribe at the south, have been as various as they were cruel. Add to the injuries heaped upon the Indian race, the grievous slavery of the Africans, which has defiled the same region, and you make up an amount of transgression, for which this nation must one day be brought to a formidable and fearful reckoning, if we really believe, as we profess to do, that "justice and judgment are the habitation of God's throne." This may be considered energetic language, but it does not outstrip the facts which justify it. Men will not look the actual state of things full in the face; nothing is more wanting, in our country, than moral courage!

Neither expediency, the tyrant's plea, nor temporary policy, the frail argument of short-sighted statesmen; neither territorial expansion, at once the excuse of ambition and the food of avarice, nor the unconquerable appetite for individual gain, by direct and indirect oppression, will escape the consequences which they inevitably produce. None of these unsound foundations and false coverings can avail anything, at the tribunal of eternal truth and inexorable decision. As with individuals, so will it prove for nations—"Such as ye sow, such shall ye reap." But we must take leave of this subject for the present, to submit the promised prospectus.

CHEROKEE PHOENIX.

It has long been the opinion of judicious friends to the civilization of the aborigines of America, that a paper, published exclusively for their benefit, and under their direction, would add great force to the charitable means employed by the public for their melioration. In accordance with that opinion, the legislative authorities of the Cherokees have thought fit to patronize a weekly paper, bearing the above title, and have appointed the subscriber to take charge of it, as Editor. In issuing this prospectus, the Editor would by no means be too sanguine, for he is aware he will tread upon untried ground. Nor does he make any pretensions to learning, for it must be known, that the great and sole motive in establishing this paper, is the benefit of the Cherokees. This will be the great aim of the Editor, which he intends to pursue with undeviating steps. Many reasons might be given, in support of the utility of such a paper as that which is now offered to the public, but it is deemed useless. There are many true friends to the Indians, in different parts of the Union, who will rejoice to see this feeble effort of the Cherokees to rise from their ashes, like the fabled Phoenix. On such friends must principally depend the support of our paper.

The alphabet lately invented by a native Cherokee, of which the public have already been apprized, forms an interesting medium of information to those Cherokees who are unacquainted with the English language. For their benefit, Cherokee types have been procured. The columns of the Cherokee Phoenix will be filled, partly with English, and partly with Cherokee print; and all matter, which is of common interest, will be given in both languages, in parallel columns. As the great object of the Phoenix will be the benefit of the Cherokees, the following subjects will occupy its columns:

- 1st. The laws and public documents of the nation.
- 2d. Account of the manners and customs of the Cherokees, their progress in education, religion, and the arts of civilized life; with such notices of other Indian tribes, as our limited means of information will allow.
- 3d. The principal interesting news of the day.
- 4th. Miscellaneous articles, calculated to promote literature, civilization, and religion among the Cherokees.

In closing this short prospectus, the Editor would appeal to the friends of Indians, and respectfully ask their patronage. Those who have heretofore manifested a Christian zeal in promoting our welfare and happiness, will no doubt freely lend their helping hand.

Temperance, and Cleanliness, with trust in Providence, the best antiseptic.

Those who remember the autumn of 1793, and the subsequent visitation of yellow fever in Philadelphia, will recollect the eagerness with which specifics against contagion were sought after. Perhaps the following prescription of that celebrated philanthropist and truly pious man, John Howard, may be considered the best after all.

"I have been frequently asked," says this great man, "what precautions I use to preserve myself from infection in the prisons and hospitals I visit. I here answer, next to the free goodness and mercy of the Author of my being, temperance and cleanliness are my preservatives. Trusting in Divine Providence, and believing myself in the way of my duty, I visit the most noxious cells; and while thus employed, 'I fear no evil.'"—State of the Prisons of England and Wales.

DRYDEN.

A good conscience is to the soul what health is to the body; it preserves a constant ease and serenity within us, and more than countervails all the calamities and afflictions which can possibly befall us. I know nothing so hard for a generous mind to get over as calumny and reproach, and cannot find any method of quieting the soul under them, besides this single one, of our being conscious to ourselves that we do not deserve them.

I have been always mightily pleased with that passage in Don Quixote, where the fantastical knight is represented as loading a gentleman of good sense with praises and eulogiums. Upon which the gentleman makes this reflection to himself: How grateful is praise to human nature! I cannot forbear being secretly pleased with the commendations I receive, though I am sensible it is a madman that bestows them on me. In the same manner, though we are often sure that the censures which are passed upon us are uttered by those who know nothing of us, and have neither means nor abilities to form a right judgment of us, we cannot forbear being grieved at what they say.

In order to heal this infirmity, which is so natural to the best and wisest of men, I have taken a particular pleasure in observing the conduct of the old philosophers, how they bore themselves up against the malice and detraction of their enemies.

The way to silence calumny, says Bias, is to be always exercised in such things as are praiseworthy. Socrates, after having received sentence, told his friends, that he had always accustomed himself to regard truth and not censure, and that he was not troubled at his condemnation, because he knew himself free from guilt. It was in the same spirit that he heard the accusations of his two great adversaries, who had uttered against him the most virulent reproaches. Anytus and Melitus, says he, may procure sentence against me, but they cannot hurt me. This divine philosopher was so well fortified in his own innocence, that he neglected all the impotence of evil tongues which were engaged in his destruction. This was, properly, the support of a good conscience, that contradicted the reports which had been raised against him, and cleared him to himself.

Others of the philosophers rather choose to retort the injury by a smart reply, than thus to disarm it with respect to themselves. They show that it stung them, though, at the same time, they had the address to make their aggressors suffer with them. Of this kind was Aristotle's reply to one who pursued him with long and bitter invectives. "You," says he, "who are used to suffer reproaches, utter them with delight; I, who have not been used to utter them, take no pleasure in hearing them." Diogenes was still more severe on one who spoke ill of him: "Nobody will believe you when you speak ill of me, any more than they would believe me, should I speak well of you."

In these, and many other instances I could produce, the bitterness of the answer sufficiently testifies the uneasiness of mind the person was under who made it. I would rather advise my reader, if he has not in this case the secret consolation, that he deserves no such reproaches as are cast upon him, to follow the advice of Epictetus: "If any one speak ill of thee, consider whether he has truth on his side; and if so, reform thyself, that his censures may not affect thee." When Anaximander was told, that the very boys laughed at his singing; "Ay," says he, "then I must learn to sing better." But of all the sayings of philosophers which I have gathered together for my own use on this occasion, there are none which carry in them more candour and good sense, than the two following ones of Plato. Being told that he had many enemies who spoke ill of him: "It is no matter," said he, "I will live so that none shall believe them." Hearing at another time, that an intimate friend of his had spoken detractingly of

FOR THE FRIEND.

In taking a retrospective view of the religious Society of Friends, and of the causes which have principally contributed to produce the mournful state of things now existing amongst its members, I have been fully persuaded that much of the unhappy defection has been occasioned by misrepresentation, sometimes, I fear, wilful and even malicious, but more generally, I would hope, arising from thoughtlessness.

There is one erroneous impression that has been industriously propagated through this medium, which I cannot permit to pass without casting in my mite to obviate the injurious consequences which now flow from it.

The leaders of the seceding party, and certain other persons, who, though not leaders, possess, in an eminent degree, the faculty of sowing discord amongst brethren, and exciting prejudices against Friends, have been at no small pains to disseminate the idea, that all those who have separated from the Society, are branded by Friends with the character of deists, infidels, unbelievers, &c. Thus a late writer in defence of the separatists, says, "They denounced as infidels, all who could not unite with them in these sentiments; they called them deists, wolves in sheep's clothing—false pretenders to religion and godliness, children of hell, &c." I am unwilling to soil the pages of the Friend with more of this offensive matter; but in the same essay we are told, that this was predicated "of our friends, that is, of about eight tenths of the Society." Amidst a crowd of exaggerations and unfair statements which are almost daily put into circulation, this might well be permitted to pass unnoticed, were it not for the effect which it is designed to produce, and which it might perhaps produce, on the minds of sincere and worthy Friends at a distance. It is for the sake of those who may not have ready access to the sources of correct information, that I feel it my duty to declare that these assertions are entirely incorrect. That many of the prominent preachers of the new sect teach doctrines incompatible with the Christian religion, and at variance with the Bible, is a fact established beyond the reach of refutation; and that these sentiments have been called deistical, and doctrines of infidelity, is not denied, for such they certainly are. The terms are perfectly appropriate to the subject, and the authority of some of the best writers may be adduced in support of their use.

The preachers who inculcate those doctrines, cannot be ignorant of these facts; but in order to direct the attention of their hearers from the real nature of the sentiments they are teaching, much clamour is raised respecting the harsh terms by which Friends designate them, and they most ingeniously and earnestly strive to identify themselves and their peculiar opinions, with all who manifest the least difference of opinion from those whom they charitably style "the ruling party," the "select conclave," "popes and cardinals," "superstitious bigots," &c. Thus they endeavour to make common cause with their hearers, and declaim with great vehemence against "persecution," "tyranny," "oppression," "high-handed measures," &c. &c., while they, forsooth, are the sole advocates of "liberty of conscience"—"religious rights," and the uncontrolled sway of "the majority." All this may serve the present purpose, and carry on the deception for a time, but we believe there are amongst the seceders many serious and sober inquirers after truth, who, we sincerely hope, will not always be the subjects of such artful delusion.

I am far from supposing that all those who rank on the side of the new sect, have adopted the principles taught by their leaders. Indeed, I know there are many who have not; there are amongst them many well meaning and sincere persons, who, if they could but see the doctrines in their own naked deformity, stripped of the factitious gloss, and scriptural colouring, by which they are disguised, would turn from them with disgust and disapprobation. But unhappily, these exposures of the doctrines seldom meet their eye—they are surrounded by a circle in which they have little else than commendation of the preachers and their views; and to lull them more effectually, they are plied with reiterated complaints of the uncharitableness—the want of kindness—the intolerance and severity of those, who see and deplore the nature and consequences of the doctrines, and who cannot conscientiously withhold the expression of their dissent.

It is from the artful obscurity in which Elias Hicks and some of his associate ministers, have contrived to veil their preaching; and from their notorious refusal to give explicit and clear explanations of their real sentiments, that much of the difficulty has arisen. We all well remember the time, when some of his admirers roundly denied that he held those very opinions, which they themselves now openly avow, and we believe their denial was sincere; they could not suppose that he cherished such errors. In fact, it was not until after the exercise of a prolonged patience, that distinct, authentic, printed proofs of this fact, could be obtained. These proofs are now abundant; and could those who follow the preacher from personal partiality, or from general reverence of his sage appearance and ministerial character, be induced to give them a candid perusal, I am fully of the opinion, that a large proportion of his admirers, would unhesitatingly reject many of his favourite notions.

I would remark, too, that where certain opinions are pronounced to be deistical or anti-christian, and an assembly is warned against adopting them, if individuals who are present appropriate these epithets to themselves, and consider that they are alluded to by the speaker, who, probably, has not the slightest acquaintance with "eight tenths" of his hearers; it is strong presumptive evidence, that those individuals, in their own hearts, are conscious of having adopted the condemned doctrines, and stand guilty by their own confession.

It appears to me clear, that a large portion of those who have seceded, never have adopted the peculiar opinions of Elias Hicks, but have been introduced into their present separated state, by totally different causes, the most effectual of which is misrepresentation. Those of them who are conscious that this is the case, who can sincerely say they have not departed from the faith of their Christian predecessors, certainly injure themselves and those whom they have left, by supposing that they are accused of holding deistical or infidel doctrines. Such an accusation has never been brought against them. At the same time, they should remember, that we are enjoined in Holy Scripture to "try the spirits;" to "hold fast the form of sound words," and not be "driven about with every wind of doctrine, and cunning craftiness of men, whereby they lie in wait to deceive." It is our duty, therefore, seriously to inquire, what doctrines we do hold; inasmuch as the same high authority assures us, that "if any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed." This watchfulness and scrutiny is the more necessary, because the certain effect of hearing a long continued strain of erroneous preaching, however specious it may appear, is to swerve the mind from sound principles, and create a coldness toward the most precious truths of the gospel; and he, who, from general partiality, or from personal affection, voluntarily receives suspected doctrines without sifting them, cannot be acquitted of blame; while those who countenance them, after their real nature is exposed, do virtually adopt them as their own.

MENTOR.

To the Editor of the Friend.

Respected Friend—I have been much gratified with the perusal of the Essays of Luther, which have been inserted in several of the late numbers of the Friend. It appears to me to be of the highest importance, that the doctrines contained in the printed discourses of Elias Hicks, and his followers, should be contrasted with those which the religious Society of Friends has always believed since its first rise. The bare comparison will be sufficient to satisfy every dispassionate reader, that they are entirely incompatible with each other, and that it is unjust to charge upon the Society of Friends the unbelief of Elias Hicks. His doctrines equally contradict the testimony of the chosen disciples of our Lord, who were eye-witnesses of his divine majesty, and of the mighty miracles by which he confirmed his doctrines; and also those which the primitive Quakers promulgated, and in the support of which they endured a long scene of cruel persecution.

In the commencement of the unhappy schism which is now so fully developed, when Elias Hicks began openly to avow his anti-christian sentiments, his adherents confidently denied that he held the doctrines alleged against him. They accused his opponents of prejudice and persecution, because they dared to question the soundness of his faith; they contradicted the testimony of credible witnesses, who had heard him preach; asserting that "we did not understand him, and that he meant quite differently from what his expressions purported. In dividuals, who were uneasy with his preaching, were invited to call upon him, and receive his explanations in private, which, it was asserted, would not fail to convince all that he was really sound and scriptural in his belief. There were instances, however, in which these private commentaries on his sermons failed to produce the promised satisfaction. I remember to have heard an individual state, that on relating to a friend of E. H. some exceptionable expressions which the latter had made in a public meeting, he replied with much earnestness, "Oh, but thou dost not understand him; he does not mean so." "Yes, he does mean so," (rejoined the narrator,) for I called on him, and inquired if that was his meaning, and he told me that it was." As the controversy progressed, the admirers of E. H. not only ceased to deny that he entertained these objectionable sentiments, but some of the more courageous among them began to avow them as their own. So that those who but a little while before denounced the objectionable doctrines, with apparent abhorrence, were now heard fearlessly advocating them. This appears to me a strong argument to prove, if proof were wanting, that the new sect hold doctrines entirely different from those of the Society of Friends.

Elated with the hope that the views of Elias Hicks would finally triumph, his adherents printed his discourses, and circulated them widely among the members of our Society. This was a source of considerable concern to many friends, who feared lest the minds of the undiscerning might be poisoned by the pernicious notions contained in them, and their faith in the truth as it is in Jesus be weakened or destroyed. Notwithstanding this effect may have been produced in some cases, yet there is reason to believe that the great Disposer of events will overrule the evil design to the confusion of its supporters, and make it subservient to the promotion of the kingdom and glorious character of our blessed and holy Redeemer. The "Sermons" are a standing monument of the infidelity of Elias Hicks, and his disciples. So widely are they disseminated, and so generally have they been read, that it will be impracticable for the party to free themselves from the charge of holding and approving the sentiments they contain. The new sect are virtually identified with him and his cause, however they may disclaim the appellation of Hicksites, and strive to make the world believe they are not his followers, and that they are not accountable for his sentiments, neither does he approve of their separation. This, and much more of the same character, may serve to deceive the ignorant; but the fact cannot be denied, or concealed, that they are a distinct sect, founded by Elias Hicks, holding his doctrines and virtually acknowledging him as their head. They have separated from the religious Society of Friends in doctrine and in practice, as is fully announced in their printed address of the fourth month last. And however they may now wish to hide their real situation, when the Society of Friends is raising its voice against their doctrines, and our Christian neighbours are awakened to a just sense of their pernicious tendency, a discerning public will not fail to distinguish them by their proper title, and to free the Society of Friends from the odium of principles which they never held or believed. When the first volume of "Hick's Sermons" was printed, the Berean, a work very properly classed by Indiana Yearly Meeting amongst "pernicious publications," triumphantly announced it in these words: "we have looked over the book. It will make the traditional, outside Christian startle, and the dreamers, high priests, the scribes and pharisees of every denomination, to gnash their teeth; but the great body of the Society (on this continent) of which this venerable minister is a member, together with many other unshackled minds, will set their seals to the doctrines which it contains." Here they assume for themselves, and for the great body of the society of Friends, to set their seals to the doctrines which the volume contains, from what those quotations in the last number of the Friend were taken by Luther. The "great body of Friends," however, utterly reject and abhor the sentiment that our Lord Jesus Christ was merely the outward Saviour of the Jews, and could "have no hand in the salvation of the soul." They receive and firmly believe the testimony of good old Simeon, who waited for the consolation of Israel, when he took the holy child Jesus in his arms, and said, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation, which thou hast prepared before the face of all people; a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel;" which accords with the ancient prediction, "It is a light thing that thou shouldst be my servant, to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give thee a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation to the end of the earth." Our Lord himself also declared, "No man knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him;" and again, "I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father but by me." Hence, says Robert Barclay, "he is fitly called the Mediator betwixt God and man: for having been with God from all eternity, being himself God, and also in time partaking of the nature of man, through him is the goodness and love of God conveyed to mankind, and by him again man receiveth and partaketh of these mercies."

After expressing the hope that Luther will proceed with his extracts, and referring him to the printed discourses of John Comly, Thomas Wetherald, Edward Stabler, Edward Hicks, and Jesse Kersey, preached at the separate meetings held at the Hall and Green street, in which he will find sentiments corresponding with those of Elias Hicks, I shall close this communication with a paragraph contained in an epistle issued in the year 1715, by the three monthly meetings of Philadelphia, and signed on their behalf by James Pemberton, John Elliot, John Parrish, William Savery, Daniel Drinker, and Jonathan Evans.—"And here let us caution all to beware how they suffer their minds to be drawn away by the vain philosophy of this world, from the glorious, divine, and most consolatory faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, the only Mediator and Redeemer. Many have been the attempts of men of corrupt minds, by artful publications and fallacious arguments, to deceive the unguarded, and rob them of that inestimable treasure, the hope of salvation through the Son and Sent of God. These deluded agents of the enemy of your souls' peace, would involve you in the deepest misery and distress, if given place to; we beseech you, therefore, wisely to reject, and bear, at all times, a faithful testimony against their insinuations."

Respectfully,

N. S.

FOR THE FRIEND.

The accounts of voyagers and travellers who have visited the regions approximating to the north pole, abound with allusions to various beautiful phenomena and novel appearances, peculiar to those high latitudes. The following, derived from "Scoresby's Arctic Regions," appeared to me to combine so much vivid and picturesque description, that I thought it might be acceptable to many of the readers of "The Friend."

DECEPTION OPTICAL.

"Spitzbergen and its islands, with some other countries in the arctic circle, exhibit a kind of scenery which is altogether novel. The principal objects which strike the eye, are innumerable mountainous peaks, ridges, precipices, or needles, rising immediately out of the sea, to an elevation of three or four thousand feet; the colour of which, at a moderate distance, appears to be blackish shades of brown, green, gray, and purple; snow or ice in striz or patches, occupying the various clefts and hollows in the sides of the hills, capping some of the mountainous summits, and filling with extended beds, the most considerable valleys; and ice of the glacier form, occurring at intervals, all along the coast, sometimes in prodigious accumulations. The glistening or vitreous appearance of the iceberg precipices; the purity, whiteness, and beauty, of the sloping expanse, formed by their snowy surfaces; the gloomy shade presented by the adjoining or intermixed mountains and rocks, perpetually covered with "a mourning veil of black lichens," with the sudden transitions into a robe of purest white, where patches or beds of snow occur, present a variety and extent of contrast, altogether peculiar; which, when enlightened by the occasional ethereal brilliancy of the polar sky, and harmonized in its serenity with the calmness of the ocean, constitute a picture both novel and magnificent. There is, indeed, a kind of majesty not to be conveyed in words, in these extraordinary accumulations of snow and ice in the valleys, and in the rocks above rocks, and peaks above peaks, in the mountain groups, seen rising above the ordinary elevation of the clouds, and terminating occasionally in crests of everlasting snow, especially when you approach the shore under shelter of the impenetrable density of a summer fog; in which case, the fog sometimes disperses like the drawing of a curtain, when the strong contrast of light and shade, heightened by a cloudless atmosphere and powerful sun, bursts on the senses, in a brilliant exhibition, resembling the productions of magic.

"To this strong contrast of light and shade, with the great height and steepness of the mountains, is to be attributed a remarkable deception in the apparent distance of the land. Any strangers to the arctic countries, however well acquainted with other regions, and however capable of judging of the distance of land generally, must be completely at a loss in their estimations, when they approach within sight of Spitzbergen. When at the distance of twenty miles, it would be no difficult matter to induce even a judicious stranger to undertake a passage in a boat to the shore, from a belief that he was within a league of the land. At this distance, the portions of rock and patches of snow, as well as the contour of the different hills, are as distinctly marked, as similar objects in many other countries, not having snow about them, would be at a fourth or a fifth part of the same distance. Not, indeed, strangers only, but persons who have often been to Spitzbergen, such as the officers and seamen of the whale ships, have not unfrequently imagined, that their ships could not stand an hour towards the land, without running aground; and yet, perhaps, the ship has sailed three or four hours directly 'in shore,' and still been remote from danger. This is a fact which I have seen realized among my own officers repeatedly. There are circumstances, indeed, when, by a slight change in the density of the atmosphere, a ship, after sailing towards the land for some hours, may appear to be as far off as at first. Thus, in clear weather, the high land of Spitzbergen is perfectly well defined, and every thing on it appearing distinct, when at the distance of forty miles. If, after sailing five hours towards the shore, from this situation, at the rate of four or five knots per hour, the atmosphere should become a little hazy, or even only dark and cloudy, the land might appear to be farther distant than before. Hence, we can account, on a reasonable ground, for a curious circumstance related in a Dutch voyage, undertaken for the recovery of the lost colony of Greenland, by Mogens Heinson. This person, who passed for a renowned seamen in his day, was sent out by Frederick II., king of Denmark. After encountering many difficulties and dangers from storms and ice, he got sight of the east coast of Greenland, and attempted to get to it; but, though the sea was clear of ice, and the wind favourable, and blowing a fresh gale; he, after proceeding several hours, without appearing to get any nearer the land, became alarmed, tacked about, and returned to Denmark. On his arrival, he attributed this extraordinary circumstance, magnified, no doubt, by his fears, to his vessel having been stopped in its course by some loadstone rocks hidden in the sea."

FOR THE FRIEND.

The wide departure from the pure doctrines of the Christian religion, has been cause of great anxiety to the pious, at almost every period since its first promulgation. We often hear lamentations for the inroads that are made upon the orthodox belief of the divinity of Christ our Saviour, by Arians, Socinians, and Unitarians, as though there were danger of the downfall of that Church, against which, it was declared by Truth himself, "that the gates of hell should never prevail." Notwithstanding the exertions, for many years past, of a zeal and perseverance worthy of a better cause, the number of those who have been brought to embrace Socinianism in our country, is comparatively small.

Attempts have been made, at different periods of the Church, to introduce this as the genuine doctrine of Christianity. Every new attempt has been attended with violence; but as they have always proved abortive, we may trust, under Providence, that they always will continue to prove so.

The abettors of this doctrine, at the present time, both those in the Society of Friends, and those that have seceded from it, are confident of success. They profess to have made great advancement. They think they have discovered something new; that Christians have, through all ages, been fettered down by "tradition;" that a belief in the divinity of Christ is traditional; and that the atonement, as taught by the prophets, by Christ and his apostles, and as fully believed in by our early Friends, is absurd and ridiculous, and ought to be rejected in this enlightened age. But if they would read the history of the Society, or call to memory a variety of events within their own recollection, they would find that their boasted discoveries were not so new as they seem to imagine. The same doctrines were espoused with much confidence by many of the Society in Ireland, towards the close of the last century. What was the result? They not only left the Society, but eventually relinquished all those distinctive marks, by which the members of it are recognised. The leader of this party, who pretended to a greater degree of light than his brethren, in the course of a few years, not only denied the influence of the Holy Spirit, but confessed that it was a mere delusion that ever induced him to preach it. About the same time, Hannah Barnard attempted to introduce the same principles among Friends when on a religious visit to Great Britain. When it was discovered by Friends in England that she held Socinian views, they hastened her return home, and soon after her arrival, her monthly meeting testified against her, in consequence of the unsoundness of her doctrines. Friends were, at that time, unitedly opposed to her doctrine; others are now starting up, as if ignorant of all these things, and are making another desperate attempt to engraft Socinianism upon Quakerism. They profess to have discovered new, and very important principles—principles which are to be a great blessing to the Christian church! But as these principles are built on a sandy foundation, they must fall. No doctrine will stand, that is not built on the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone.

To all who place any reliance on scripture testimony, the following proofs of the divinity of Christ must be conclusive.

Isa. viii. 13, 14. "Sanctify the Lord of Hosts himself, and let him be your dread; and he shall be for a sanctuary, but for a stone of stumbling and rock of offence to both houses of Israel."

1 Pet. ii. 7, 8. "The stone which the builders disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner, and a stone of stumbling and rock of offence."

The appellations of stone of stumbling and rock of offence, are given by the prophet to the Lord of Hosts; and the same terms are applied by the apostles to Jesus Christ; therefore Christ is Jehovah, the Lord of Hosts, the one true and living God.

Isa. vi. 5. "Mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts."

John xii. 41. "These things said Esaias, when he saw his (Christ's) glory, and spake of him."

Here again we have the appellation of Lord of Hosts used by Isaiah, and the same prophecy commented upon by John; and applied by Jesus Christ. Therefore the only inference, on the fair principles of reasoning, is that Jesus Christ is the Lord of Hosts.

Isa. xlv. 6. "Thus saith the Lord, the King of Israel, and his Redeemer, the Lord of Hosts, I am the first, and I am the last, and besides me there is no God."

Rev. xii. 13. "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last."

The terms first and last are applied to God; but Jesus applies those very terms to himself, therefore he is God.

Psal. xlv. 6. "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever."

Heb. i. 8. "But unto the Son he saith, thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever."

Here the inference is the same as before, unless the psalmist and apostle are both mistaken.

Isa. vii. 14. "Behold a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel."

Mat. i. 23. "Behold a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel, which, being interpreted, is God with us."

Ezek. xxxiv. 23. "And I will set up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them; even my servant David, and he shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd."

John x. 11. "I am the good shepherd; the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep."

Psal. lxxviii. 56. "They tempted and provoked the most high God."

1 Cor. x. 9. "Neither let us tempt Christ, as some of them also tempted."

I believe no one who has any regard for the authority of Scripture, will deny that the two latter passages allude to the rebellion of the Israelites in the wilderness. Either, therefore, Christ must have been God, or the psalmist and the apostle must have been in error.

Isa. liv. 5. "Thy Maker is thy husband, the Lord of Hosts is his name."

John iii. 29. "He that hath the bride is the bridegroom."

The following passages are quoted without their correspondence, but their application is so evident, that I give them as convincing proofs of the divinity of our blessed Redeemer.

1 John y. 20. In this passage our Saviour is called the true God."

Tit. ii. 13. "The great God." Rom. ix. 5. "Over all, God blessed for ever."

Jer. xxii. 6. In speaking of Christ, the prophet calls him, "the Lord our righteousness."

Isa. ix. 5. "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, and the Prince of Peace; and of the increase of his government there shall be no end."

John. v. 21. "For as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom he will."

Mat. xiv. 23. "Then they that were in the ship came and worshipped him."

Isa. xliii. 11. I am the Lord, and besides me there is no Saviour." The apostles style Jesus Christ "Lord and Saviour."

If he sustained no higher character than a man, would it not be blasphemy to give him such appellations? Would a pious man, who is in possession of his faculties, call his fellow man his Lord and his God? Would he fall down and worship him? and would he to whom such an act of devotion was shown, if he were a good man, and laid claim to no higher character, not reprove one who should manifest such fanaticism? But we find that when worship was performed to Christ, he forbade them not.

When Cornelius fell down and worshipped Peter, he raised him up, and forbade it, saying, "I am but a man." When the inhabitants of Lystra attempted to pay divine honours to

Paul and Barnabas, what course did they pursue? Did they encourage such an act of devotion? or did they not shrink with horror from so impious a thought as that of robbing their divine Master of what they considered peculiarly his due? When the Jews called upon Christ to reprove his disciples and the multitude, because they cried Hosannah to the Son of David before him, and showed the most ardent feelings of reverence, so far from forbidding it, he assured them that "if these should hold their peace, the very stones of the street would cry out."

In the first chapter of John, the "word" is applied both to Christ and to God.

In that last memorable conversation of Christ with his disciples, before his crucifixion, commencing at the 14th chapter of John, and ending with the 16th, Christ and the Father are used several times synonymously. Philip says, "Show us the Father and it sufficeth us." Jesus saith unto him, "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? he that hath seen me, hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, show us the Father?" In one place he says, "I will pray the Father, and he will give you another Comforter." And in another, "If I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you, but if I depart, I will send him unto you."

In the following passages they are also used in reference to our Lord Jesus Christ.

Eph. iv. 32. "Forgiving one another, even as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven you."

Col. iii. 13. "Forgiving one another, even as Christ forgave you."

WILLIAM PENN.

It has not been much the practice in the Society of Friends to eulogize their most eminent characters, farther than a suitable exhibition of their exemplary lives, and devotedness in the cause of religion and virtue, might be subservient to the good of others. But the disposition increasingly prevalent among enlightened men throughout the civilized world, properly to appreciate the claims of William Penn to be placed among the most distinguished benefactors of the human race, cannot be viewed with indifference by the members of that Society. We have, therefore, thought, that in placing upon our pages the following short notice of the monument recently erected to mark the site of his celebrated treaty with the Indians, there would be a propriety in annexing the additional testimony of two of our most distinguished fellow-citizens in his favour.

For many generations, the spot where the grand council of the founder of Pennsylvania and the Indians was held, was designated by a great elm tree; but this stately and ancient landmark, so long an object of respect, was prostrated during a storm, in 1810. The connection of this tree, situated on the west branch of the Delaware, at Shackmaxon, (now Kensington,) with the site of the treaty, has been satisfactorily shown by Roberts Vaux, in his memoir in the Historical Transactions.

To rescue the locality from oblivion, a committee of the Penn Society, by authority of the same, and with the consent of the proprietors of the soil, the heirs of the late Matthew Vandusen, have caused a marble monument to be erected on the spot, bearing the following inscription, viz.

Thomas Jefferson, in a note to P. S. Duponceau, on the subject of the Commemoration of the Landing of William Penn, on the American shore, expresses himself thus:—

"He learns with sincere pleasure, that a day will at length be annually set apart for rendering the honours so justly due to the greatest lawgiver the world has produced; the first, either in ancient or modern times, who has laid the foundation of government in the pure and unadulterated principle of peace, of reason and right; and in parallelism with whose institutions, to name the dreams of a Minos, or Solon, or the military and monkish establishments of a Lycurgus, is truly an abandonment of all regard to the only legitimate object of government, the happiness of man."

James Madison, in a note on the foregoing subject, dated Montpellier, Nov. 12, 1825, says:—

"Pennsylvania may well be proud of such a founder and lawgiver as William Penn, and an obligation be felt by her enlightened citizens, to cherish by commemorations of his exalted philanthropy, and his beneficent institutions, their expanding influence in the cause of civil and religious liberty."

ACCOUNT OF DRINKER.

Edward Drinker was born in a cottage, in 1680, on the spot where the city of Philadelphia now stands, which was inhabited at the time of his birth by Indians, and a few Swedes and Hollanders. He often talked of picking blackberries, and catching wild rabbits, where this populous city is now seated. He remembered William Penn arriving there his second time, and used to point out the spot where the cabin stood in which William Penn and his friends were accommodated on their arrival.

The life of this aged citizen is marked with circumstances which perhaps never befel any other individual. He saw the same spot of earth in the course of his own life, covered with wood and bushes, the receptacle of wild beasts, and birds of prey, afterwards become the seat of a great city, not only the first in wealth and in arts in America, but equalled by few in Europe. He saw great and regular streets where he had often pursued hares and wild rabbits; he saw fine houses raised upon morasses, where he used to hear nothing but the croaking of frogs; great wharves and warehouses where he had so often seen the Indian savages draw their fish from the river; and that river afterwards full of great ships from all parts of the world, which, in his youth, had nothing bigger than an Indian canoe; and on the spot where he had gathered berries, he saw their city-hall erected, and that hall filled with legislators, astonishing the world with their wisdom and virtue. He also saw the first treaty ratified between the united powers of America, and the most powerful prince of Europe, with all the formality of parchment and seals, and on the same spot where he before saw William Penn ratify his first and last treaty with the Indians. And to conclude, he saw the beginning and end of the British empire in America. He died on the 17th of November, 1782, aged 103 years.

Natural History.—Remarkable Fact.—A party of gentlemen from Bombay, one day visiting the stupendous cavern of Elephant, discovered a tiger's whelp, in one of the obscure recesses of the edifice. Desirous of kidnapping the cub, without encountering the fury of its dam, they took it up hastily and cautiously, and retreated. Being left entirely at liberty, and extremely well fed, the tiger grew rapidly, appeared tame and fondling as a dog, and in every respect entirely domesticated. At length, when it had attained a vast size, and, notwithstanding its apparent gentleness, it began to inspire terror by its tremendous power of doing mischief, a piece of raw meat, dripping with blood, fell in its way. It is to be observed, that, up to that moment, it had been studiously kept from raw animal food. The instant, however, it had dipped its tongue in blood, something like madness seemed to have seized upon the animal; a destructive principle, hitherto dormant, was awakened; it darted fiercely, and with glaring eyes, upon its prey, tore it with fury to pieces, and, growling and roaring in the most fearful manner, rushed off towards the jungles.

FOR THE FRIEND. THE ALBIGENSES.

The extent of our obligations to the great German reformer, cannot, perhaps, be easily overrated; yet, it were doing injustice to a numerous and persecuted people, to ascribe to him the praise of having first successfully inculcated protestant doctrines in opposition to the errors of the Roman Church. At least three centuries before the birth of Luther, these doctrines were openly professed in the valleys of Languedoc and of Piedmont, and on the plains of Bohemia. The simplicity of their lives, and their constancy under suffering, are, of themselves, sufficient to fix our attention on these early asserters of a purer faith; but a more tragical interest is given to their history, by the fate which the profession of that faith drew upon them.

The different names of Albigenes in France, of Vaudois or Valdenses in Piedmont, and perhaps of Paterini or Cathari* in Italy, seem to have designated sects having a common origin, who, rejecting the authority of the Roman see, held the same tenets, and were equally the objects of persecution and calumny. The period from which we are to date the promulgation of their doctrines in Europe is not now easy to determine. While, according to some, they were founded by a native of Lyons in the twelfth century, others please themselves by referring their origin to the early ages of Christianity, or to the preaching of the apostle Paul himself. The opinion of Mosheim, however, which is confirmed by the more recent researches of the distinguished Muller, may, perhaps, be received as the most plausible. According to these writers, the persecution of the Paulicians, an obscure Christian sect, by the eastern emperors, in the ninth century, opened the way for the introduction of the reformation into Europe. Forced to seek refuge in Bulgaria, or under the more tolerant caliphs in Syria and Armenia, these people engaged extensively in commerce, and thus diffused a knowledge of their principles along the valley of the Danube, and ultimately into Bohemia on the one hand, and throughout France and Spain on the other. Their faith, once established in Languedoc, made many proselytes from the extremities of Catalonia to those of Lombardy, and in the latter country, under the protection of the free cities, jealous of any encroachment on their privileges by the holy see, they were suffered to remain for a time unmolested. Obscure in their origin, and unobtrusive in their habits, they do not seem to have attracted the notice of the church until towards the close of the twelfth century, and even then their opponents confined themselves to misrepresentations of their doctrines, or to accusations of gross immorality. So confidently indeed have the former been repeated, that even protestants have hesitated to acknowledge them as believers; and it was not until Luther and his friends had communicated with the survivors of these persecuted sects, that they could divest themselves of the prejudices thus acquired. Having read their confession of faith, however, they could no longer doubt, and one of the Swiss reformers thus expresses the cordiality with which he received them as fellow Christians: "We yield humble and hearty thanks to our merciful Father, who hath called you to so great a light in this age, even in the midst of that deep darkness which is spread throughout the whole world, and the unlimited power of antichrist." "The father of our Lord Jesus Christ," adds this truly apostolic writer, "hath blessed you with a spiritual benediction, so that if you persist in his grace, he has in store greater treasures for you wherewith he will enrich you withall, and make you perfect, that you may grow to the full measure of the inheritance of Christ." Such was the testimony which was borne by the early protestants to the purity of that faith which had been handed down, from father to son, through every extremity of persecution, and in conformity with such a faith, were the lives of these simple and devoted people. It is, indeed, a singular and interesting fact, that the very agents of their enemies, who had been sent among them to obtain matter of calumny, were compelled to bear the strongest evidence to the purity of their lives. "As touching their life and manners," says a catholic opponent, "they have always been sound and unimpeachable, without reproach or scandal amongst men, giving themselves, to their power, to the observation of the commandments of God." In the beginning of the 13th century, pope Innocent III., alarmed at the progress of the heresy of the Albigenes, invited the aid of two fellow labourers in the great work of their extermination. To St. Francis, a native of Italy, was assigned the task of converting the unbelievers by the force of persuasion and example; to St. Dominick, a Spaniard, the less pleasing employment of pursuing them with fire and sword. While scripture and reason were on one side, and power on the other, it could not long be doubtful which of the two would prove the most useful coadjutor of the pope.

Decorated with the title of inquisitor, although not as yet clothed with all the powers which were shortly after assigned to that terrible office, Dominick commenced preaching a crusade against the unfortunate Albigenes in the year 1206. It was then, for the first time, that Christians were called upon by their nominal head, to make common cause in a war against their fellow believers; and to this unnatural conflict they were urged by the promise of all the indulgences which had heretofore rewarded their victories over the infidels in the Holy Land. The Albigenes, who then numbered among themselves several of the nobles, and a large proportion of the population of Languedoc, were protected for a time by the count de Toulouse, but, unable to oppose adequate resistance to the hordes of banditti, who, stimulated by the promise of the rich lands of the victims, poured in upon that unhappy country; he made his submission to the church, and they were left to their fate. For a time they successfully defended themselves against the army of the cross, as these freebooters were profanely termed; but, at length, towns and castles yielded one after another, to the numbers of their invaders, and Languedoc became the scene of cruelties, the details of which are related with triumph by cotemporary writers, but passed over in silence, or alluded to with disgust, by later historians. When the city of Beziers, after a long resistance, had at length surrendered to the invading army, some of the leaders inquired how they should distinguish the heretics from the catholics in the impending massacre. "Let them perish," said a monk, "the Lord will know those that are his," and the slaughter was universal. Upwards of sixty thousand persons are said to have been killed on this occasion, and when the army of the cross retired, not a house was left standing—not an individual alive. But we will no longer dwell upon these dreadful scenes; and, if we have adverted to them, it has been with a view, the more clearly to indicate the constancy of a people, who, in the midst of such horrors, could not be induced to forsake the faith of their fathers. It is related of St. Dominick, that in the prosecution of his design of extirpating the heretics of Languedoc, he traversed fearlessly and without a guard, the territory which he had stained with the blood of so many of its innocent inhabitants, and that falling into the hands of the Albigenes, the latter, astonished at his boldness, and unwilling to become the executioners of their terrible, but defenceless enemy, permitted him to continue his journey without molestation. Such were the people upon whom a profligate and ambitious chief had let loose an army of robbers, collected from the galleys and jails of Europe. Left to meet the shock unaided, and assailed by an enemy whose numbers seemed to have no limits, the unhappy Albigenses were driven from one fastness to another, chief after chief was slain in battle, or met a more dreadful death at the hands of the executioner, yet the little band of fugitives steadily refused to make any compromise of their faith. One by one they fell into the hands of their enemies—the whole race was exterminated; and for three centuries, not a voice was heard among the beautiful valleys of Languedoc to testify to that faith, for which they had suffered unto death. Such is the brief and very imperfect sketch of the earliest martyrs to the protestant faith. We propose, on another occasion, to trace as briefly the history of their brethren the Waldenses. P. Q.

AGRICULTURAL ENTERPRISE.

If a correct inference may be drawn from the effect upon our own minds, the article below will be read with a peculiar relish. It exemplifies, in a striking manner, the vast amount of good which may be accomplished by the resolute and judicious application of a vigorous intellect, to useful and practical purposes; and it ought to operate as an encouragement and incitement to others. The gratification will be enhanced, to most of our readers, from the circumstance that the individual who achieved this astonishing transformation of an unproductive "wilderness into a fruitful field," was a descendant of Robert Barclay, the Apologist, and that the Ury here mentioned, was the place of that illustrious man's nativity, and his residence during the greater part of his life.

The Barclay family has produced several individuals, eminent in different departments, and might furnish materials for an interesting memoir, which we should be pleased that some one of our gifted contributors would prepare for our columns.

An article in the Quarterly Review, for October, 1827, on "Agriculture and Rent," contains the following, as one of several specimens to show that the prosperity and wealth of the British empire do not, exclusively or principally, originate in its manufacturing and commercial industry.

"In a district where a host of eager imitators and rivals have subsequently raised themselves to distinction as cultivators, no man deserves more honourable mention than the late Mr. Barclay, of Ury, in Kincardineshire. Naturally gifted with a frame of body unusually powerful and athletic, and with a mind ardent, vigorous, and comprehensive, he applied his great energies to the pursuits of agriculture, with a degree of perseverance and success which had been seldom equalled—never surpassed. In the year 1760, he succeeded his father in the estate of Ury, which lies on both sides of the water of Cowie. At that time there was, except a few old trees around the mansion house, scarcely a single shrub of any value on the whole property. The Cowie, running about three miles through the lands of Ury, had, in the lapse of ages, worn for itself a deep channel.—Through the whole extent of this course, springs of water from the circumjacent grounds were continually oozing to the banks, where they formed marshes and quagmires; which, from time to time, bursting, were precipitated by land slips into the river. Thus, every year, the river made encroachments upon the overhanging banks, from which pieces periodically slipped into the stream, to be washed away and swept into the sea. These banks, in their natural state, merely produced a few alders of little value, and some coarse aquatic plants, useless, even had they been accessible, as food for cattle. The banks of this river, throughout the whole length of the property, shelve towards the stream in a way that renders them much too steep for tillage. They extend in some places thirty, in others one hundred yards from the edge of the stream to the top of the declivity; on a mean average taken at the base, both sides are found to extend about one hundred yards in breadth, which being multiplied by the length of the channel, (three miles,) form a hollow dell, containing fully one hundred acres. Soon after his succession, Mr. Barclay undertook to improve a tract, which, since the beginning of time, had been thus unprofitable to the owners, and useless to the public. He drained the swamps of the banks, and planted the whole with deciduous trees, with oak, ash, and elm. These are abundantly sheltered by the natural warmth of the hollows, which is rendered still more mild from its various windings, occasioning one part to be continually protected, under the cover of another, from whatever quarter the wind may blow. Nothing can now exceed the prosperous state of this beautiful plantation. Many of the trees are already fifteen or twenty inches in diameter, and from thirty to forty feet in height below the branches. The whole, amounting, perhaps, to 400,000 trees, thrive exceedingly; and there is every rational prospect that 100,000 at least, will arrive at complete maturity. The ultimate value must be very great. In less than thirty years hence, the timber on this tract of 100 acres, originally barren and unproductive, will probably be worth more than the whole of the arable part of the Ury estate. Nor must it be forgotten that in addition to the direct profit which the owner will, in the end, derive from this plantation, it forms an effectual barrier for his lands, against the formerly continual and most destructive ravages of the Cowie. The arable land had been divided into a number of small farms; each tenant having a right of pasturage on the contiguous hills. The tillage was very superficially performed, with imperfect implements. Almost every field was encumbered with obstructions of one kind or other; such as pools of stagnant water, quagmires, where the cattle were continually in danger of losing their lives; but, above all, stones, which abounded, not merely on the surface, but through the whole depth of the soil. There were no enclosures. No lime was used as a manure. The only crops grown were bear and oats. There was no cart, nor wheel carriage of any kind; nor was there a road, upon which, had they existed, they could have been used. No spot could have been pointed out, abounding more in the evils and inconveniences of the ancient system of tillage, or enjoying fewer of the advantages of modern husbandry, than the lands of Ury. On succeeding to this estate, Mr. Barclay, who had acquired correct ideas of husbandry on the well cultivated plains of Norfolk, set about its improvement, with a spirit determined to overcome every obstacle. For this purpose, in addition to the lands already in the occupation of the family, he took into his own management all the farms in the vicinity of the mansion, as the leases expired. The estate of Ury consists of about 1900 acres, 1000 of which he planted with timber, the value of which is now estimated at £100,000. The whole of what was originally in tillage, never exceeded 450 acres; this portion he rendered infinitely more productive, by an improved system of husbandry; and by enclosing, draining, removing stones, and filling ponds, he reclaimed the remaining 450 acres from a state of barrenness and waste, and rendered them in a high degree fertile and productive. And the result of these efforts appears to be, that an estate which, when this gentleman succeeded to it, would not have let for more than £200, is now estimated at £1800 per annum, independently of the value of its woods and plantations."

In the same article it is estimated that the quantity of land enclosed in the several reigns, is as follows:

In the reign of Queen Anne, -	1,438 acres.
George I. -	17,660
George II. -	318,776
George III. -	5,686,400
George IV. (up to 1827) -	360,800
	6,325,076

The writer goes on to say, "it will thus appear, that, since the commencement of the last century, upwards of six millions of acres of land have been enclosed, and brought into a state of tillage, and that no less than eleven parts in twelve were enclosed in one reign; that of George III., the steady and constant patron of agriculture. If we suppose that one-third of this quantity was already under some sort of tillage, as common land, still the waste surface reclaimed will amount to four millions of acres; this has added about one-seventh to the quantity of land previously cultivated in South Britain, and no less than one hundred and sixty millions to the capital employed in agriculture.

An addition, equivalent to eight millions of quarters of wheat, has thus been made to the agricultural produce of the country, and of a million and a half of persons to its population, supported entirely by the produce of land previously existing in a state of unproductive waste.

Notwithstanding these praiseworthy exertions, it is estimated that England alone still contains about six millions of acres of waste land, yielding but little produce; and that, including Scotland and Ireland, the quantity of waste land in this kingdom cannot fall short of thirty millions of acres. Upwards of two hundred years have now elapsed since the British government has almost exclusively directed its attention to the cultivation of its foreign possessions, leaving the improvement of its territory at home to the exertions of individuals. It is not too much to say, that this country has expended upon the cultivation of its foreign colonies a sum which does not fall short of fifty millions; and upon wars arising from its connexion with those colonies, no less than two hundred millions. If a moiety of this sum had been expended upon our own territory, no rational man can doubt that extensive tracts of land, which are now waste, would have been reclaimed, and that an incalculable addition would have been made to the produce and population of the country. 'Industry,' says Hart, in his admirable essay, 'is the visatrix of husbandry;' and an ancient English writer well observes, that a 'single uncultivated acre is a really physical evil in any state.' THE ENGLISH CLASSIC, No. 3.

The beauty and instructiveness of the essay which we have selected for this week's entertainment, will compensate for its length. It is from the pen of one of the finest female writers of her nation and age, and contains maxims and observations, the wisdom of which will approve them to every parental bosom. Its temper and philosophy are at direct variance with the dogmas of a certain school, which includes in its denunciation against what it calls "tradition," the most salutary of those prejudices by which a kind Providence has designed to supply to the tottering intellect of childhood, the instincts with which he has so marvelously gifted the inferior animals.

ON PREJUDICE.—By Anna Letitia Barbauld.

No subject has been more canvassed than education. With regard to that important object there is a maxim avowed by many sensible people, which seems to me to deserve particular investigation. "Give your child," it is said, "no prejudices: let reason be the only foundation of his opinions; where he cannot reason let him suspend his belief. Let your great care be, that as he grows up he has nothing to unlearn; and never make use of authority in matters of opinion, for authority is no test of truth." The maxim sounds well, and flatters perhaps the secret pride of man, in supposing him more the creature of reason than he really is; but, I suspect, on examination, we shall find it exceedingly fallacious. We must first consider what a prejudice is. A prejudice is a sentiment in favour or disfavour of any person, practice, or opinion, previous to and independent of examining their merits by reason and investigation. Prejudice is prejudging; that is, judging previously to evidence. It is therefore sufficiently apparent, that no philosophical belief can be founded on mere prejudices; because it is the business of philosophy to go deep into the nature and properties of things; nor can it be allowable for those to indulge prejudice who aspire to lead the public opinion; those to whom the high office is appointed of sifting truth from error, of canvassing the claims of different systems, of exploding old and introducing new tenets. These must investigate, with a kind of audacious boldness, every subject that comes before them; these neither impressed with awe for all that mankind have been taught to reverence, nor swayed by affection for whatever the sympathies of our nature incline us to love, must hold the balance with a severe and steady hand, while they are weighing the doubtful scale of probabilities; and with a stoical apathy of mind, yield their assent to nothing but a preponderance of evidence. But is this an office for a child? Is it an office for more than one or two men in a century? And is it desirable that a child should grow up without opinions to regulate his conduct, till he is able to form them fairly by the exercise of his own abilities? Such an exercise requires at least the sober period of matured reason: reason not only sharpened by argumentative discussion, but informed by experience. The most sprightly child can only possess the former: for let it be remembered, that though the reasoning powers put forth pretty early in life, the faculty of using them to effect does not come till much later. The first efforts of a child in reasoning resemble those quick and desultory motions by which he gains the play of his limbs: they show agility and grace, they are pleasing to look at, and necessary for the gradual acquirement of bodily powers; but his joints must be knit into more firmness, and his movements regulated with more precision, before he is capable of useful labour and manly exertion. A reasoning child is not yet a reasonable being. There is great propriety in the legal phraseology which expresses maturity, not by having arrived at the possession of reason, but of that power, the late result of information, thought, and experience—discretion; which alone teaches, with regard to reason, its powers, its limits, and its use. This the child of the most sprightly parts cannot have; and therefore his attempts at reasoning, whatever acuteness they may show, and how much soever they may please a parent with the early promise of future excellence, are of no account whatever in the sober search after truth. Besides, taking it for granted (which however is utterly impossible) that a youth could be brought up to the age of fifteen or sixteen without prejudice in favour of any opinions whatever, and that he is then set to examining for himself some important proposition—how is he to set about it? Who is to recommend books to him? Who is to give him the previous information necessary to comprehend the question? Who is to tell him whether or no it is important? Whoever does these, will infallibly lay a bias upon his mind according to the ideas he himself has received upon the subject. But it is in truth the most absurd of all suppositions, that a human being can be educated, or even nourished and brought up, without imbibing numberless prejudices from every thing which passes around him. A child cannot learn the signification of words without receiving ideas along with them; he cannot be impressed with affection to his parents and those about him, without conceiving a predilection for their tastes, opinions, and practices. He forms numberless associations of pain or pleasure, and every association begets a prejudice; he sees objects from a particular spot, and his views of things are contracted or extended according to his position in society: as no two individuals can have the same horizon, so neither can any two have the same associations; and different associations will produce different opinions, as necessarily as, by the law of perspective, different distances will produce different appearances of visible objects. Let us confess a truth, humiliating perhaps to human pride;—a very small part only of the opinions of the wisest philosopher are the results of fair reasoning; the rest are formed by his education, his temperament, by the age in which he lives, by trains of thought directed to a particular track through some accidental association—in short, by prejudice. But why, after all, should we wish to bring up children without prejudices? A child has occasion to act, long before he can reason. Shall we leave him destitute of all the principles that should regulate his conduct, till he can discover them by the strength of his own genius? If it were possible that one whole generation could be brought up without prejudices, the world must return to the infancy of knowledge, and all the beautiful fabric which has been built up by successive generations, must be begun again from the very foundation. Your child has a claim to the advantage of your experience, which it would be cruel and unjust to deprive him of. Will any father say to his son, "My dear child, you are entering upon a world full of intricate and perplexed paths, in which many miss their way, to their final misery and ruin. Amidst many false systems, and much vain science, there is also some true knowledge; there is a right path; I believe I know it, for I have the advantage of years and experience, but I will instill no prejudices into your mind; I shall therefore leave you to find it out as you can; whether your abilities are great or small, you must take the chance of them. There are various systems in morals; I have examined and found some of a good, others of a bad tendency. There is such a thing as religion: many people think it the most important concern of life; perhaps I am one of them; perhaps I have chosen from amidst the various systems of belief—many of which are extremely absurd and some even pernicious, that which I cherish as the guide of my life, my comfort in all my sorrows, and the foundation of my dearest hopes: but far be it from me to influence you in any manner to receive it: when you are grown up, you must read all the books upon these subjects which you can lay your hands on, for neither in the choice of these would I presume to prejudice your minds; converse with all who pretend to any opinions upon the subject; and whatever happens to be the result, you must abide by it. In the mean time, concerning these important objects, you must keep your mind in a perfect equilibrium. It is true you want these principles more now than you can do at any other period of your life; but I had rather you never had them at all, than that you should not come fairly by them." Should we commend the wisdom or the kindness of such a parent? The parent will perhaps plead in his behalf, that it is by no means his intention to leave the mind of his child in the uncultivated state I have supposed. As soon as his understanding begins to open, he means to discuss with him those propositions on which he wishes to form an opinion. He will make him read the best books on the subject, and by free conversation and explaining the arguments on both sides, he does not doubt but the youth will soon be enabled to judge satisfactorily for himself. I have no objection to make against this mode of proceeding: as a mode of instruction, it is certainly a very good one; but he must know little of human nature, who thinks that after this process the youth will be really in a capacity of judging for himself, or that he is less under the dominion of prejudice than if he had received the same truths from the mere authority of his parent; for most assuredly the arguments on either side will not have been set before him with equal strength or with equal warmth. The persuasive tone, the glowing language, the triumphant retort, will all be reserved for the side on which the parent has formed his own conclusions. It cannot be otherwise; he cannot be convinced himself of what he thinks a truth, without wishing to convey that conviction, nor without thinking all that can be urged on the other side, weak and futile. He cannot in a matter of importance neutralize his feelings: perfect impartiality can be the result only of indifference.

In teaching first by prejudice that which is afterwards to be proved, we do but follow Nature. Instincts are prejudices she gives us: we follow them implicitly, and they lead us right: but it is not till long afterwards that reason comes and justifies them. Why should we scruple to lead a child to right opinions in the same way by which Nature leads him to right practices?

Still it will be urged that man is a rational being, and therefore reason is the only true ground of belief, and authority is not reason. This point requires a little discussion. That he who receives a truth upon authority has not a reasonable belief, is in one sense true, since he has not drawn it from the result of his own inquiries; but in another it is certainly false, since the authority itself may be to him the best of all reasons for believing it. There are few men who, from the exercise of the best powers of their minds, could derive so good a reason for believing a mathematical truth, as the authority of Sir Isaac Newton. There are two principles deeply implanted in the mind of man, without which he could never attain knowledge—curiosity, and credulity; the former to lead him to make discoveries himself, the latter to dispose him to receive knowledge from others. The credulity of a child to those who cherish him, is in early life unbounded. This is one of the most useful instincts he has, and is in fact a precious advantage put into the hands of the parent for storing his mind with ideas of all kinds. Without this principle of assent he could never gain even the rudiments of knowledge. He receives it, it is true, in the shape of prejudice; but the prejudice itself is founded upon sound reasoning, and conclusive though imperfect experiment. He finds himself weak, helpless and ignorant; he sees in his parent a being of knowledge and powers more than his utmost capacity can fathom; almost a god to him. He has often done him good, therefore he believes he loves him: he finds him capable of giving him information upon all the subjects he has applied to him about; his knowledge seems unbounded, and his information has led him right whenever he has had occasion to try it by actual experiment; the child does not draw out his little reasonings into a logical form, but this is to him a ground of belief, that his parent knows every thing, and is infallible. Though the proposition is not exactly true, it is sufficiently so for him to act upon: and when he believes in his parent with implicit faith, he believes upon grounds as truly rational as when in after life, he follows the deductions of his own reason.

But you will say, I wish my son may have nothing to unlearn, and therefore I would have him wait to form an opinion till he is able to do it on solid grounds. And why do you suppose he will have less to unlearn if he follows his own reason, than if he followed yours? If he thinks, if he inquires, he will no doubt have a great deal to unlearn, which ever course you take with him; but it is better to have some things to unlearn, than to have nothing learnt. Do you hold your own opinions so loosely, so hesitatingly, as not to think them safer to abide by, than the first results of his stammering reason? Are there no truths to learn so indubitable as to be without fear of their not approving themselves to his mature and well-directed judgment? Are there none you esteem so useful, as to feel anxious that he be put in possession of them? We are solicitous not only to put our children in a capacity of acquiring their daily bread, but to bequeath to them riches which they may receive as an inheritance. Have you no mental wealth you wish to transmit, no stock of ideas he may begin with, instead of drawing them all from the labour of his own brain? If, moreover, your son should not adopt your prejudices, he will certainly adopt those of other people; or, if on subjects of high interest he could be kept totally indifferent, the consequence would be, that he would conceive either that such matters were not worth the trouble of inquiry, or that nothing satisfactory was to be learnt about them: for there are negative prejudices as well as positive.

Let parents, therefore, not scruple to use the power God and Nature have put into their hands for the advantage of their offspring. Let them not fear to impress them with prejudices for whatever is fair and honourable in action—whatever is useful and important in systematic truth. Let such prejudices be wrought into the very texture of the soul. Such truths let them appear to know by intuition. Let the child never remember the period when he did not know them. Instead of sending him to that cold and hesitating belief which is founded on the painful and uncertain consequences of late investigation, let his conviction of all the truths you deem important be mixed up with every warm affection of his nature, and identified with his most cherished recollections—the time will come soon enough when his confidence in you will have received a check. The growth of his own reason and the development of his powers will lead him with a sudden impetus to examine every thing, to canvass every thing, to suspect every thing. If he finds, as he certainly will find, the results of his reasoning different in some respects from those you have given him, far from being now disposed to receive your assertions as proofs, he will rather feel disinclined to any opinion you profess, and struggle to free himself from the net you have woven about him.

The calm repose of his mind is broken, the placid lake is become turbid, and reflects distorted and broken images of things; but be not you alarmed at the new workings of his thoughts—it is the angel of reason which descends and troubles the waters. To endeavour to influence by authority, it would be as useless now as it was salutary before. Lie by in silence, and wait the result. Do not expect the mind of your son is to resemble yours, as your figure is reflected by the image in the glass; he was formed, like you, to use his own judgment, and he claims the high privilege of his nature. His reason is mature, his mind must now form itself. Happy must you esteem yourself, if amidst all lesser differences of opinion, and the wreck of many of your favourite ideas, he still preserves those radical and primary truths which are essential to his happiness, and which different trains of thought and opposite modes of investigation will very often equally lead to.

In fine, I cannot help concluding, that to reject the influence of prejudice in education, is itself one of the most unreasonable of prejudices.

Notices and Anecdotes of the African Lion.

BY PRINGLE.

Two varieties of the lion are found in Southern Africa, namely, the yellow and the brown; or, as Dutch colonists oftener term them, the blue or black lion. The dark coloured species is commonly esteemed the strongest and fiercest. I doubt, however, whether there is any real specific distinction, although some lion hunters enumerate no less than four varieties; for the mere difference in size and colour may be either altogether accidental, or the consequence of a variation of food and climate in different districts.

The lions in the Bushmen's country, beyond the limits of the colony, are accounted peculiarly fierce and dangerous. This is undoubtedly owing to their unacquaintance with civilized man, the possessor of the formidable roer or rifle, and still more perhaps to their instinctive awe of mankind having been extinguished by successful rencontres with the poor natives. It is said, that when a lion has once tasted human flesh, he thenceforth entirely loses his natural awe of human superiority; and it is asserted, that when he has once succeeded in snatching some unhappy wretch from a Bushman kraal, he never fails to return regularly every night in search of another meal; and often harasses them so dreadfully, as to force the horde to desert their station.

The prodigious strength of this animal does not appear to have been overrated. It is certain, that he can drag the heaviest ox, with ease, a considerable way; and a horse, heifer, hartebeest, or lesser prey, he finds no difficulty in throwing over his shoulder, and carrying off to any distance he may find convenient. I have myself witnessed an instance of a very young lion carrying a horse about a mile from the spot where he had killed it; and a more extraordinary case, which occurred in the Sneenburg, had been mentioned to me on good authority, where a lion, having carried off a heifer of two years old, was followed on the track, for fully five hours, by a party on horseback, and, throughout the whole distance, the carcass of the heifer was only once or twice discovered to have touched the ground.* Many examples, not less remarkable, might easily be added, which would fully prove the lion to be by far the strongest and most active animal, in proportion to its size, that is known to exist.

The lion springs from nine to twelve yards at a single leap, and for a brief space, can repeat these bounds with such activity and speed, as to outstrip the swiftest horse in a short space; but he cannot hold out at this rate in a long pursuit, and seldom attempts it. The monarch of the forest is, in fact, merely a gigantic cat; and he must live by using the arts of a cat. He would have but a poor chance with the antelope, were he always magnanimously to begin a roaring whenever a herd approached his lair. He knows his business better, and generally couches among the rank grass or reeds that grow around the pools and fountains, or in the narrow ranges through which the larger game descend to drink at the rivers; and in such places one may most commonly find the horns and bones of the animals which have been thus surprised and devoured by him.

Even in such places, it is said, he will generally retreat before the awe-inspiring presence of man; but not precipitately, nor without first calmly surveying his dimensions, and apparently measuring his prowess. He appears to have the impression, that man is not his natural prey; and though he does not always give place to him, he will yet in almost every case abstain from attacking him, if he observes in his deportment neither terror nor hostility. But this instinctive deference is not to be counted upon under other circumstances, nor even under such as are now described, with entire security. If he is hungry, or angry, or if he is watching the game he has killed, or is otherwise perturbed by rage or jealousy, it is no jest to encounter him. If he assumes a hostile aspect, the traveller must elevate his gun and take aim at the animal's forehead, before he comes up close and couches to take his spring; for in that position, though he may possibly give way to firmness and self-possession, he will tolerate no offensive movement, and will anticipate, by an instant and overwhelming bound, any attempt thus to take aim at him. These observations are advanced on the uniform testimony of many of the back country boors and Hottentots, with whom I have often conversed on these subjects.

My friend, Diederik Muller, one of the most intrepid and successful lion hunters in South Africa, mentioned to me the following incident, in illustration of the foregoing remarks. He had been out alone hunting in the wilds, when he came suddenly upon a lion, which, instead of giving way, seemed disposed, from the angry attitude he assumed, to dispute with him

* Sparrman relates the following among other instances of the lion's strength:—A lion was once seen at the Cape to take a heifer in his mouth, and though the legs of the latter dragged on the ground, yet he seemed to carry her off with the same ease as a cat does a rat. He likewise leaped over a broad dike with her without the least difficulty."

the dominion of the desert. Diederik instantly alighted, and confident of his unerring aim, levelled his mighty roer at the forehead of the lion, who was couched in the act to spring, within fifteen paces of him; but at the moment the hunter fired, his horse, whose bridle was round his arm, started back and caused him to miss. The lion bounded forward, but stopped within a few paces, confronting Diederik, who stood defenceless, his gun discharged, and his horse running off. The man and the beast stood looking each other in the face for a short space. At length the lion moved backward, as if to go away. Diederik began to load his gun; the lion looked over his shoulder, growled, and returned. Diederik stood still. The lion again moved cautiously off, and the boor proceeded to load and ram down his bullet—the lion again looked back and growled angrily; and this occurred repeatedly, until the animal had got off to some distance, when he took fairly to his heels and bounded away.

STANZAS.

When I look round, and see the love, the care
Of boundless goodness fill the smiling land—
Existence spread through ocean, earth, and air,
And beauty lavish'd with exhaustless hand,
Can I pass on "with brute unconscious gaze?"
Nor with one falt'ring accent whisper praise?

From those bright orbs which through the realms of space
Pursue majestic their unvarying way—
Down through creation, far as man may trace
Of Power Almighty, the sublime display;
All that we see and feel, combine to prove
That power is govern'd by unbounded love.

What vivid hues the floral tribes adorn!
What fragrance floats upon the gales of even!
What floods of radiance gild the unfolding morn!
And dazzling splendour gems the midnight heaven!
What glorious scenes on every hand impart
A glow of transport to the untainted heart!

How sweet, tho' transient, man! thy transience here,
If peace around thee spread her cheering rays,
If conscience whispers in thy trembling ear
No tale unpleasing of departed days;
Then smile exulting at the lapse of time
Which wafts thee gently to a happier clime.

Saw'st thou the worm his humble path pursue,
To varied dangers, doubts, and fears a prey?
Joy in his cup some sweet ingredients threw,
But darkness snatched him from the treat away.
The poor chrysalis in his lonely grave
Seem'd sinking hopeless in oblivion's wave.

But, lo! what magic bursts the dreary tomb!
What voice angelic bids the sleeper rise!
He wakes, array'd in beauty's living bloom,
His new born plumage ting'd with rainbow dyes;
In air gay floating, while the sunbeam flings
A blaze of splendour o'er his glossy wings.

Thy emblem this! for death must quickly hide
This fair creation from thy raptur'd eye;
Thy fragile form, to the poor worm allied,
Cold and unconscious in the grave must lie.
But can the shackles of the tomb control
This active spirit, this aspiring soul?

No! there are worlds in bloom immortal drest,
Where love divine in full effulgence glows,
Where, safely center'd in eternal rest,
Departed spirits of the good repose—
With powers enlarg'd their Maker's works explore,
And find, through endless years, new cause to wonder and adore.

FOR THE FRIEND.

A NEAR OBSERVER, No. 4.

In my second number, I have stated the opinions of William Penn on the very serious points of doctrine, the divinity of our Saviour and the Trinity, and shall now proceed with the subject.

In consequence of some misrepresentations respecting the doctrines of the Society, George Fox, in conjunction with some other Friends, presented an address to the governor, council, and assembly of Barbadoes, complaining of the slanderous stories which had been told respecting them, and explicitly declaring their belief in the miraculous birth and Godhead of Jesus Christ; and that the Holy Scriptures were given forth by the Spirit of God through holy men, who spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

And Robert Barclay, in his Apology, after stating various arguments in favour of his proposition, "That there is no knowledge of the Father, but by the Son," comes to his conclusion in the following words: "Hence he is fitly called the Mediator betwixt God and man; for, having been with God from all eternity, bring himself God, and also in time partaking of the nature of man, through him is the goodness and love of God conveyed to mankind, and by him again man receiveth and partaketh of these mercies."

The testimonies of many other Friends can be adduced equally strong and explicit, but this will be unnecessary, as there is one transaction on record so conclusive, that, were it unsupported by any of them, must satisfy every candid inquirer.

For a very long period, the dissenters from the church of England were subjected to many grievous oppressions, and the Society of Friends, from the peculiarity of some of their opinions, and the boldness with which they bore their testimony to them, were, in a greater degree than any other sect, exposed to the various penalties of the existing laws. But in the year 1688, on the expulsion of James the Second from the British throne, and the accession of William the Third, a favourable change took place. William was well known to be averse to religious persecution, and the great body of dissenters applied to parliament in the first year of his reign for relief. A bill was accordingly brought in for that purpose, and after strenuous opposition became a law.

Upon the introduction of the bill, the Society of Friends were induced to believe, that their enemies would endeavour to introduce some clause, which would, in its effect, deprive them of the benefit of the law, and a committee, consisting of George Whitehead, William Mead, and several others, was formed, to watch the progress of the bill, and endeavour to obtain its passage, in such terms as would enable the Society to avail themselves of it.

It appears that their apprehensions were well founded; they objected to the test which was proposed, and being called in and examined by the house, their reasons appeared so satisfactory, that Sir Thomas Clarges, who was a leading member, requested them to give him, in writing, such a test as they were willing to subscribe as their confession of faith, which they did, and it was inserted in the bill in the very words proposed by them, and is as follows, viz. "I profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ, his eternal Son, the true God, and in the holy Spirit, one God, blessed for ever; and do acknowledge the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, to be given by divine inspiration."*

Now, when we recollect, that by the express provisions of this act, no persons denying the Trinity were to have the benefit of it,† and that the object which parliament had in view when the committee of Friends were examined at the bar of the House of Commons, was solely to ascertain the doctrines of the Society with respect to it, and to their belief in the Scriptures; and when we consider the characters engaged in the examination of them, men of the first talents in the nation, and lawyers habituated to sifting testimony, and all of them zealous Trinitarians, and that all were completely satisfied, no reasonable being can doubt that the committee must have given the most explicit and unqualified testimony of the belief of the Society; and that they told with the honesty becoming their situation as witnesses, the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

And it ought also to be recollected that, by this act, every sect of dissenters from the church of England, were required to take out warrants for the houses they met in for worship, and to subscribe to their belief in the Trinity and the Holy Scriptures, and to their allegiance upon oath, the Society of Friends only excepted, who were to subscribe to their confession of faith in the Trinity and the Holy Scriptures, in the manner above stated, and to their allegiance on a solemn affirmation; and any justice of the peace was authorized to require any dissenters from the church to subscribe the declarations, and take the oath or affirmation above described, and, in case of refusal, to commit them to prison without bail or mainprize.‡

Here, then, was no room for evasion; the object of inquiry respected a particular article of faith; the committee of Friends distinctly understood that object, and if they framed their answer to the inquiry in such a way as to induce a belief on the part of the inquirers, that they assented to the doctrine in a sense different from that which they really entertained, they were guilty of falsehood; and when, in pursuance of the law, they affirmed to such belief, they were guilty of perjury.

But such base suspicions seem not to have been entertained by the members of parliament; they saw in that committee, not fair weather Quakers, but men, who, for a long series of years, had breasted the tempest of persecution with unbending fortitude; who had suffered imprisonment and stripes for what they believed to be the cause of truth, and who had never been known to compromise even the least important article of their faith; and they must have thought it incredible that such men, in a season, when the violence of the storm had abated, and they, if not legally protected, were, in a great degree, left undisturbed, should so far forget their duty as Christians, and their moral obligations as men, as to declare, in this solemn manner, their assent to a doctrine which they did not believe. It is an old saying, that one renegade is worse than ten Turks; the truth of which was exemplified in the conduct of one of their own members; for we find that this atrocious charge of which their more liberal opponents did not entertain a suspicion, was brought against them by George Keith.

Keith was a man of good natural parts, and had received a liberal education at the university of Aberdeen; was a fluent speaker, had been about thirty years a member of the Society of Friends, and being a minister, he had sustained many hardships in the persecutions of Friends in England, previous to his removal to Pennsylvania. He arrived in Philadelphia in the year 1689, and appears to have been received with great kindness; for soon after his arrival, he was appointed master of a school, a dwelling and school house provided for him, and an engagement made to add to his tuition money such a sum, as would ensure to him a salary of one hundred and twenty pounds a year. This was, indeed, a large sum, considering the situation of the infant colony, and a proof highly honourable to our ancestors, of their zeal in promoting the education of their youth, at a moment when they were struggling amidst the privations and difficulties incident to the first settlement of a wilderness.*

But an impatient and unsettled disposition induced him, very soon after his appointment, to abandon it. He then began to indulge in vain speculations on subjects above the investigation of human reason, to which the Society of Friends have always been wisely opposed, because, they do believe, such subjects, unless clearly revealed in Scripture, not to be necessary to salvation. That the things which are revealed belong to, and are obligatory on us; that they are sufficient to enable us to attain the great end of our being; and that all endeavours to pry into the secret things which appertain to divine Omniscience, is presumptuous, and too often lead into great and fatal error.

He, therefore, not finding a disposition in Friends to countenance him in the course he was pursuing, and being of a very aspiring mind, became impatient of the restraints imposed on him, and dissatisfied with the ministers and elders, who did not concur with him.

In tracing the path of this man and his coadjutors, the reader will observe the similarity between it and that pursued by Elias Hicks and his followers; for, although their ultimate objects are diametrically opposite, the means by which each endeavoured to attain their own, were precisely the same. The endeavours of both appear to be to induce a belief that our early Friends held doctrines, which both knew they explicitly disavowed; Keith, with the wicked hope of persuading others to believe, that, notwithstanding their protestations to the contrary, they were secretly endeavouring to undermine the Christian religion, by propagating doctrines contrary to its fundamental principles, because he knew that such a course must be reprobated by every moral man. Whilst Elias Hicks boldly advocates these doctrines, and with most extraordinary fatuity of mind, places his claim to our belief of them, on their being the doctrines of our primitive Friends, ignorant (as he appears to be) that if, notwithstanding their denial, they really believed in them, so far from their opinions giving any strength to his belief, they must be considered as the worthless assertions of men uninstructed in, or indifferent to, the moral obligations of both natural and revealed religion, and who have propagated their notions by fraud and prevarication. Keith's means were well adapted to his ultimate object; Elias Hicks's, if successful, must defeat his own views.

FOR THE FRIEND.
JOHN PEROT.

A disregard for the salutary restraints of religious duty, and a disposition to make every man's opinion of right and wrong the sole arbiter of his actions, was very early manifested in some of the members of the Society of Friends. Aspiring men, possessed of little religion, but making high pretensions to the guidance of the Spirit, or the light within, persuaded those who were fond of novelty, and impatient of control, that forms and outward rules were not only needless, but a departure from the spirituality of the gospel, and an infringement of their Christian rights. Jealous of the influence which the gifts and services of some conspicuous members of the Society had procured for them, and anxious to lessen the respect which was felt for their experience and judgment, those innovators upon the discipline and doctrines of the church, endeavoured to alienate the affections of their brethren from them, by insinuations that they were desirous of "lording over the heritage," for the purpose of aggrandizing themselves. Endowed with a great share of heavenly wisdom and discernment, George Fox saw, when the Society became enlarged, that order and a system of government were necessary, to preserve the members in a course of conduct consistent with their religious profession, and to relieve it from the reproach which might otherwise be brought upon it by defections in principle or practice. His godly care was construed into a desire for dominion over the consciences of others, and the cry of "imposition" and "blind obedience" was raised to frustrate the work, and to lay waste the esteem and confidence of his friends; but his love to the cause in which he was engaged, was not to be damped by the resentments of ignorance or envy.

The difficulties occasioned by the defection of James Nayler were hardly surmounted, when the peace of the Society was again disturbed by the pretended spirituality and supercilious conduct of John Perot. He had joined the Society early after its rise, and soon took upon him the office of a minister. Possessing a high opinion of his abilities, he apprehended it was his duty to go to Rome to convert the Pope, where he was imprisoned in the hospital for madmen. From this place he wrote several epistles to his friends, which he signed with his first name only, as though he considered himself a second John the divine. Exaggerated reports of his sufferings industriously spread in England, operated powerfully upon the sympathies of some weak minds, so that on his return, assuming a show of great sanctity and humility, he ingratiated himself in their affections, and in that way more readily propagated the mistaken notion of keeping on the hat during public and private prayer, unless there was felt an immediate motion at the time to put it off. He became excessively inflated with his imaginary attainments, so that he thought himself more enlightened than George Fox and other Friends; and as proof of his superior spirituality, professed himself religiously bound to abandon a custom, which he considered a piece of formality that was derived from the world, and ought, therefore, to be relinquished, unless immediately called for by a divine revelation. Many inexperienced and unsuspecting persons were deceived by his professions and apparent sanctity, and adopting his opinions from their supposed consistency with a more spiritual dispensation, much confusion followed in their meetings for worship. Among the number was Richard Davis, who gives a very striking description of the character and effects of such innovations, in the following paragraph:—"The tendency of that spirit was to speaking evil of Friends that bore the burden and heat of the day, and so to cry out against Friends as dead and formal. They expected a more glorious dispensation than yet had been known among Friends, and they kept on their hats in time of prayer. I was but a little while amongst them, till a veil of darkness came over me, and under that veil I came to have a light esteem for my dear and ancient friend George Fox, and some others who had been near and dear to me. But it pleased the Lord to rend that veil of darkness, and cause the light of his countenance to shine again upon me, whereby I came to see the doleful place I was led into by a spirit that tended to nothing else but self-exaltation, and under a pretence of humility and self-denial, breach of that unity, love, and fellowship, that formerly we had together, and the good esteem we had one of another in the Lord. Children we were of one Father, esteeming one another above ourselves in the Lord. There was no jar or contention among us then, but all dwelt together in love and unity, and in the fellowship of that blessed gospel of peace, life and salvation." How similar are the means adopted to effect a division in the Society at the present day. Prejudice is infused into the minds of the unwary, by persons who make high profession of love and good works. Charges of corrupt designs are privately and industriously insinuated against upright worthy men, who are pronounced "dead," "formal," and "traditional," while the enemies of the peace and welfare of the Society assume to themselves the almost exclusive possession of the light and life of religion.

George Fox, and the principal Friends, foreseeing that the pretended scruples of Perot and his party would introduce contention, and divert from a solid settlement in the truth and its comely order, laboured to guard Friends against them, and to arrest the spreading contagion, but which was not fully accomplished till Perot openly manifested himself by his evil conduct. William Penn says, "his standing being soon discovered by several weighty Friends, he was solidly, secretly, and frequently dealt withal; his condition represented, his danger shown, and a station of safety pointed to him. It was the daily travail of many who sought his welfare, and the church's peace, to bring him to a sense of his own condition. But no argument or entreaties could prevail; no sighs or tears could soften him; but resolved he was for a sect master, and his mark must be, the hat on, in time of public prayer. That which yet whetted many simple hearts to follow his example was his sufferings, his pharisaical pretences to a higher dispensation," &c.

Defection in principle and practice has rarely overspread any religious body of people, while the ministers have steadily kept the ground of true faith. In the Society of Friends no material schism has occurred, but some self-seeking sect master has been detected at the bottom of it. The plea of possessing more enlarged and liberal views, more light and spirituality than others, has mostly been the bait with which he has ensnared his deluded followers. That which now agitates some parts of the Society in this country, will be traced to the great want of vital Christianity amongst a highly favoured people, who have been blessed with many peculiar privileges, but too many of whom are, nevertheless, taking darkness for light, and calling light darkness. The plea of liberty is made a cloak for licentiousness, and the rights of conscience are advanced as a plea for the total destruction of every form of faith. Minds under the influence of such views, are well adapted to the reception of the seeds of infidelity; and such a people are well prepared to support the cause of some bold pretender to reformation, while they regard with perfect indifference, the disorganizing effects of his principles, provided their ambition may be gratified with domination and ultimate success. The labours of Friends to counteract the hat leprosy, were met with the usual cry of imposition, domineering, and lording over the heritage, and George Fox received an accession of titles, such as "king George," "bishop," "pope," and "certain ministers and elders," termed the "Foxonian Unity," were charged with issuing "paper edicts," and "then entitling them the judgment of the body," whereas, said the disaffected, "'tis but the mind of a cabal of Foxonians," "the leaders are the men we strike at." Though the matter of difference is not precisely the same, yet the temper, and the means employed to subvert sound government, and to overturn the Society, are very similar in the present juncture. Pope and popery, tyranny and oppression, a very few domineering over a large majority, are sounds which we are now familiar with. A paper written in defence of Perot's party, was entitled, "A further discovery of the tyrannical government, popish principles, and evil practices, of the now leading Quakers," by which we may see, that the same enmity to upright men and good government, has appeared occasionally in some parts of the Society almost from its commencement: and the present disturbance does not differ in its ground and origin from any that has preceded it.

Elias Hicks's "mark" is the rejection of a belief in Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the world. He regards our ancient Friends as being in the mere dawn of scriptural light, while he is pronounced by his followers to be a hundred years ahead of the Society at the present day. He refused the elders a private interview, and treated them in a contemptuous manner, asserting, in reply to one of them, "God makes ministers, but man elders," thereby drawing an invidious distinction between himself and them, designed to ridicule the office, and place himself above their decisions. We wonder the "enemies of creeds," of "king-craft" and "priest-craft," have not taken the alarm at this avowal of superior authority, and a sort of "divine right" amongst the ministers. On the same occasion, he observed, that, "if those Friends who had just retired, (the elders,) were to have the whole rule and government of ministers and others, and others were to be bound to submit to them in all things, it was time for Friends to take care of their rights, and not suffer themselves to be imposed upon." See account in "Cabinet of Darkness," &c. Elias Hicks knew as well as any one, that the elders had no wish "to have the whole rule and government of ministers and others," or to impose upon them, but his insinuations of imposition and tyranny, served as a signal to throw off subordination and respect for them; and no ten men in this country, of equal respectability and worth of character, have endured more obloquy and disgraceful treatment in public and in private, from the high professors of love and good fruits, than they have.

FOR THE FRIEND. LINES

Addressed to my Infant Child, whilst in my arms, a few hours before his decease, 12th mo. 1827.

I see thou'rt going, my dear little son,
To the home of the dwellers on earth;
Where a refuge secure is prepar'd for each one,
From the frailties they're heirs to from birth.
That panting breast and half-closed eye,
Tell me, thy journey's end is nigh.
How few the days, since the lov'd smile,
Which oft illum'd these features fair,
Could sorrowing hours of gloom beguile,
And ease my heart oppress'd with care.
But now I see those days are o'er,
That smile can cheer my heart no more.
Oh! it is sad to think, a flower,
Whose bud has just uprear'd its head
With promise fair, for future hour,
So soon should number with the dead;

But frosts have come, and soon, I see,
Will end each hope of bloom in thee.
End, did I say, each hope of bloom?
Of mortal bloom alone 'twill be;
This bud will ope beyond the tomb,
When thou'rt from earth-born frailty free.
Sweet is the thought, that thou shalt there
Bloom, unassail'd, for ever fair.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH, 19, 1828.

We have just received the sixth number of the "Miscellaneous Repository," published at Mount Pleasant, Ohio, by Elisha Bates. From it we extract the following article. Great pains have been taken in giving currency to assertions, that the measure of the late Yearly Meeting of Indiana relative to the epistle issued by that body to its members, was carried over the heads of a large proportion of those present—that it was the act of a few—was brought about by foreign influence, &c. &c. The detailed and very satisfactory account which is here given, is calculated most effectually to show the groundlessness of those assertions, while it may well be considered, combining, as it does, the testimony of both Indiana and Ohio Yearly Meetings, as the solemn protest of Friends in the western country generally, against innovations in doctrine and discipline.

In another part of the "Miscellaneous Repository," are some further strictures and explanations, illustrative of the views and state of feeling among our western brethren, which we propose to introduce in a future number.

Testimony of Indiana Yearly Meeting, and the Meeting for Sufferings of Ohio.

The following documents, taken together, may be regarded as the united Testimony of the Society of Friends in their official capacity, in the whole western country. The Testimony of Indiana Yearly Meeting, though arranged last, stands first in order of time.

The subject embraced in that epistle was first moved in their meeting for sufferings, in its sitting a few days preceding the late Yearly Meeting. The document was prepared by a committee to whom the subject was referred, and when presented to the meeting, unanimously approved. That is, a large number of the members expressed a cordial approbation, and not one individual made any objection. The Yearly Meeting was at that time in session, before which this testimony was directed to be laid. When read there, a raw, very few, individuals made some general remarks unfavourable to its adoption, but I do not recollect a single specific objection made to it in the Yearly Meeting; but, on the contrary, so general an expression of unity, I never saw in such a meeting. Four thousand copies were ordered to be printed at the expense of the Yearly Meeting, in order to furnish each family with a copy, and leave a surplus of about 1000 copies for circulation beyond the pale of Society, and to distribute among friends in other places.

The meeting for sufferings of Ohio, it is well known, examined and approved the "Doctrines of Friends" three years ago; and a few months after the pamphlet of "Extracts;" and authorized me to attach to those works, the evidences of that approbation. When these proceedings were laid before the Yearly Meeting in 1825, they were approved by that body: on which the following minute was made: "The minutes of the meeting for sufferings were read and its proceedings approved," not one single individual making an objection. It may be further observed, that at the period at which this minute was made, the volume of Doctrines and pamphlet of Extracts, had been in circulation several months.

The following extract of minute from the meeting for sufferings of Ohio, will show its cordial concurrence and unity of concern with the meeting of Indiana. Three thousand copies of both documents connected were ordered to be printed, and divided among the monthly meetings, for distribution to their members and others.

These Testimonies are not only in full accordance with the clearly expressed doctrines of our early Friends, but with the discipline also. As early as the year 1694, the following rule was adopted by the yearly meeting of London, which still stands in the discipline of that meeting. This was five years before the date of the later writings of Wm. Penn: "If there be any such GROSS ERRORS, FALSE DOCTRINES or mistakes held by any professing truth, as are either against the validity of Christ's sufferings, blood, resurrection, ascension, or glory in the heavens, according as they are set forth in the scriptures; or any ways tending to the denial of the heavenly man Christ, such persons ought to be diligently instructed and admonished by faithful friends,"—"but if any shall wilfully persist in error in point of faith, after being duly informed, then such to be further dealt with according to Gospel order; that the truth—church or body of Christ, may not suffer by any particular pretended member that is so corrupt."

An extract of the Discipline of Indiana (and that of Ohio is the same,) is given in the following document—from all which it is evident that no new ground is taken by the yearly meeting of the former, or the meeting for sufferings of the latter state. It is only a revival of the ancient and present doctrines and discipline of the Society, and calling the attention of subordinate meetings, and of friends individually to the subject.

To Monthly Meetings, and Friends individually.

"The following Testimony, issued by the yearly meeting of Indiana, having been presented to this meeting, and deliberately examined, was fully united with: and a number of copies were directed to be distributed among our members.

"In accordance with the views of Indiana yearly meeting, we believe that the separatists alluded to in their Address, cannot consistently be considered as members of the Society of Friends, nor allowed the privileges of members, whether recommended by certificates, from those separate meetings, either as ministers or emigrants.

"The present is a time of peculiar trial in our religious Society. Great efforts have been used to destroy a belief in the Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, the propitiatory nature of his sufferings and death, the authority of the Holy Scriptures, as a test of religious opinions, with other important doctrines of the Gospel. And various publications have been put in circulation, evidently to promote those views.

"Deeply impressed, as we have long been, with the importance of guarding our members from the dangerous tendency of the doctrines thus industriously disseminated amongst us, and of maintaining our holy profession in its original purity, we recommend to meetings, and to Friends in their varied stations and conditions, to labour after a qualification for the faithful discharge of their respective duties, in relation to this important concern.

"And we recommend to their serious attention, the communication from the yearly meeting of Indiana, as a clear testimony against some of the most material of those spurious principles, and the publications containing them.

"Extracted from the minutes of the meeting for sufferings of Ohio yearly meeting, held at Mount Pleasant, by adjournments, on the 16th, 17th, and 18th of the 11th month, 1827.

"JORDAN HARRISON, Clk."

Then follows the Epistle from the Indiana Yearly Meeting, as published in our 4th number.

The weather in England has been much the same as with us. A Liverpool paper of Nov. 17th, says: An apple tree may now be seen in Burlington-street, in full bloom; a striking proof of the mildness of the season.

We insert the notice which follows by request. On another page of the present number, will be found an interesting article taken from the publication referred to.

The subscribers to the Miscellaneous Repository, published by Elisha Bates, Mount Pleasant, Ohio, are informed, that the delay in the appearance of the sixth number of that work, which ought to have been published, in regular course, in the 8th month last, has been occasioned principally by the severe illness of the editor. That number, dated 1 mo. 1828, has come to hand, and it is expected that no further irregularities will occur in the publication of the Journal. Such of the subscribers as have not received their numbers regularly since the commencement of the work, will please to forward their names, and an account of the missing numbers, either directly to the editor in Mount Pleasant, or to

FOR THE FRIEND.

John James Rousseau, the French author, one of the most distinguished deists of our time, died in 1778. His acknowledgment is no inconsiderable proof of that divine influence by which the vain reasonings of men are put to flight, by which they are made to contradict their own superficial theory, and bend to the superior wisdom of truth. This extraordinary person, and determined opponent of the gospel, in his Emilius, under the power of conviction, makes the following ingenious and striking confession in its favour. "I will confess to you, that the majesty of the Scriptures strikes me with admiration, as the purity of the gospel hath its influence on my heart. Peruse the works of our philosophers, with all the power of diction; how mean, how contemptible are they, compared with the Scriptures. Is it possible that a book at once so simple and sublime, should be merely the work of man? Is it possible that the same personage, whose history it contains, should be himself a mere man? Do we find that he assumed the tone of an enthusiast, or ambitious sectary? What sweetness, what purity in his manners, what an affecting gracefulness in his delivery, what sublimity in his maxims! what profound wisdom in his discourses! what presence of mind, what depth of discernment, what truth in his replies! How great the command over his passions! Where is the man, where is the philosopher, who could so live, and so die, without weakness, without ostentation?"

From the Christian Advocate and Journal.

Mr. Editor—In the 13th number of the Christian Advocate, you have inserted an anecdote of the celebrated Volney, which in my opinion evinces the weakness of the greatest infidel as well as the strength of the humblest Christian in the hour of extremity and death in the most striking point of view. Being in possession of some anecdotes of the late Thomas Paine, another champion of infidelity, (one of which is under similar circumstances) I have taken the liberty to communicate it to you, that if you think it worthy a place in your useful paper, you may publish it.

Captain C. commanded the ship London Packet, on board which ship Thomas Paine came passenger to the United States, I think in 1802. During the voyage they experienced much stormy weather, particularly on the American coast, and were several times driven back into the Gulf stream. The last time they were blown off, such was the violence of the gale and commotion of the sea, as well as condition of the ship, that the captain despaired of ever making the land again. Until now, Mr. Paine retained composure of mind; but immediately on the captain ordering the long boat to be cleared, he hurried below, hastily collected his baggage, and brought it on deck to be ready to take to the boat if that alternative was necessary. The sails were nearly all blown to pieces; the crew exhausted; and every succeeding wave threatening to entomb the whole. At this awful moment, a sea struck the stern as though it would sweep every thing from the deck; when, in presence of all on board, Mr. Paine, raising his hands and eyes upward, exclaimed, "Jesus Christ, have mercy on us." This conduct was so unexpected by the captain, that after the storm abated and the ship once more put about, and gently gliding towards her destined port, he accosted Mr. Paine in these words:—"Mr. Paine, I have always understood you did not believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ: why then did you a few hours ago, when we all expected to be overwhelmed in a watery grave, call upon him for his merciful protection?" To which he replied, "Poh! poh! captain, 'twas a mere involuntary expression, occasioned by the terror of the moment."

From the last number of "the African Repository and Colonial Journal," published at Washington city, at the close of the past month, we extract the following:—

We have just received by the "Norfolk," despatches from Liberia, up to the 25th of September. At that time health and prosperity prevailed in the Colony.

Sailing of the Randolph.—This schooner took her departure from Georgetown, South Carolina, since the publication of our last number, with twenty-six slaves, manumitted by a single benevolent individual, (Mr. M'Dermid,) near Cheraw, that they might share in the benefits of the African Colony. They are represented as sober, industrious, and several of them pious. Nine of them are natives of Africa, the remainder their descendants. The gentleman who is thus distinguished, by conferring freedom upon these Africans, has been long esteemed for his integrity and charity, and only adds, by this bright and memorable deed, the crown to a long life of virtuous actions.

Departure of the Nautilus.—By our last intelligence, the Nautilus was lying in Hampton Roads, waiting only for a fair wind to waft her on her voyage to Liberia. One hundred and sixty-four persons take passage in her for the African Colony, most of them from the counties of Wayne, N. Hampton, Pasquotank, and Perquimans, in North Carolina, who have enjoyed the special kindness and protection of the Society of Friends, and are now liberally assisted by them to remove to the land of their progenitors. These individuals have been induced to emigrate, in consequence of the intelligence received by them from their brethren, and the very flattering success which they are assured has attended their predecessors. They were accompanied to Norfolk, by two highly respected members of the Society of Friends, Nathan Mendenhall and Phineas Albertson, who amply provided them with articles necessary for their health and comfort during the voyage. "I think," says a correspondent, "that no better cargo of emigrants has ever gone to Liberia. They are all remarkably well clothed, and our friends have been uncommonly attentive in supplying all their wants. They have examined all their baggage and supplied them with all necessary clothing, and defrayed all the expenses of their journey to this place. I do not know a discontented person among all who are about to embark." Twelve of these emigrants were from Baltimore, and of a very worthy character. Two others were from the Eastern Shore of Virginia, and five from Richmond. They go out under circumstances the most favourable, and we humbly hope that over them will be spread the wings of Almighty protection.

Indian Schools.—One of the documents accompanying the president's message, contains a detached statement of the number and expense of the schools maintained by the government of the United States among the Indian tribes and elsewhere, for the education of Indian children, the number of teachers, of pupils, &c. by which we perceive that there are forty schools, having 1291 pupils, the whole expense of which, for the year, has been seven thousand dollars. The teachers are furnished exclusively by the missionary and other humane societies, and the number is about one hundred and twenty.

Married, at Friends' meeting house, Key's Alley, on the 1st inst. Isaac Remington, M. D. to Lydia, daughter of John Hart, all of Philadelphia.

Died, at the house of her brother-in-law, Richard Humphreys, Sansom street, on the 19th ult. Rachel Morris, in the 79th year of her age.

— on the 2d inst. at Germantown, in the 63d year of her age, Hannah Haines. They were both respected members of the Society of Friends.

— on 2d day morning, the 24th of 12th month last, at Norristown, Montgomery county, aged 38 years, Mary L. Israel, wife of William P. Israel, formerly of this city, and daughter of Robert Waln.

LEWIS XIV.

The following brief, but just and spirited delineation of what has been commonly considered the most splendid period in the history of France, prior to the revolution, is from the Abbe du Pradt. The glory, pomp, power, and magnificent achievements of "Louis le Grand" are described with graphical effect, and forcibly contrasted with the misery and desolation by which they were accompanied and followed. How different, generally, the circumstances, in the growth and rapid improvements, perhaps without a parallel, which have marked the progress of our own happy government:—may the virtues of its people, and the wisdom of its rulers, long interpose a barrier to the introduction of like causes and like effects. Pre-eminently blessed as we are with both civil and religious liberty, and in the free diffusion of gospel light, surely there is no country which can have less excuse for the indulgence of inordinate ambition, or which it more behoves to bear in remembrance, that "righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." S. R.

"Within a few years, the reign of this prince has been the subject of much attention in France. The epoch of its history is referred to by the writers who defend the dogmas of absolute power, with singular delight; it is the ground on which they most willingly meet the advocates of popular doctrines. The latter, after examining the field on which they were challenged to combat, find no reason to shrink from the contest. The hope of triumph must animate their efforts, while the happiness of nations is deemed preferable to the dazzling illusions of military glory; and while the interests of humanity are in higher esteem than the creations of imagination. At our distance from the age of Lewis XIV. it is not easy to guard our thoughts from a sudden surprise of admiration. At this period, we see only the splendour of its monuments, and the master-pieces of its genius. The groans of the victims of ambition interrupt not the silence of ages; the tears of the oppressed water the earth without leaving traces; and blood, unjustly shed, disturbs not the quiet of the tombs! Even history learns to flatter the power which is past: all speaks aloud of the grandeur of princes; while of the miseries of their people, all is silent.

"Consider Lewis XIV. in the midst of his court, nothing can be more magnificent than the spectacle; surrounded by the prodigies of art, all talents conspiring to his glory, he is present at his own apotheosis. Like a deity whose volitions are laws, nature bows before him; forests disappear at his nod, mountains are levelled, waters are elevated; the seas approach and unite; the world is filled with his renown. But leave not this court so brilliant and so polished; trust not your eyes beyond those sumptuous palaces, these marbles animated by the creative chisel, these breathing bronzes, the faithful image of courtiers. Enter not the straw-roofed cottages, for there dwells nought but servitude and despair! The walls of these palaces have been cemented by the tears of a people; this groupe of bronze has devoured the subsistence of a hundred families; to excavate these canals, and to suspend these aqueducts, whole provinces have been ruined! The monarch himself, amidst these deceptive prospects, is the victim of chagrin. Fortune soon teaches him that he is separated from human destinies by one of those fictions only, which evince the infirmity of our intelligence; he dies, and the public joy insults and disturbs his obsequies!"

EXTRACTS FROM BURNET'S LIFE OF ROCHESTER.

In this concluding extract from Burnet, a few sentences have been left out, and one or two expressions changed, which, however, do not at all interfere with the connection, nor diminish the force of his beautiful reasoning.

The earl of Rochester "excepted to the belief of mysteries in the Christian religion, which, he thought, was impossible; since it is not in a man's power to believe that which he cannot comprehend, and of which he can have no notion. The believing mysteries, he said, made way for all the juggling of priests; for they, getting the people under them in that point, set out to them what they pleased; and giving it a hard name, and calling it a mystery, the people were tamed, and easily believed it."

To which Burnet made this answer.

"For mysteries, it is plain there is in every thing somewhat that is unaccountable. How seeds grow in the earth; how the souls dwell in the body, and acts, and moves it; how we retain the figures of so many words and things in our memories; and how we draw them out so easily and orderly in our thoughts or discourses; how sight and hearing were so quick and distinct; how we move, and how bodies were compounded and united; these things, if we follow them into all the difficulties that we may raise about them, will appear every whit as unaccountable as any mystery of religion; and a blind or deaf man would judge sight or hearing as incredible as any mystery may be judged by us; for our reason is not equal to them. In the same rank, different degrees of age or capacity raise some far above others; so that children cannot fathom the learning, nor weak persons the counsels of more illuminated minds; therefore it was no wonder, if we could not understand the divine essence. We cannot imagine how two such different natures as a soul and body should so unite together, and be mutually affected with one another's concerns; and how the soul has one principle of reason, by which it acts intellectually; and another of life, by which it joins to the body, and acts vitally; two principles, so widely differing both in their nature and operation, and yet united in one and the same person. There might be as many hard arguments brought against the possibility of these things, which yet every one knows to be true, from speculative notions, as against the mysteries mentioned in the Scriptures. As that in one essence there are three different principles of operation, which are called in Scripture, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and that the second of these did unite himself in a most intimate manner with the human nature of Jesus Christ; and that the sufferings he underwent were accepted of God as a sacrifice for our sins, who thereupon conferred on him a power of granting eternal life to all that submit to the terms on which he offers it; and that God inwardly bends and moves our wills, by such impressions as he can make on our bodies and minds. These and other mysteries of our religion, are neither so unreasonable, that any other objection lies against them but this, that they agree not with our common notions; nor so unaccountable, that somewhat like them cannot be assigned in other things, which are believed really to be, although the manner of them cannot be apprehended; so, this ought not to be any just objection to the submission of our reason to what we cannot so well conceive, provided our belief of it be well grounded. There have been too many niceties brought, indeed, rather to darken than explain these; they have been defended by weak arguments, and illustrated by similes not always so very apt and pertinent; and new subtleties have been added, which have rather perplexed than cleared them. All this cannot be denied; the opposition of heretics anciently occasioned too much curiosity among the Fathers, which the schoolmen have wonderfully advanced of late times; but if mysteries were received rather in the simplicity in which they are delivered in the Scriptures, than according to the descanting of fanciful men upon them, they would not appear much more incredible than some of the common objects of sense and perception. And it is a needless fear, that if some mysteries are acknowledged, which are plainly mentioned in the New Testament, it will then be in the power of the priests to add more at their pleasure. For it is an absurd inference, from our being bound to assent to some truths about the divine essence, of which the manner is not understood, to argue that therefore in an object presented duly to our senses, such as bread and wine, we should be bound to believe against their testimony, that it is not what our senses perceive it to be, but the whole flesh and blood of Christ; an entire body being in every crumb and drop of it. It is not, indeed, in a man's power to believe thus against his sense and reason, where the object is proportioned to them, and fitly applied, and the organs are under no disposition or disorder. It is certain that no mystery is to be admitted, but upon very clear and express authorities from Scripture, which could not be reasonably understood in any other sense. And though a man cannot form an explicit notion of a mystery, yet, in general, he may believe a thing to be, though he cannot give himself a particular account of the way of it; or, rather, though he cannot answer some objections which lie against it. We know we believe many such in human matters, which are more within our reach; and it is very unreasonable to say, we may not do it in divine things, which are much more above our apprehensions."

THE ENGLISH CLASSIC, No. 5.

We have selected for our present number the preface to "The Fruits of Solitude" of the founder of Pennsylvania. It is in itself a little treatise on ethics, full of sententious wisdom and chastened thought, the production of that season of life

When youth's presumptuousness is mellowed down,
And manhood's vain anxieties dismissed;
When wisdom shows her seasonable fruits
Upon the boughs of sheltering leisure hung
In sober plenty.

The character of this great man as a legislator, is gathering its fame with the lapse of time, and is brightening in its noblest traits, and becoming more and more dear to our affections, as its impress upon the institutions and manners of his city is wearing away. With a temper more lively and versatile than George Fox, and an understanding quick, comprehensive, and acute, and more practised in the ways of men than Robert Barclay, his frame of mind had not the subduing awfulness of the one, nor his intellect the severe logic and unerring precision of the other. The large experience of the world with which his chequered life had furnished him, did not sour the Christian sweetness and humility of his temper; but his generous nature gushed out continually in efforts to serve his friends, and to benefit the world. Neither pecuniary distress, nor the ingratitude of others, could repress it, and whether a prisoner for conscience sake in a noisome dungeon—the fearless advocate of the rights of Englishmen before a corrupt judge—the friend and favourite of royalty, or exercising himself the functions of a monarch—William Penn remained the same intrepid and devoted enthusiast to the cause of true liberty, the same humble and fervent messenger of the gospel of the Redeemer.

The distress which threw a shade over the latter years of his life was the result of his generous sacrifices for the welfare of his colony; and amidst the decay of his bodily and mental faculties, there is a melancholy pleasure in perceiving that the governing trait in his character—his love to God and man—remained unimpaired.

William Penn, in his sphere of public life, already ranks as one of the great lights of the world. But it is not in his natural endowments, happy as they were, nor in his learning and accomplishments, that we are to seek the sources of his greatness. We can regard him no otherwise than as an instrument, raised up by Divine Providence for the purpose which he accomplished, the establishment of a commonwealth on the basis of Christian freedom. It was by following the guidance of the light of Christ in his heart, that he became so eminent an instrument of good; and although the lot of few can be cast upon as wide a scene of action as his, that light is as necessary to guide aright the steps of the humblest and feeblest of our race, in the narrow walks of private life, as it was to preserve him amidst the temptations of exalted rank.

If the public acts of William Penn displayed the talents of a great lawgiver, his writings exhibit him as an able defender of the faith which was the animating principle of his life, as a profound observer of human nature, as the votary of a mild and tolerant philosophy, as the godly parent concerned for the eternal welfare of his children, as the just man, endeavouring to raise his character to the exalted standard of Christian perfection.

The youthful mind may be referred to his works as displaying the character of Quakerism in its most attractive form; and he who is weary of the deceitfulness of the world, and the sinfulness of his own heart, will here find wisdom without misanthropy, humility sustained by faith, contentment under every dispensation of Providence, and the abiding hope of an eternal recompense of rewards.

Reader—This Enchiridion I present thee with is the fruit of solitude; a school few care to learn in, though none instructs us better. Some parts of it are the results of serious reflection; others, the flashings of lucid intervals, written for private satisfaction, and now published for an help to human conduct. The author blesseth God for his retirement, and kisses the gentle hand which led him into it, for though it should prove barren to the world, it can never do so to him.

He has now had some time he could call his own; a property he was never so much master of before, in which he has taken a view of himself and the world, and observed wherein he hath hit and missed the mark; what might have been done, what mended, and what avoided in his human conduct; together with the omissions and excesses of others; as well societies and governments, as private families and persons. And he verily thinks, were he to live over his life again, he could not only, with God's grace, serve him, but his neighbour and himself, better than he hath done, and have seven years of his time to spare. And yet, perhaps, he hath not been the worst or the idlest man in the world, nor is he the oldest, and this is the rather said, that it might quicken thee, reader, to lose none of the time that is yet thine.

There is nothing of which we are apt to be so lavish as of time, and about which we ought to be more solicitous; since without it we can do nothing in this world. Time is what we want most, but what, alas! we use worst; and for which God will certainly most strictly reckon with us, when time shall be no more. It is of that moment to us, in reference to both worlds, that I can hardly wish any man better, than that he would seriously consider what he does with his time; how, and to what ends he employs it, and what returns he makes to God, his neighbour, and himself, for it. Will he never have a leger for this? This, the greatest wisdom, and work of life. To come but once into the world, and trifle away our true enjoyment of it, and of ourselves in it, is lamentable indeed. This one reflection would yield a thinking person great instruction; and since nothing below man can so think, man, in being thoughtless, must needs fall below himself; and that, to be sure, such do, as are unconcerned in the use of their most precious time. This is but too evident, if we will allow ourselves to consider, that there is hardly any thing we take by the right end, or improve to its just advantage.

We understand little of the works of God, either in nature or grace. We pursue false knowledge, and mistake education extremely. We are violent in our affections, confused and immethodical in our whole life; making that a burden which was given for a blessing, and so of little comfort to ourselves or others; misapprehending the true notion of happiness, and so missing of the right use of life, and way of happy living. And until we are persuaded to stop, and step a little aside out of the noisy crowd and innumerable hurry of the world, and calmly take a prospect of things, it will be impossible we should be able to make a right judgment of ourselves, or know our own misery. But after we have made the just reckonings, which retirement will help us to, we shall begin to think the world in great measure mad, and that we have been in a sort of bedlam all this while.

Reader, whether young or old, think it not too soon, or too late, to turn over the leaves of thy past life, and be sure to fold down where any passage of it may affect thee, and bestow thy remainder of time to correct those faults in thy future conduct, be it in relation to this or the next life. What thou wouldst do, if what thou hast done were to do again, be sure to do as long as thou livest, upon the like occasions. Our resolutions seem to be vigorous as often as we reflect upon our past errors, but alas! they are apt to flag again, upon fresh temptations to do the same things.

The author does not pretend to deliver thee an exact piece; his business not being ostentation, but charity. It is miscellaneous in the matter of it, and by no means artificial in the composure. But it contains hints that may serve thee for texts to preach to thyself upon, and which comprehend much of the course of human life; since, whether thou art parent or child, prince or subject, master or servant, single or married, public or private, mean or honourable, rich or poor, prosperous or improsperous, in peace or controversy, in business or solitude; whatever be thy inclination or aversion, practice or duty, thou wilt find something not unsuitably said for thy direction and advantage. Accept and improve what deserves thy notice; the rest excuse, and place to account of good will to thee, and the whole creation of God.

FOR THE FRIEND.

To the Editor and Publisher of "The Friend."

I know not whether, amidst the general approbation of your labours, you will care for the opinion of a solitary like myself, even when it joins in the common voice of praise. But it will not be disagreeable to you to be told, that the perusal of your journal has become the regular employment of my seventh day evenings. With the inquisitiveness which is one of the luxuries of idleness, I amuse myself in poring over it during these long winter evenings; sometimes in fixing the authorship of the essays, and sometimes in suggesting to myself how an argument could have been strengthened, a period polished, or an essay shortened. My criticisms seldom pass my lips, and have, as yet, died away in reverie. A subject, however, on which you have touched in your prospectus, and in the remarks made in introducing "the English Classic," has taken stronger hold of my mind than usual, and seems to me of sufficient importance to deserve a more elaborate notice than you have given it. I allude to your design of publishing extracts from those English writers of standard excellence, who have been too much crowded out of sight by the mob of living authors. I think you can scarcely fail to make this one of the richest and most delightful departments of your paper, for our language is almost inexhaustible in the materials it contains—"flowers of all hue" for such a "mosaic."

The series which you have commenced in "The Friend," will, I trust, be so conducted, as to exhibit specimens of the best manner of our best writers, and thus serve, at least, in some degree, to counteract the evils of indiscriminate reading. The works of many authors of the finest genius contain passages so exceptionable, that they cannot be placed in the hands of very young persons, without hazarding the purity of their taste, if not of their morals. I would not, for this cause, shut out the youthful mind from all access to literature, but I would guide its advances with the greatest caution, and strengthen the judgment, and refine the taste and the moral sense, by the study of pure and selected models, before allowing it to range at will. In this manner we may cultivate the imagination, without impairing the relish for severe truth, and render the mind as sensitive to moral as to natural beauty and fitness.

At the same time that the English classic will thus contribute, in its sphere, to influence the character of the rising generation, it will furnish a grateful repast to mature and cultivated minds. The genuine beauties of composition, like those of the landscape, are "ever charming, ever new." They never tire a person imbued with a true relish for learning, and though they may have often been viewed before, are examined anew with fresh and increased pleasure. Perhaps I judge from the partiality of early attachment and long familiarity, but, it seems to me, that the writers of queen Anne's time, who first cleared our written language from those faults of conceit and pedantry, with which it had been overrun, are, in some respects, above rivalry. These admirable authors wrote as they felt and thought, and exemplified the maxim of one of the most illustrious of their number—

"True wit is nature to advantage dressed,
What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed."

Notwithstanding occasional looseness and inaccuracy, the general characteristic of their style is clearness and simplicity, with the most natural choice and arrangement, and often an exquisite felicity of words. This praise, it is true, belongs by eminence to Addison and Pope; yet it is shared by Swift and Arbuthnot, and the celebrated men who clustered around them. As satirists and moralists, as painters of life and manners, they drew at once from nature and the world before them; there were no master-pieces in the language to compel them to inquire in what tints others of great and deserved celebrity had dipped their pencils. Perhaps we may trace to this cause, the unfading freshness which animates their productions, gives to them a charm that is universally felt, and renders them our best vernacular models of composition. "They brush'd the early dew."

The fear of servile imitation, and the changing fashions of the age, have driven succeeding adventurers upon the ground which they occupied, to seek new embellishments of style, and subjects that have not been exhausted. It is thus that the popular taste is gradually corrupted by a false and exaggerated manner of writing, and that a constant effort at effect takes the place of simple and natural description. The pampered public requires continually fresher and stronger stimulants of its appetite, and becomes more and more dependent upon them in its literary food. A person acquainted with the history of the English language, may trace this change in its lighter literature from the age of Addison to the present day. The observation of this influence, and the history of Greek and Roman learning, have given rise to the opinion, that where a language has been wrought, by a few great geniuses to the highest degree of classical elegance, the causes of declension begin to operate, and its future history is that of its corruption. But luxury and tyranny were the great corrupters of ancient literature; and the history of our own language proves, that these causes of declension may be partial in their operation. For, long after Pope had brought the composition of English verse to its highest perfection, the Poetry of Cowper displayed all those chaste and severe graces, which have been supposed to belong to an earlier period of history.

In the same manner, although the effusions of Addison in his happiest moments have never been surpassed, there has been a succession of pure and classical English authors down to the present day. One department of learning after another has been embellished; the language has acquired greater precision and harmony of expression, and our literature is marked by a sustained and appropriate dignity of manner, a force and variety of illustration, a comprehensiveness of views, and a solidity of learning, that fear no comparison with any ancient or modern tongue. I allude, of course, to those few writers in each generation whose works are likely to endure as standards of excellence. It is to the perpetually renovating influence of her free institutions, that England owes this continuance of her fame of authorship, and may look with confidence for its future augmentation.

Yet, although good models of composition in every department of learning may thus be found in our own tongue, the amazing increase of authors and readers has increased proportionably the influence of mere fashion upon the character of books.

The impediments to forming a correct taste in a young mind, are multiplied in the same degree, as is likewise the necessity of carefully training the understanding, and supplying it only with wholesome and nutritious aliment.

I think it is not among the least appropriate of the offices of "The Friend," to assume the guardianship over its readers in this respect. The recommendation of sound maxims, in morals and letters, will come with weight from a paper devoted to the cause of the most important of all truths, and will have authority, if any where, among a people whose institutions all tend to the formation of a grave and masculine character.

I do not flatter myself that my occasional contributions can be of any other value, than as adding to the variety of your entertainment; but if he is not rejected as an unwelcome correspondent, you may hear again from

THE HERMIT OF COAQUANNOCK.

FOR THE FRIEND.

We have copied the article below from the "Common-Place Book" of a friend, whose obliging permission to make selections from it, we have before availed ourselves of. From a note of reference annexed, it appears to have been taken from Claypoole's Daily Advertiser, July, 1796; further, we know nothing of its origin. From one part of it, however, it may be inferred that it was written by a man of letters, if not an author. It appeared to us to contain much concentrated, yet comprehensive wisdom, and withal of so cheerful and good-humoured a cast, that we thought it could not be otherwise than acceptable to our readers. Although particularly adapted to the aged, yet those in younger life may derive valuable hints from it.

A SET OF RESOLUTIONS FOR OLD AGE.

Except the reasons for a change be invincible, to live and die in the public profession of the religion in which one was born and bred. To avoid all profane talk and intricate debate on sacred topics. To endeavour to get the better of the intrusions of indolence of mind and body, those harbingers of enfeebling age. Rather to wear out than rust out. To rise early, and, as often as possible, to go to bed before midnight. Not to nod in company, nor indulge repose too frequently on the couch in the day. To waste as little of life in sleep as may be, for we shall all have enough in the grave. Not to give up walking, nor ride on horseback to fatigue. Experience, and a late medical opinion, determine me to ride five miles every day; nothing contributes more to the preservation of appetite and the prolongation of life.

Cheyne's direction to the valetudinary, "to make exercise a part of their religion," to be religiously observed. To continue the practice of reading, pursued for more than fifty years, in books on all subjects; for variety is the salt of the mind as well as of life. Other people's thoughts, like the best conversation of one's companions, are generally better than one's own. Frequently to think over the virtues of one's acquaintance, old and new. To admit every cheerful ray of sunshine upon the imagination. To avoid melancholy retrospection, for memory often comes when she is not invited. To live within one's income, be it large or little. Not to let passion of any sort run away with the understanding. Not to encourage romantic hopes and fears; not to drive away hope, the sovereign balm of life, though he is the greatest of all flatterers. Not to be under the dominion of superstition or enthusiasm. Not wilfully to undertake any thing for which the nerves of the mind or the body are not strong enough. Not to run the race of competition, nor to be in another's way. To strive to embody that dignified sentiment, "to write injuries in dust, but kindnesses in marble." Not to give the reins to constitutional impatience. To recollect, that he who can keep his own temper, may be his own master. If one cannot be a stoic in bearing and forbearing, on every trifling occasion, yet it may not be impossible to pull the check string against the moroseness of spleen, or the impetuosity of peevishness. Not to fall in love now, on the precipice of three score, nor expect to be fallen in love with. A connection between summer and winter is an improper one. To continue to have as few vacant hours on hand as possible, that idleness, the mother of crime, may not pay its visit. To be always doing something, and to have something to do. If one is not able by situation, or through the necessity of raising supplies within the year, or by habit, (for virtue itself is but habit,) to do much ostentatious good, to do as little harm as possible; make the best and the most of every thing. Not to indulge too much in luxury of the table, nor yet to underlie the constitution. Resolve not to go to bed on a full meal. Not to be enervated by the flatulency of tea. Let the second of the morning's thoughts be, to consider of the employment of the day; and one of the last at night to inquire, what to-day have I done? To take the good natured side in conversation: however, not to praise every body, for that is to praise nobody. Not to be inquisitive and eager to know secrets, nor be thought to have a head full of other people's affairs. Not to debilitate the mind by incessant composition; like the spider, it may spin itself to death; the mind, like the field, must have its fallow season. Not to be too free with promises, for promises are oftentimes difficult to perform. Not to be too much alone, nor to read, nor meditate, nor talk on points that may awaken sensations, and be too pathetic for the soul. To enjoy the present, nor to be made too unhappy by reflection on the past, nor to be oppressed by invincible gloom on the future. To resolve, more than ever, to shun every public station, and responsibility of conduct. To be satisfied with being master of one's self, one's habits, and one's time. To remember never to quarrel with one's self, one's wife, or one's country. Lastly, not to trust too much to the power of those great enemies to the human frame, the east wind, the drenching rain, and the night air.

On this side, and on that, men see their friends
Drop off, like leaves in autumn; yet launch out
Into fantastic schemes, which the long lives
In the world's hale and undegenerate days
Could scarce have leisure for; fools that we are!
Never to think of death and of ourselves
At the same time; as if to learn to die
Were no concern of ours. O more than sottish!
For creatures of a day, in gamesome mood
To frolick on eternity's dread brink,
Unapprehensive; when for aught we know
The very first swoln surge shall sweep us in.

BLAIR'S GRAVE.

The very clear and satisfactory refutation of the misrepresentations of the 'Berean,' relative to the proceedings of the late Ohio Yearly Meeting, contained in the following further extract from Bates' Miscellaneous Repository, together with the annexed pertinent observations on uniformity of faith and discipline, and the true object of religious community, ought to be read with attention by Friends generally.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING.

The Berean of last month has an article headed "Ohio Yearly Meeting," in which some of the transactions of that meeting have been grossly misrepresented.

"This Meeting," says the Berean, "at its late session, appointed a committee to confer with similar committees of other Yearly Meetings, (should such be appointed,) in order to effect a uniformity of faith and discipline throughout the Society of Friends. Much opposition, it is stated, was made in the meeting to this and other measures; but they were carried over the heads of the members, much in the same manner as the party proceedings were carried in the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, at its last sitting."—"If the orthodox of that meeting were so uninformed in history, as not to have learned that coercive means have heretofore utterly failed to control the free spirit of man, or to effect a uniformity in religious opinions, they could hardly have been ignorant of the effect of such means upon their neighbours. It would seem, then, that the determination exists to persevere in this course, reckless of known consequences."

The article from which the above extract is taken, fills nearly a column; but the preceding will give a pretty accurate view of its character, the temper in which it was written, and the representation of facts. And whoever reads it, with a knowledge of those facts, and an impartial mind, must conclude that the editor of that paper was imposed upon by his correspondent, or was endeavouring to impose upon his readers.

In the first place I would ask, why did he decline to express the objects of the appointment, as they were explained to the meeting, and recorded on its minutes, and represent it unequivocally as designed to "effect a uniformity of faith and discipline throughout the Society," rendering these words emphatic, as if they had been officially stated? What right had he, or any one else, to represent the design of the measure different from the exposition which was given to the meeting and its committee, and on which it was adopted? Did he derive his information from those who promoted it, or from those who were opposed to it? or did he supply the lack of information, by his own conjectures or prejudices? I conceive it would have been fair, if he had noticed the subject at all, to have stated its objects as was done to the meeting, or by the meeting itself.

As to a uniformity of faith and discipline, I do not recollect ever to have heard such an object stated by any Friend of the measure. A uniformity of discipline I know was mentioned, as desirable among the different Yearly Meetings; and no doubt it is, except as regards regulations of a local nature. But I well remember that when the subject was under consideration by the committee, appointed for that purpose, the individual who brought forward the proposition to the Yearly Meeting, distinctly stated, that a uniformity of discipline was not an object contemplated in the measure. A uniformity of faith, I think, was not mentioned, either by those who favoured, or those who opposed the proposition, at least I have no recollection of such a thing. The design of the Berean, therefore, is not very doubtful or obscure. The terms in which he expressed the objects of the Yearly Meeting of Ohio, were such as seemed more likely to create an excitement, than those adopted by that meeting itself. The readers of that paper have been so alarmed at the idea of creeds, doctrines, and fixed principles of religion, that their imaginations are very easily excited. And this state of mind has been taken advantage of, to the injury of a better judgment.

But after all the unfairness of the Berean, in representing the objects of the appointment of the general committee, will it be pretended that the disciplines of the different yearly meetings, as respects the general order of society, or those rules which concern the rights of members, ought to be diversified? Or that the different parts of it should hold different principles as to the essential doctrines of religion? In short, that the Society should be as much as possible divided and diversified, and as little as possible, in the condition of one body, speaking the same language, and minding the same thing? The apostle says there is but "one Lord, one faith, and one baptism." Will it then be said that we ought to have a plurality of faiths? or that it would be an intolerable grievance to us to have but one? The Society of Friends, as such, never have acknowledged but one faith; and they have always recognised the principle, that a departure from that faith, and the avowal of doctrines incompatible with it, was sufficient cause of disownment. For confirmation of this statement, the reader is referred to Barclay's Anarchy of the Ranters, an extract from which is given in the first number of the Repository. What then was the occasion of bringing forward this idea, in an objectionable point of view, and assigning it as the object for which the general committee was appointed by Ohio Yearly Meeting.

The objects of the appointment of the committee, as recorded on the minutes of the Yearly Meeting, are simply these: To bring "the different Yearly Meetings of Friends into a more intimate feeling with each other, on the general interests of our Society, by the appointment of committees, by such Yearly Meetings as may be prepared to enter into the measure, to meet together and take into consideration such subjects as may appear to claim their attention, and communicate to their respective Yearly Meetings, such propositions or advice as under best wisdom they may be prepared to give."

From this extract from the minutes of Ohio Yearly Meeting, it will be evident that these committees stand upon the common ground of committees, accountable to the body by which they were appointed; at liberty to take into consideration any subject relating to the general interest and welfare of the Society, and to spread their views before the different Yearly Meetings, which will dispose of such communications according to their best judgments, and in the full exercise of their present powers. These committees are to possess no coercive power, nor was it intended, when the proposition was brought forward, that they should be invested with any. Whatever measures may grow out of the deliberations of the committees, must become the acts of the respective Yearly Meetings, before they can be binding on the members,—hence the Yearly Meeting has suffered none of its original powers to pass from it, in a constitutional point of view.

Mutual assistance, under the qualifying aid of the holy Head of the church, is the great object for which we enter into religious society, and for which our meetings of various grades, both for worship and discipline, have been established. In thus coming together, in these meetings, from the particular to the yearly meeting, when there is a right engagement of mind, a qualification has been afforded for the strengthening one another's hands in the discharge of their respective duties. The several parts of the body, so brought together or connected by these bonds, have been "brought into a more intimate feeling with each other." It is but the same principle which is acted upon in the measure adopted by Ohio Yearly Meeting. It is proposed for committees from the different Yearly Meetings, to meet together on this same ground of gospel love and Christian fellowship, and with the same dependence on the Great Head of the church, for ability for every good word and work. And whatever in this may be opened to their minds, as tending to the benefit of the whole, or any part of the church militant, they may communicate, as above mentioned, resting its adoption on the evidence of truth, with which it may be clothed. Where now, I would ask, is the inconsistency of this measure, or what the danger to be apprehended from it?

The principle is clearly the same as that which first gathered us to be a people, and by which we must be kept together, if the bonds of religious society be not totally separated.

As to the "much opposition" spoken of in the Berean, it can be true only as respects a few individuals. This opposition, whether we call it little or much, was made when the subject was first opened in the meeting, and before there had been time and opportunity for it to be considered and correctly understood. The friends of the measure did not wish it to be at once adopted, but considered. This was opposed, and it was even stated as an objection against this reasonable course, that if it were referred to a committee for consideration, it would be adopted! There seemed to be a consciousness that the objections, which were discoverable in the minds of some present, could not bear the test of cool and dispassionate examination. The judgment of the meeting was, that it should be referred for consideration to a committee; even those who had objected to the proposition, mostly concurring in this course. A committee was accordingly appointed; those who had opposed it taking an active part in this appointment, and placing on it such as they thought proper. The subject was laid before the women's meeting, and with remarkable unanimity referred to a committee. In this joint committee the subject was discussed with freedom, which resulted in a report recommending the adoption of the measure. This report was adopted; and if there was any opposition in the meeting at that time, it was so little as not to be recollected by those of whom I have inquired, (for being ill, I was not at meeting.) But it is recollected, that when the meeting was considering the manner in which it should be communicated to other Yearly Meetings, and a postscript was prepared for that purpose, it was mentioned in that postscript, that the proposition had been "very feelingly united with." And the very individual who made the first and the most opposition to the measure, proposed that after the words just quoted, it should be said "by Friends generally," which addition was accordingly made. The committee appointed to consider the subject, were directed to bring forward the names of suitable persons, to be appointed to carry the objects into effect.

And yet the Berean tells his readers "it was carried over the heads of the members."

At the Yearly Meeting in Indiana, the same subject was taken up; and at first, objections were made to it. It was referred to a committee, that its nature might be explained, and the propriety of adopting it fully considered. In this committee, as was the case at Ohio Yearly Meeting, individuals were put on the appointment, who were understood to be opposed to the proposition. But on a free and calm discussion of it in this committee, objections were removed; the individual who had said the most against it, confessed he had been mistaken, and was glad to find his mistake; and another expressed his belief, that if it could be explained to the meeting as it had been to the committee, there was not an individual who would object to it. A report was finally prepared, recommending the measure; one solitary individual expressing that he did not see the propriety of it, but at the same time informing them that he submitted to the judgment of the rest. When the report was presented to the meeting, if there was any opposition at all, it was so little that I have no recollection of it. It was adopted, and a committee appointed to carry the object into effect, and information directed to be given to the other Yearly Meetings.

Thus much I have thought it proper to say in relation to the subject, in order to correct misrepresentations.

The spirit of war is not less unfriendly to moral virtue, the progress of the arts and sciences, and the real love of our country, than hostile to the Christian religion. The tendency of national wars is, to abridge the liberty of the subject, and convert free into despotic states.

DILLWYN.

FOR THE FRIEND.

ELISHA BATES AND THE BEREAN.

Most of our readers have probably read or heard of the work of Elisha Bates, entitled "The Doctrines of Friends, or Principles of the Christian Religion, as held by the Society of Friends." It has been well received, and much circulated among sound Friends, and contains, perhaps, the clearest and ablest exposition of our doctrines, which has been written in this country; an exposition which, it may be safely asserted, is in close agreement with, and is sustained by, that of Barclay, although in some respects varying from it in its mode of illustration. The work is also interesting as a literary performance. The style is, generally, clear and pure, and rises frequently into a dignity and elevation becoming the subject. It is, moreover, a production strictly indigenous of our western wilderness; written by a self-educated man, printed by the author, and manufactured in all its parts—types, paper, ink, and leather, beyond the mountains.

A small pamphlet by the same author, consisting chiefly of extracts from the writings of our early Friends on the divinity of Christ, the benefits of his coming, and the holy scriptures, &c. has, also, been generally approved, and widely circulated. Both these works were examined, and sanctioned by the meeting for sufferings of Ohio yearly meeting.

Soon after their publication, they became, in common with some other doctrinal writings, and particularly those of Joseph John Gurney, the subject of animadversion, in a paper called the Berean, which is edited and published in Wilmington, Delaware, by some of the separatists from the Society of Friends.

The remoteness of Elisha Bates's residence, enabled the writers of the Berean to continue their remarks for some time, without any reply on his part. But it was in an evil hour for the credit of the Berean, that it attacked these works. Elisha Bates commenced the publication of a monthly journal, entitled "The Miscellaneous Repository," in which he has replied to his reviewers with such keen argument and good temper, and has so exposed the unfairness of their attack, that they have reason to repent of their onset. We think it an act of justice to a most estimable friend, to give his defence a wider circulation than it has yet obtained; for we have never seen a more triumphant vindication than this of Elisha Bates. We shall render a further service to the cause of truth, by enabling our readers to estimate for themselves, the want of fairness and liberality—the personalities—the false reasonings, and false assumptions of the Berean.

Through the kindness of one of the subscribers to the Berean, (a paper published in Wilmington,) the second volume of that work has recently been placed in my hands. I have not yet had an opportunity of perusing the numbers subsequent to the close of that volume.

This work contains a laboured opposition to the "Doctrines of Friends," and the pamphlet entitled "Extracts," &c. These "Reviews," begun in the 9th month, 1825, do not appear to be closed in the 2d vol. and may, for any thing I know to the contrary, be continued to the present time. I was pretty soon apprised of this attack; but it did not appear to be material that any public notice should be taken of it, till the writers should have time to develop their views, and discover what doctrines they intended to oppose, and what to advocate. As that opportunity has now been fully afforded, it seems due to the cause of truth, to myself, and the Society of which I am a member, to point out some of the numerous errors into which the writer or writers have fallen.

It is a common privilege of authors, to defend themselves when arraigned before the public; yet my aversion to controversy is such, that those motives which merely relate to myself, would be altogether insufficient to induce me to enter into it; and more especially, as the manner of the attack necessarily leads to the notice of much unfairness in these reviews.

But this is no new thing. It was the case in the attacks made on the Society of Friends in the early periods of its history. And it is some consolation to my mind, that I have before me the examples of the worthy instruments of that day, who were not only firm in the belief, but ready in the support, of the doctrines of the gospel.

The reader will do well to bear in mind, that the "Doctrines of Friends," and the pamphlet of "Extracts," &c. were intended to give a concise view of the principles of the Christian religion, as held by the Society of Friends. If, therefore, I had sufficient ground from the acknowledged doctrinal writings of the Society, for the different tenets which have become the objects of attack, the objections must be considered as fully answered, or as resting, not against the works I have published, but those by which they are supported. This, then, will be a prominent object which I shall keep in view, reserving to myself the privilege of a future decision, how far I shall go in a defence of the principles held by our friends in earlier and in latter time, or into an investigation of the sentiments propagated by the Berean. As already hinted, the manner in which the attack has been made, will impose on me the unpleasant task of noticing a number of cases of unfair and uncandid representations, which have been made in the Berean.

The pamphlet of "Extracts" was the first that was brought under review; but what relates to the PRINCIPLES contained in this essay may, in the general, be very properly deferred till we come to the review of the "Doctrines." It would not be proper, however, to pass over some other subjects of minor importance. The first of this description that I shall notice, is an idea suggested in the first article, p. 73, vol. 2, and relates to what is said in the pamphlet of the divinity of Christ. "Is it not, therefore," says he, "greatly to be deplored, that the Meeting for Sufferings of Ohio Yearly Meeting should have formally sanctioned the publication of a work, which, however pure the motives of its author, is calculated to scatter the seeds of controversy, and agitate the peaceful regions of the west? A controversy which has neither points nor limits, nor bowels of charity. A controversy always fatal to the peace of the church and to the gospel of Christ, which breathes nothing but good will to men." This controversy, however indefinite, and however uncharitable, however subversive of the peace of the church and the gospel of Christ, has been in his own hands from that time to the present, and he has pursued it with a zeal that deserved a better cause. It is now considerably in the second year that he has been prosecuting this warfare, so appropriately characterized by himself, while I have been patiently awaiting the result, and now step forward to correct a few of his mistakes and misrepresentations, lest my silence might be construed into an acquiescence, and thus contribute to fix wrong impressions on unsuspecting minds.

The writer proceeds,—"The author lays great stress on opinions: 'Great is the importance,' he says, 'of opinions;' and one object of this work, he informs us, is to prevent 'diversity of opinions' in religious society. But is uniformity in religious opinions attainable? I leave it to history to answer the question. Inquisitions, and dungeons, the rack and the gibbet, and the stake, have done their utmost, and failed." The first remark that I shall make on this passage is, that I have not been able to find in the pamphlet the sentence which he has given as a direct quotation from it. But as the sentiment is true in itself, it is POSSIBLE I may have said so, if not in the pamphlet, at least some where else. I think, however, it is MANUFACTURED out of the following sentence, which occurs in the third page of the Extracts: "Great is the influence of PRINCIPLES on our feelings; and consequently our preservation and improvement have a very intimate relation to the doctrines and opinions we hold." If the quotation in the Berean was given instead of this, the writer can have no apology for his procedure. If it should be said that the meaning is not changed, then I ask why change the language? But it is not conceded that the meaning of the two sentences is the same. The contrast is obvious to a superficial observer. Little did I suppose, when I wrote this sentence, that any one would be disposed to call it in question. The sentiment is so evident in itself, as to stand above the most carping criticism. The consciousness of this, I apprehend, was the cause of the unwarrantable liberty he has taken, to change the language, that it might be more easily rendered objectionable.

But, after all, what has he gained by the procedure? Opinions are either of importance or they are not. If they are of importance, why endeavour to render the idea odious? If they are not, why did he trouble himself about the opinions published in the pamphlet and Doctrines? Why wage so long a warfare against opinions, if opinions are of no importance? But the subject may be placed on much more substantial ground; for if opinions are of no importance, it makes no difference what opinions we entertain of our moral and religious obligations, or any of the doctrines of religion—even the existence and attributes of the Deity. Did the Berean intend to take this ground? If it should be said he only intended to impress the importance of PRACTICE, I answer, that I had never called this in question; and it was a very ill-judged method of enforcing the importance of practice, to call in question "the influence of PRINCIPLES on our feelings." I leave it, however, to the candid reader to decide, whether there does not APPEAR to have been another object. By changing "the influence of PRINCIPLES on our feelings," into the importance of opinions, and this again into UNIFORMITY in religious opinions, and connecting this with the "inquisitions, and dungeons, the rack, the gibbet, and the stake," it is probable some weak minds might be induced to identify my motives in publishing the pamphlet, with the feelings of those who resorted to these horrid engines of cruelty, to enforce a uniformity in religious opinions. If this was his intention, it was an unworthy measure; if it was not, he might have spared himself the trouble of making such a parade of the implements of cruelty and death.

FOR THE FRIEND.

Amid the difficulties and trials of the present day, encouragement is often to be found in recurring to the history of the church in former ages. The declaration of our blessed Saviour, that in this world his followers "should have trouble," their constant and unvarying experience has fully verified; but it is also cause of grateful acknowledgment, whilst making this retrospection, to observe, that the gracious promise, that in Him "they should have peace," has also been completely and joyfully fulfilled. The present trials of our Society, though perhaps greater in degree, are not different in kind, from those of our worthy predecessors; and the faithful advocates of the cause and testimony of our holy Redeemer may now have cause of reverent and humble hope, that as the Church in early days was protected by his power, and brought through all her conflicts by his mighty arm, so now a deliverance will be witnessed from that destroying libertine spirit, which has threatened to sweep away all ancient landmarks in its impetuous torrent.

The following epistle of T. Ellwood is worthy of the serious perusal of all the readers of "The Friend."

If it had been written at the present time, and designed to meet the present state of society, it could scarcely have been more appropriate. He describes the spirit causing the difficulties of his day, as being an enemy of good order, resisting proper government and control, calling it imposition and oppression, and that when the discontented party found they could not obtain the sway, they then made disturbances in meetings, inducing the light and frivolous members to join with them, and progressing from one degree to another, they lapsed at last, to use his own words, in divers places, into "an open defection, apostasy, and separation." They then proceeded to cause further disturbances and divisions amongst Friends, to print false and malicious books, and at last to shut Friends out of their meeting houses. T. E. then proceeds to express his belief, that some had gone off, through "affection to some of those leading separatists," and were deceived by fair words and "feigned speeches;" but he earnestly expostulates with all classes in society to beware, how, from any motives whatever, they were drawn in the least degree to participate in this dividing disorderly spirit. It further appears, to complete an exact parallel to the present state of affairs, that the separatists then, as now, made great boast of their numbers, but T. Ellwood reminded them, that when Jeroboam set up his separate altar, ten out of twelve tribes joined him, yet it was said of him, that it was he "who made Israel to sin;" and further reminded them of the divine injunction, "Not to follow a multitude to do evil."

We need not, however, make a further analysis of this interesting epistle; it will speak for itself; and though of considerable length, will amply repay a serious and attentive perusal.

The Epistle is to be found in the Life of T. E., commencing at page 369, and is addressed to Friends generally. After touching upon some other points, accompanied with pertinent admonitions, he thus proceeds:

"Great hath been the hurt which the enemy hath done in this day, by leading into a false freedom, and crying up a wrong liberty: for under this pretence have crept in great disorders, some running out one way, and some another; some mixing in marriages with the world's people, and some going to the priest to be married. And many loose and unclean spirits have shrouded themselves under this plausible pretence of being left to their liberty, unto whom truth's order is irksome and uneasy; and they kick against it, and call it imposition, because it checks their licentious liberty. Therefore all, who join with their plea, examine and try what liberty it is ye claim and stand for: for the true liberty is not inconsistent with the cross of Christ, nor repugnant to his yoke; but agrees with it, and is obtained through it, and maintained by it. And none whom the Son hath made free indeed, will, or can plead, or make use of that liberty in opposition to any means, which the God of order hath appointed, or set up in his church, for the keeping out confusion, disorder, and looseness. And hereby all may take a right measure, and may certainly know what kind of liberty that is, which some have so hotly contended for, in opposition to that necessary and commendable order, which God hath led his people into, and which the enemy, in his agents, labours so hard to lead them out of. For the enemy well knows that the tendency and service thereof is to detect and discover his secret workings, and to bring his deeds to light and judgment; and therefore he strives with might and main to overturn it, crying out through his instruments,

Away with your order, let every one be left to his liberty. By which seemingly fair and specious plea, not only the loose, disorderly, factious spirits have been let up, and encouraged to greater boldness and licentiousness; but some simple and well-meaning Friends also, not seeing the design of Satan therein, have been misled thereby, and made use of by the enemy, and the more subtle of his instruments, to oppose the good order of truth. Thus hath the enemy wrought, and sought to lay waste the work of the Lord. But the Lord, (magnified be his holy name,) hath not been wanting to his people, who in sincerity of heart have diligently waited on him, and trusted in him; for he hath all along raised up some, whose eyes he hath opened to see the design and working of the evil one; and whose spirits he hath engaged to stand up in a faithful testimony against him, contending for the way of truth. Which when they, in whom the enemy wrought, perceived, and found they could not run over the heads of Friends, and carry things on as themselves pleased, they set themselves, in a heady wilful spirit, to raise disturbances in meetings for business, by encouraging and abetting such heady, loose, contentious and disorderly persons as would join with them: thus hardening themselves, and provoking the Lord to give them up to blindness and hardness of heart, till at length the enemy prevailed so far upon them, as to work them by degrees from discontent to prejudice, then to enmity, and so at length, in divers places, to an open defection, apostasy, and separation.

"Now, although I know, my dear friends, that ye who have kept your habitation in the light of the Lord, and whose eye is single therein, have a clear sight and understanding that the spirit, which has thus wrought and fought against the truth, is not, nor can be, of God, but is of the wicked one; and although the fruits it hath brought forth, through the agents and instruments in and by which it hath wrought, viz. Making disturbances in meetings, to the breaking the Church's peace; causing divisions amongst Friends; publishing to the world most wicked, malicious, railing, and scandalous books, against Friends, (an effect of the greatest enmity,) shutting and keeping Friends out of their common meeting houses, in which they have a just right and property, and not suffering them to meet therein, (which is a part of the persecution inflicted on Friends by the world,) and at length also set up separate meetings, in opposition to the meetings of God's people: although, I say, these fruits are sufficient of themselves to discover and manifest, to an unclouded mind, what spirit that is, and must needs be, which hath brought them forth; yet inasmuch as some, partly through weakness of judgment, and partly through personal affection to some of those leading separatists, are yet in danger to be betrayed by their fair words and feigned speeches, wherewith they lie in wait to deceive, I feel a concern remain upon my spirit, in the love of God, to warn all such, that they join not with nor give countenance unto that spirit, that hath thus wrought against the Lord, and against his people.

"For, Friends, in the holy fear of the living God, and in the openings of the spring of his pure life in my soul, at this time, and from the certain knowledge and clear demonstration which I have received from him therein; I testify and declare unto you, that this spirit, which in this day hath run out, and hath drawn out some into opposition against the way and work of the Lord, into division and separation from the people of the Lord, and from the holy assemblies which the Lord hath gathered, and by his powerful presence hath owned, and daily doth own; this spirit, I say, is the same with that which hath formerly wrought, in other appearances, against the truth in our time; and is the same with that spirit that wrought against the work of the Lord in the days of the holy apostles. This mystery of iniquity then wrought, and caused many to turn aside, and to leave the right way of the Lord, and to forsake the assemblies of God's people, Heb. x. 25. Yea, and to run into separation too, Jude 19. Upon whom the Holy Ghost hath set this brand, that they were sensual, having not the Spirit. And many close and sharp testimonies did the Lord give forth through his servants in that day, against this spirit, and against those that were joined to it, and acted by it, as may be seen in the Holy Scriptures.

FOR THE FRIEND.

It was with much surprise that I read the following letter from Elias Hicks in one of the newspapers of the last week. Had it contained a sincere recantation of the errors which the writer has notoriously avowed in relation to the subject of which it treats, I should have rejoiced to see it; but as it involves a flat contradiction of assertions which he has repeatedly made, both publicly and privately, I cannot but admire that his friends should have been so inconsiderate as to make it public, and thus expose the weakness and inconsistency of the author. Inasmuch, however, as it is designed to discredit the statements of persons of undoubted piety and veracity, it is proper that it should be contrasted with the sentiments which Elias Hicks has previously expressed, and on which the charge of his doubting or denying the miraculous conception of our blessed Lord is founded. The letter is as follows, viz.

LETTER

From ELIAS HICKS, in reply to one addressed to him on the subject of the reports in circulation of his disbelieving in the miraculous conception and birth of JESUS CHRIST.

JERICO, 13th of 12th mo. 1827.

Friend Harvey Frink.—Thy note of the 6th instant came duly to hand, and in answer thereto, I may observe that Scribes and Pharisees are the same in every age:—thou hast read how they belied the blessed son of the virgin, our great and holy pattern, and perfect example. And the Scribes and Pharisees of the present day, are following their example, by spreading lies and evil reports concerning those who are endeavouring faithfully to come up in his example and precepts; for it seems to be the only medium that some men have to exalt themselves, by continually finding fault with those that are much better than themselves, and as truth will not gratify their envy, they make lies their refuge; which is the case in the present instance, as I never thought nor said that I disbelieved the account given by the evangelist respecting the miraculous conception and birth of Jesus Christ; and thou may be fully assured, that whoever has reported it, has reported an absolute falsehood; and may the Lord forgive them the dreadful fault, for they know not what they do.—And even if the thing was true, as thou observest, it raised the prejudice against the society, and was doing harm, hence the reporters could have no good in view, but only to gratify their own envy, which is the case with all tale-bearers and detractors of other men's persons. Well might the wise man say, "The words of a tale-bearer are as wounds, and he that repeateth a matter, separateth very friends;" and that, with the envious spirit that produced it, is the only cause of all the discord and dissension that now prevail in our once peaceful and favoured society. How dead and destitute such creatures must be, of that charity, that, the apostle tells us, covers the multitude of faults. This being the present needful, I conclude.

Thy assured friend, ELIAS HICKS.

There is a spirit of angry invective and bitterness evinced in this letter, which must strike even the most careless readers, notwithstanding the awkward attempt to conceal it. It breathes a temper the most opposite to that in which we can sincerely desire the forgiveness of our enemies, and proves that the author was under great irritation and excitement when he penned it. After so freely bestowing the epithet of Pharisees on others, and charging them with "spreading lies, evil reports, and absolute falsehood;" and "making lies their refuge to gratify their envy," he should have paused before he quoted the sublime language of the Redeemer of the world, and queried with himself, whether, in the sight of the great Searcher of hearts, he was free from those evil surmisings, and those angry passions, which are so directly incompatible with the meek and lowly temper of Him, who, when he was reviled, reviled not again. The language of the letter is not unlike that used by one of old, who thought himself "endeavouring faithfully to come up in" all the ordinances of the law, and thanked God that he was not as other men were, nor even as the poor publican. "How dead and destitute must succ creatures be," who are "continually finding fault with me, Elias Hicks, who am so much better than themselves." We search the letter in vain for any evidences of the meekness, the humility, or the gentleness of the Christian. "How destitute" is its language "of that charity that the apostle tells us, covers the multitude of faults." What haughty contempt is conveyed by the expression "such creatures!!" and how self-complacent is the assumption that he, Elias Hicks, is so much better than those who cannot conscientiously concur with his opinions. How different is its whole tenor from the mild and amiable spirit of the primitive believers, who could say, "being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it; being defamed, we entreat."

But it is time to adduce the proof that Elias Hicks has both doubted and denied the miraculous conception and birth of Jesus Christ. In a letter to Thomas Willis, dated 10th mo. 1821, and which has been published and reviewed, he says:

"Now, in his creed, (the bishop of Rome,) to which he made all the nations of Europe bow by the dint of the sword, was this of the miraculous birth; therefore, all children for several hundred years, were brought up and educated in this belief, without any examination in regard to its correctness. Finding this to be the case, I examined the account given on this subject by the four evangelists, and according to my best judgment on the occasion, I was led to think there was considerable more scripture evidence for his being the son of Joseph than otherwise;"—"But when we consider that He (Jesus Christ) was born of a woman that was joined in lawful wedlock with a man of Israel, it would seem that it must shut the way to the enforcing any such belief, (as that he was miraculously conceived,) as all their neighbours would naturally be led to consider him the son of Joseph, and this it appears very clear they did, by scripture testimony; and although it has not, as above observed, given cause, as yet, to alter my views on the subject, as tradition is a mighty bulwark, not easily removed; yet it has had this salutary effect, to deliver me from judging my brethren and fellow creatures who are in that belief, (that is, who deny the miraculous conception) and can feel the same flow of love and unity with them, as though they were in the same belief with myself; neither would I dare to say positively that it would be my mind, they should change their belief, unless I could give them much greater evidence than I am at present possessed of, as I consider, in regard to our salvation, they are both non-essentials; and I may further add, that I believe it would be much greater sin in me, to smoke tobacco that was the produce of the labour of slaves, than it would be to believe either of these positions"—(in other words, much greater sin than to believe that Jesus Christ was the son of Joseph.)

My readers will observe, that, after an examination of the accounts of the birth of Christ given by the evangelists, according to his best judgment on the occasion, Elias Hicks was led to think there was considerable more scripture evidence for Christ's being the son of Joseph, than in favour of the miraculous conception. It is evident, therefore, that he must have disbelieved the narratives of Matthew and Luke, which are plain and positive as to the latter fact. He further says, he would not dare to say that those who disbelieve the miraculous conception, should change their belief, unless he could give them much greater evidence than he is at present possessed of—that is, much greater evidence than that of Matthew and Luke, from which it is apparent that he disbelieved their account.

The sermons of Elias Hicks also furnish conclusive proofs that he disbelieves the miraculous conception.

In the one preached at Arch street in 1825, speaking of Jesus Christ, he says, "We cannot suppose that it was the outward body of flesh and blood that was begotten of God, but a birth of the spiritual life in the soul. We must apply it internally and spiritually. For nothing can be a Son of God but that which is Spirit, and nothing but the soul of man is a recipient for the light and Spirit of God. Therefore, nothing can be a Son of God, but that which is immortal and invisible. Nothing visible can be a Son of God."—"By the analogy of reason, spirit cannot beget a material body, because the thing begotten must be of the same nature with its father. Spirit cannot beget any thing but spirit; it cannot beget flesh and blood. No, my friends, it is impossible." Philadelphia Sermons, page 10.

In this passage, preached in a public meeting in Philadelphia, before some hundreds of witnesses; taken down in short hand, and published by Elias Hicks's friends, the miraculous conception is denied no less than eight times—it is declared, moreover, to be impossible. He asserts that spirit cannot beget a material body; it cannot beget flesh and blood; consequently, all pretence to truth in the narratives of the evangelists is totally discarded. Yet, in the face of these declarations, delivered in a religious assembly, while standing in the solemn character of a minister of religion, and under the profession of speaking from immediate revelation; he now comes forward and declares, that whoever has reported that he disbelieved the account of the evangelists, has asserted an absolute falsehood. He makes this assertion, too, in the face of the world, with these proofs to the contrary staring him in the face. I am perfectly willing to leave every reader to judge for himself, how far Elias Hicks "disbelieved the account of the evangelist, respecting the miraculous conception and birth of Jesus Christ;" and to decide, moreover, where his charge of "spreading lies and absolute falsehoods," and "making lies their refuge," must finally rest.

The testimony I have adduced is conclusive, but I may add, that it is corroborated by the evidence of at least eight individuals of the highest respectability and veracity, to whom he has declared, at different times, similar sentiments; and to one of them, he positively asserted, that the narratives of Matthew and Luke, respecting the miraculous conception, were fabulous. LUTHER.

A PASTORAL HYMN.

"Gentle pilgrim, tell me why
Dost thou fold thine arms and sigh,
And wistful cast thine eyes around?—
Whither, pilgrim, art thou bound?"
"The road to Zion's gates I seek;
If thou canst inform me, speak."
"Keep yon right hand path with care,
Though crags obstruct, and brambles tear;
You just discern a narrow track—
Enter there, and turn not back."
"Say, where that pleasant pathway leads,
Winding down yon flowery meads?
Song or dance the way beguiles,
Every face is drest in smiles."
"Shun with care that flowery way;
'Twill lead thee, pilgrim, far astray."
"Guide or counsel do I need?"
"Pilgrim, he who runs may read."
"Is the way that I must keep,
Crossed by waters wide and deep?"
"Did it lead through flood or fire, Thou must not stop—thou must not tire."
"Till I have my journey past,
Tell me, will the daylight last?
Will the sky be bright and clear
Till the evening shades appear?"
"Though the sun now rides so high,
Clouds may veil the evening sky;
Fast sinks the sun, fast wears the day,
Thou must not stop—thou must not stay:
God speed thee, pilgrim, on thy way!"

It is somewhat singular, that the deleterious effects of an article so generally in use as charcoal, when burned in confined places, should not be better known, and guarded against. Repeated are the instances of loss of life, from this cause, which are noticed in the papers, yet numerous as are the fatal results, it has so far failed in rendering persons more cautious in the use of this convenient material for fire. Some two weeks since, a vessel from Salem county was oystering in Delaware Bay, and in the evening one of the persons on board, Zebulon Somers, lighted a charcoal fire in the cabin, and laid himself down to sleep; a short time after another of the hands went into the cabin with the same intent, and after having laid some time, and feeling the oppressiveness of the air of the room, without knowing the cause, he got up and went on deck. After a short time he returned to the cabin with a light, and found poor Somers a corpse! The deceased was a respectable man: and has left a wife and two children to mourn this unlooked for affliction.

New York Canal Revenue.—The amount of toll collected on the Erie and Champlain canals for the past year, amounts to $859,059 48. The amount collected in 1826, was $762,003 60: showing an increase of $97,054 88 cents. The aggregate of 1827 is $9000 more than the estimate of the commissioners of the canal board, and $11,000 less than that of the canal commissioners.—Albany Argus.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH, 26, 1828.

A few days since, a friend put into our hands a paper published in this city, containing an article purporting to be a letter from Elias Hicks to Harvey Frink. We will not say that we doubted its genuineness; but, on reading it, the thought occurred, that one might very reasonably entertain scruples on that head; it might really seem incredible, that, adverting to Elias Hicks's general reputation for truth, he could so far be off his guard, as thus to place himself before the public, in direct contradiction to his own written declarations. But, admitting the letter to have been his, surely, it might be thought, he could never have been so indiscreet as to sanction its publication, and it might well be conjectured, that the printing of it is attributable rather to an ill-directed ebullition of zeal on the part of his friends. Independently of the dilemma in which it is calculated to place him, in what way could it possibly subserve his ends?—to restrict himself to a denial of a minor and collateral charge, is, by implication, to admit in full force, the more weighty and important ones. And who are the persons struck at under the coarse epithets which he has thought fit to use, but those constituting the great body of the Society of Friends, who have not been disposed to abandon the ancient ground of faith and discipline? including many now venerable in years, who stand as way marks to others for the consistency of their lives, and not a few who lived to enter their solemn protests against his antichristian principles, but have since finished their course with joy, and are now receiving the reward of their faithfulness in the habitations of eternal blessedness. In short, on the supposition that Elias Hicks had no hand in the publication of this letter, well might he exclaim, in the bitterness of his heart, "for it was not an enemy that did this, then I could have borne it"—or with him of Uz, "ye dig a pit for your friend."

We had written the foregoing previous to reading the more ample and able strictures of Luther, which our readers will find on another page. It is with unfeigned reluctance that we have so often to discuss the errors of this aged man; but, inseparably connected as he is with a combination, the systematic energies of which are levelled against the foundations of the dearest hopes of man, and voluntarily placing himself as in the "fore front" of the phalanx, he has no just grounds of complaint. We have no personal hostility to him; our early predilections would lead to the reverse of this; we have no controversy with him or any one else, as to the right of every man to think for himself on points of belief; but, we feel it incumbent to avail ourselves of every fair and fit occasion, plainly to distinguish between the new sect, and the legitimate body of Friends, and to vindicate the latter from any participation in the novel tenets of the former. If they will persist in a separation from the parent stock, be it so; but let them stand before the world in their distinct and appropriate character. It would be an anomaly in religious community for them to remain in connexion with principles intrinsically and fundamentally discordant.

In the article "Agricultural Enterprise" of our last number, we were incorrect in stating that Ury was the birth place of Robert Barclay. Accounts differ on this point; but on consulting a volume containing a history of his life, &c., it appears that he was born at Gordonstown in the shire of Murray, Scotland.

"The Hermit of Coaquannock"* is cordially welcome to our columns, and we shall be pleased to hear from him as often as may comport with his habits of seclusion; we were gratified with the tone of his observations, and however ascetical may be his notions generally, he has certainly betrayed no want of liberality in his views on this occasion. We like particularly his remarks relative to the selections under the head of "The English Classic;" for that part of the arrangement of "The Friend" we entertain a decided partiality, and with all due deference to the objections which have been suggested by several, we nevertheless believe, that these are more than counterbalanced by what may be said in its favour. It is true, it would not be best to administer them in too large doses, but half a page or so, thus appropriated, and with occasional intermissions, certainly cannot be reasonably opposed; but, on the contrary, we should apprehend, would be generally relished by our readers, especially as, from our opinion of the judgment of the individual who superintends the selection, we have confidence that it will be managed with good taste, and with a proper regard to an agreeable diversity, both as to the manner and the matter.

Important Decision.—The judges of the supreme court have decided that the city of Philadelphia has legal jurisdiction over the island in the river Delaware, opposite the city.

It appears from the President's Message, that our national concerns, generally, stand well. All our foreign relations are favourable to peace and harmony. Should we duly estimate our national advantages, and improve them as the means of perpetuating an enlightened freedom, we shall have good reason to make the inquiry, anciently made respecting Israel, "What nation is there so great, which hath God so nigh unto them?"—Christian Watchman.

FROM THE RICHMOND WHIG.

Gentlemen—Since I first communicated to you the powers of the liverwort in one case, I have had an opportunity of witnessing its extraordinary action in a number of others; and it has fully sustained its character in every case wherein I have administered or recommended it. Not very distant from this place, I am personally acquainted with several individuals, of both sexes, who have been restored by it. And here I will advert to one particularly:

A man, not more than ten or twelve miles from here, was so far spent by profuse discharges of pus from his lungs, wasting night sweats, and hectic fever, that his attendants and friends were several times making preparations towards interring him.

In this hopeless condition he was, by way of dernier resort, almost forced to take the liverwort; it promptly acted upon him as a tonic and alterative—giving him a keen appetite, clearing his cough, his night sweats, his hectic fever, and, finally, every symptom of his complaint; and about three weeks since, when I last saw him, he was enjoying fine health and spirits. There is something very remarkable in this little plant; in every instance, it soon exerts a positive influence over the cough and expectoration, quickly invigorates the stomach, and acts very sensibly upon the kidneys, or as a smart diuretic; in short, it some how or other seems to revolutionize the whole system.

I have been familiar with every form and degree of pulmonary consumption for more than twenty years, yet have I never seen any thing act like this in one single case of it. The liverwort has actually cured a hereditary phthisis in a man of Loudoun county, Va. whose whole family nearly had died of consumption derived from the same cause.

ANTEDILUVIAN FOSSIL REMAINS.

Every fresh proof of the credibility of the holy scriptures is acceptable. The restless mind of man is ever seeking some new thing, and testimony often repeated, though it be perfectly sound and conclusive, too often makes but a faint impression upon him, compared with reasonings bearing the enticing stamp of novelty. Perhaps among the many facts highly interesting to the votary of truth, which modern science is continually developing, none occupies a more important place, than the light recently thrown upon the Egyptian hieroglyphics. But if the researches of learning have rendered these relics of antiquity valuable, as confirming the correctness of scripture history, in several particulars heretofore disputed; the annexed account (taken from a late publication) of successful labour in a widely different field, will not be deemed of small value, as corroborating the history of the deluge handed down to us in the writings of the inspired penman. It is additionally satisfactory, as the fruit of a science, which sciolists and infidels have proudly asserted to oppose many and invincible objections to the Mosaic theory.

"In the year 1822, Dr. Buckland read a memoir before the Royal Society, announcing the discovery of a singular cave at Kirkdale in Yorkshire, containing an assemblage of fossil remains, &c. with a comparative view of five similar caverns in various parts of England, and others on the continent." "The position of the cave is at the south and lower extremity of Hodge Beck dale, at the point where it falls into the vale of Pickering. It occurs in that species of limestone which is usually perforated by irregular holes and caverns intersecting them in all directions." "It is important to observe, that the elevation of the cave above the bed of the Hodge Beck being nearly eighty feet, excludes the possibility of our attributing the muddy sediment we shall find it to contain, to any land flood or extraordinary rise of the waters of this or of any other river in the neighbourhood." "It was not till the summer of 1821, that the existence of any animal remains, or of the cavern containing them, was suspected. At this time, in continuing the operations of a large quarry, the workmen accidentally intersected the mouth of a long hole closed externally with rubbish, and overgrown with grass and bushes. As this rubbish was removed before any competent person had examined it, it is not certain whether it was composed of diluvial gravel and rolled pebbles, or was simply the debris that had fallen from the softer portions of the strata that lay above it: the workman, however, who removed it, and some gentlemen who saw it, assured

Dr. Buckland that it was composed of gravel and sand. In the interior of the cavern, our indefatigable geologist could not find a single rolled pebble, nor has he ever seen one bone or fragment of bone, that bore the slightest mark of having been rolled by the action of water.

"The original entrance is said to have been very small; and having been filled up as above described, there could not have been any admission of external air through it to the interior of the cavern. Nearly thirty feet of its outer extremity have now been removed, and the present entrance is a hole in the perpendicular face of a quarry, about three feet high, and five broad, which it is only possible for a man to enter on his hands and knees, and which expands and contracts itself irregularly, from two to seven feet in breadth, and two to fourteen feet in height. On entering the cave, the first thing observed, was a sediment of soft mud or loam, covering entirely its whole bottom to the average depth of about a foot, and concealing the subjacent rock, or actual floor of the cavern. Not a particle of mud was found attached either to the sides or roof; nor was there a trace of it adhering to the sides or upper portions of the transverse fissures, or any thing to suggest the idea that it had been entered through them. The mud was covered by a stalagmitic crust, which had been formed by the dripping of water impregnated with calcareous matter, as is common in all the cavities of limestone; but it is important to remark, that there was not any alternation of mud with any repeated beds of stalagmite, but simply a partial deposit of the latter on the floor beneath; so that the mud was encased between an upper and under crust. It was chiefly in the lower part of the earthy sediment, and in the calcareous matter beneath it, that the animal remains were found. In the whole extent of the cave, only a very few large bones have been discovered that are tolerably perfect; most of them are broken into small angular fragments and chips, the greater part of which lay separately in the mud, whilst others were wholly or partially invested with stalagmite, and others again mixed with masses of still smaller fragments. In some few places, where the mud was shallow, and the heaps of teeth and bones considerable, parts of the latter were elevated some inches above the surface of the mud and its calcareous crust; and the upper ends thus projecting, have become thinly covered with calcareous drippings, whilst their lower extremities have no such incrustation, and have simply adhering to them the mud in which they have been imbedded. The teeth and bones which have been discovered in this cave, appear to have belonged to the hyæna, tiger, bear, wolf, fox, weasel, elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, horse, ox, deer, hare, rabbit, water-rat, mouse, raven, pigeon, lark, snipe, and a small species of duck. The bottom of the cave, on first removing the mud, was found to be strewed all over, like a dog kennel, from one end to the other, with hundreds of teeth and broken and splintered fragments of bones of all the animals above enumerated; scarcely a single bone has escaped fracture, with the exception of some of the more solid and hard bones of the foot. On some of these bones marks may be traced, which, on applying one to the other, appear exactly to fit the form of the canine teeth of the hyæna that occur in the cave. The hyæna's bones have been broken, and apparently gnawed equally with those of the other animals. Heaps of small splinters, and highly comminuted yet angular fragments of bone, mixed with teeth of all the varieties of animals above enumerated, lay in the bottom of the den, occasionally adhering together by calcareous cement. Not one skull is to be found entire, and it is so rare to find a large bone of any kind that has not been more or less broken, that there is no hope of obtaining materials for the construction of a single limb, and still less of an entire skeleton. The jaw bones, also, even of the hyænas, are broken to pieces like the rest. It must already appear probable, from the facts above described, particularly from the comminuted and gnawed condition of the bones, that the cave at Kirkdale was, during a long succession of years, inhabited as a den by hyænas, and that they dragged into its recesses the other animals whose remains are found indiscriminately mixed with their own; an hypothesis which is certainly strengthened by Dr. Buckland having found the excrement of the animal in the same cave. Should it be asked why we do not find at least the entire skeleton of the one or more hyænas that died last, and left no survivors to devour them, we find a sufficient reply to this question, in the circumstance of the probable destruction of the last individuals by the waters of the deluge. On the rise of these, had there been any hyænas in the den, they would have rushed out, and fled for safety to the hills; and if absent, they could not, by any possibility, have returned to it from the higher levels; that they were extirpated by the catastrophe, is obvious from the discovery of their bones in the diluvial gravel both of England and Germany. The accumulation of these bones, then, appears to have been a process of years, whilst all the animals in question were natives of this country. The general dispersion of bones of the same animals through the diluvial gravel of high latitudes, over a great part of the northern hemisphere, shows that the period in which they inhabited these regions, was that immediately preceding the formation of this gravel, and that they perished by the same waters that produced it. M. Cuvier has, moreover, ascertained that the fossil elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, and hyæna, belong to a species now unknown; and as there is no evidence that they have at any time, subsequent to the formation of the diluvium, existed in these regions, we may conclude that the period at which the bones of these distinct species were introduced into the cave at Kirkdale was before the deluge. Thus the phenomena of this cave seem referable to a period immediately antecedent to the general deluge, and in which the world was inhabited by land animals, almost all bearing a generic, and many a specific resemblance to those which now exist: but so completely has the violence of that tremendous convulsion destroyed and remodelled the form of the antediluvian surface, that it is only in caverns that have been protected from its ravages, that we may hope to find undisturbed evidence of events in the period immediately preceding it. It was indeed probable, before the discovery of this cave, from the abundance in which the remains of similar species occur in superficial gravel beds, which cannot be referred to any other than a diluvial origin, that such animals were the antediluvian inhabitants not only of this country, but generally of all those northern latitudes in which their remains are found, (but the proof was imperfect, as it was possible that they might have been drifted or floated hither by the waters from the warmer regions of the earth,) but the facts developed in this charnel house of the antediluvian forests of Yorkshire, demonstrate that there was a long succession of years, in which the elephant, rhinoceros, and hippopotamus, had been the prey of the hyænas, which, like themselves, inhabited England in the period immediately preceding the formation of the diluvial gravel. Dr. Buckland proceeds to point out the chronological inferences that may be derived from the state of the bones and of the mud and stalagmite, and to extract the following detail of events that have been going on successively within this curious cave:

"First, there appears to have been a period, (and from the small quantity of stalagmite found on the actual floor, a very short one,) during which the aperture in the rock existed in its present state, but was not tenanted by the hyænas.

"The second period was that during which the cave was inhabited by hyænas, and the stalactite and stalagmite were still forming.

"The third period is that at which the mud was introduced, and the animals extirpated, viz. the period of the deluge. It has been already stated, that there is no alternation of this mud with the beds of bone or of stalagmite, such as would have occurred had it been produced by land floods often repeated; once, and once only, it appears to have been introduced; and we may consider its vehicle to have been the turbid waters of the same inundation, that produced universally the diluvial gravel.

"The fourth period is that during which the stalagmite was deposited which invests the upper surface of the mud.

"We have attempted to give a slight sketch of the history of this curious cave, and of the important inferences to be deduced from its phenomena; rather with the hope of inducing the reader to peruse the interesting volume of Dr. Buckland, from which these extracts have been made, than of affording a full and satisfactory account of a discovery which has at once redeemed geology from the charge of fabricating theories inconsistent with divine revelations."

FOR THE FRIEND.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

The twenty-third report of this noble institution which is now before me, is replete with curious and valuable information. It is impossible to view the exertions which have been made within the last twenty years to spread the scriptures among every kindred and tongue and people, without being affected by the sublimity of the spectacle. Since its establishment in the year 1804, this society has issued five million two hundred and forty thousand copies of the Bible and Testament, and expended six and a quarter millions of dollars. It is the parent of about four thousand societies in the four quarters of the globe, for spreading the scriptures; and has printed, or assisted in translating and printing them, in one hundred and forty-seven languages and dialects; of which one hundred have received the precious volume for the first time at the hands of the society. Among the languages into which the Bible has been translated under its auspices, are the E-quimaux, the Mohawk, the Peruvian, the Bulom, or West African, the Namacqua, or South African, the Abyssinian, the Turkish, the Chinese, the Malay, the Tahaitian, and many of the dialects of Northern and Southern Asia.

The members of the Society of Friends, for reasons flowing from some of our peculiar testimonies, have stood very much aloof from an active participation in these societies. They are averse to the ceremonial worship and complimentary usages which are practised at the Bible meetings: they differ from many of their fellow Christians in considering the term "the Word" as peculiarly belonging to the Lord Jesus Christ, and therefore hesitate in joining associations which recognise the scriptures by this title. But it would be doing a serious injustice to our principles to suppose that we can be otherwise than deeply interested in the success of such a cause. It is true that it has suited the views of the leaders of a party, which has grown up from among us into a new sect, to decry the Bible Society as an engine of priestcraft and superstition. The denunciation of societies for spreading a knowledge of the scriptures, prepared the mind for that attack upon the book itself, which was necessary in order to reconcile their followers to the inconsistency of their new doctrines with those contained in the Bible. To denounce these institutions because men of fashion, or even of immoral habits, contribute to their funds, is puerile in the extreme; for there never was a society on earth which could bear to have its principles tried by the practice of all its members. And surely the Christian and disinterested labours of the men who have devoted their lives to this great work—the steadiness with which the Bible Society has pursued its course—the single eye which it has kept to the one object of its institution, are entitled to our warmest praise.

That an injudicious zeal has sometimes been displayed—that there has been too much parade in exhibiting the good they have effected—that their charity has often been misapplied, and their precious gift slighted and turned to scorn, and even bartered for trifling or vicious indulgences, cannot be denied. But the whole amount of these objections does not affect the question as to the usefulness of the Society. They apply to all human charities, and exist wherever man is to be found. And if ever there was an act of benevolence which might be said in scriptural language to be "cast upon the waters," it is that of translating and spreading the Bible.

The present report contains a minute history of the proceedings of the year 1826 and 1827. In the small space which can be allotted to this article in "The Friend," I shall only say, that the fervent piety, the unwearying industry, and tolerant spirit of some of the active members and agents of the society, can scarcely fail to draw down a blessing upon their labours. Some of the information contained in the report, particularly as relates to the Turkish dominions, will, I think, interest the readers of "The Friend."

Extracts of Letters from H. D. Leever, an agent of the Society.

CONSTANTINOPLE, March 9, 1826.

What I have mentioned in former letters concerning the existence of a sect among the Jews who believe that their Messiah is come, and that the obligation of the Mosaic law has ceased, is more fully confirmed to us. They believe that Jesus is their Messiah, and parties of them assemble together, by tens and twelves, (privately, however, "for fear of the Jews,") to read and discuss the New Testament. There can now be, I trust, no doubt, to what use our Hebrew Bibles and Testaments lately sold are turned. Here is, indeed, ample reason for rejoicing, and for thanksgiving to Almighty God, seasoned, however, with fear, and with prayer, that his light may not be extinguished by worldly fears and the persecution of their bigoted fellow countrymen. Mr. Wolff and myself met the other day one of these Jews, a physician, at an Armenian priest's house, to whom he had come to obtain further instruction in the faith of Christ. He told us there were two or three hundred others who held the same sentiments with himself, and that he often privately met a party of ten or fifteen more, when they read together and discussed the New Testament.

You will not be surprised, under these circumstances, that I am anxious for the speedy appearance of the Jewish-Spanish New Testament, which the converted Jew physician above mentioned, (I believe I may venture to call him so,) who very imperfectly understands the Hebrew, said would be very acceptable and useful.

Sept. 3, 1826.

Concerning the Jews of this city who are disposed to embrace Christianity, wishing to know the state of their affairs, I some time ago sent a Greek friend to the Jewish doctor I had once met, and who professed his belief in Jesus Christ. He said that he and his friends who held the same sentiments, were obliged, at present, to use the greatest precaution in meeting together, in order to avoid suspicion: adding, "there is, however, but one individual of our nation whom we really fear." He alluded to a very rich and powerful Jew, who, from a situation he held under the Turkish government, was known under the name of the Sapdgi. His influence with the Sultan and his ministers was very great; and he had thus the power, as well as the inclination, to effect the ruin of any individual whom he should discover as showing a disposition to Christianity. Only a very few days after this conversation, the Revolution of the 15th June, and the annihilation of the corps of the Janissaries, took place. In the course of these events, the Sapdgi, before so high in the favour of the Sultan, fell under his displeasure, who caused him to be beheaded, and seized upon his immense wealth.

The second circumstance I alluded to, (of the authenticity of which I am equally persuaded, as I had it from the brother-in-law of the person present, who related it to him,) is as follows. A Jew, connected in some way with the corps of the Janissaries, was thrown into prison, together with some Greeks, during the above mentioned period. Amidst the horrors which surrounded them in this place, where executions were constantly going forward under their eyes, the Greeks naturally fell to prayer. They were surprised to see the Jew come and kneel down with them; and one of them observed to him, that, being a Jew, he would do better to go and pray by himself after his own manner of belief. Upon this the Jew declared to them, that his sentiments on religion were the same with their own; that he believed in the same God and the same Lord Jesus Christ with themselves,—"Mark my words," he added, "you will see in a very short time a great change take place among our nation, and we shall all, I hope, be one."

Several of these converted Jews, after encountering various difficulties, chiefly from their opposing fellow countrymen and relatives, were at length, as appears from another letter by the same person, of Jan. 5, 1827, conducted to the prison of the Porte.

"When brought before the Grand Vezier, the Seraskier Pasha, the Reis Effendi, and other great officers of the Porte, they boldly declared themselves to be Christians; they said, that the only reason why they were persecuted by their fellow countrymen was, because they believed that the Messiah was come; and they asked the Turks whether they also did not believe that this was true. They presented their haratch papers, saying they were faithful subjects of the Sultan, and that their humble desire was to be allowed to live as such, protected by the government from the persecution of the Jews. After their seizure, the Jews had used all their efforts to obtain the execution of one of their number. Sentence of death was passed upon the bookbinder by the grand rabbi and his three assistants, and a petition was presented to the dragoman of the Porte, (himself formerly a Jew,) offering him a large reward if he would obtain for them its being put into effect. "We demand," they said, "the death of this accursed man, whose blood be on us." This circumstance is the more remarkable, as the Jews never allow, if it be possible to prevent it, any one of their nation, whoever he may be, or whatever crime he may have been guilty of, to be put to death by the Turks. To prevent this, their national purse is always open, and thousands and thousands of piasters are given on such occasions. Here, however, was a crime similar to that which our Saviour and his apostles had committed, and they were prepared to avenge it with a similar blindness and obduracy. May the veil, ere long, be taken from their hearts! and I trust in God the time is rapidly approaching!

The dragoman of the Porte, to his honour, refused to dip his hands in innocent blood, and, in a conversation with Mr. Hartley, compared their conduct to that of their forefathers before Pilate; and all that their interest and money could effect, was to obtain a sentence that they should be sent to the Bagnio, the prison of the Arsenal, for a term of six months.

During this critical interval between the 1st of December, the day of their apprehension, and the 7th, when they were committed to the Bagnio, which they passed at the prison of the Porte, they were cut off as much as possible from all intercourse with their friends, and were assailed by the Jews with every kind of temptation to renounce their faith. A full pardon and immediate deliverance were promised them, if they returned to their old religion, and death was held out to them as the consequence of their perseverance. The young man was the principal object of these assaults, whose father, now returned from Adrianople, and intended father-in-law (for, though so young, he was already affianced in marriage, and the money of the dowry paid) left no means untried to reclaim him. He has, however, shown throughout an admirable firmness, and a lively faith and zeal; nor does he appear to have had more than one moment of weakness during the whole course of his severe trials: this was shortly after his apprehension, when he was assured, that if he returned to his parents and old religion, he would not only secure himself from punishment, but that this would be the only means of saving the lives of the Armenian and his two friends—turning to whom, he said, “For your sakes I must yield.” They, however, exhorted him not to be deceived by the professions of the Jews, but to stand firm, and that, if necessary, they would all die together. His courage was immediately restored; and he has ever since, by his example, been the main support and encouragement of the little band. On one occasion especially, their fortitude was put to the test; for the Jews, seeing that they could not work upon them by promises, had it finally announced to them that their fate was sealed, and that the next morning they would be led to execution. Thus, for a whole night, they had the view of death before their eyes; and they spent it in reading the New Testament, with weeping and prayer. Two other Jews were left in prison with them, whom the book-binder (or, as I shall now say, John Baptist) reproved for their unbelief in the Messiah, exhorting them to follow their example, and become martyrs for the name of Christ. These Jews, unmoved by their behaviour and exhortations, wrote to the Rabbis, to inform them that there was no hope of their ever returning to the Jewish religion, and that the only course to be pursued with them was to get them put to death.

The punishment of prisoners in the Bagnio consists in being chained, two and two, with heavy chains, and employed in the laborious works of the Arsenal, under the superintendence of the Turkish guards, who beat them if they do not perform the task to their liking. There are about 700 persons in this prison, of whom about 300 are Greek slaves, the greater part prisoners taken in the Greek war. The circumstances of this affair having produced a general sensation and sympathy throughout the city, had penetrated within the walls of the Arsenal; and the prisoners, when brought there, were kindly welcomed by the poor Christian slaves, who went in a body to the Agha and officers, to beg they might be kindly treated, and not put to severe labour. In consequence of this mediation, they passed the two first days unmolested; but after this, several Jews came, and among them the father and intended father-in-law of the young man, who, after another fruitless attempt to bring them back to Judaism, went and gave a considerable sum of money to the officers of the prison to put them to hard work, and to beat and torment them. They suffered severely under this persecution for five or six days, until the matter coming to our knowledge, our ambassador was so kind as to send his dragoman, and by his representations to procure the cessation of this wanton and cruel treatment, and the weight of their chains was diminished one half; although, being still in the class of chained prisoners, they have continued to labour with the rest. A few days ago, two of them were thrown down and bruised in working at a large wheel used for raising the masts, and fixing them in the vessels of war, by a similar accident to which two men had been before killed before their eyes. They are now, however, recovered from their bruises, and will not, I believe, be henceforth employed in similar works. The father of the young man has been indefatigably persevering in his endeavours to recover his son, and has repeatedly come to the prison with his mother and relations, persuading and entreating him with tears to return to them, and promising him every thing he could desire; but he has constantly repulsed them, telling them to lay aside all hope of changing his resolution; that Jesus Christ was now his father and mother; that he preferred his chains with Christ to all they could offer him; and that when they renounced their errors, and became Christians, he would then acknowledge them as his relations. Among other encouragements they have had in their trials, have been messages from some of their Jewish friends from without, who partake in their sentiments, exhorting them to stand firm, that they gloried in their fortitude, and that their own hope was in their perseverance. I trust, indeed, I may say with truth, that they have conducted themselves like true Christians; and it has been remarked, that the faith and love to Christ shown by these new converts, may put to shame those who have long borne the Christian name. When in the height of their sufferings, they professed themselves ready to die for the love of Christ; and said, that their Saviour taught them that if their enemies took away their life, this was all they could do, and that they hoped their souls would be happy with him for ever. Their Christianity is indeed the work of the New Testament; and the members of the Bible Society may rejoice over their conversion, as the fruit, under God, of their exertion in the circulation of the scriptures.

A MORNING HYMN.

Arise, my soul! with rapture rise!
And, fill'd with love and fear, adore
The awful Sov'reign of the skies,
Whose mercy lends thee one day more.

And may this day, indulgent Power!
Not idly pass, nor fruitless be;
But may each swiftly flying hour
Advance my soul more nigh to thee.

But can it be! that Power divine,
Whose throne is Light's unbounded blaze,
Whilst countless worlds and angels join
To swell the glorious song of praise,

Will deign to lend a fav'ring ear
When I, poor abject mortal, pray?
Yes! (boundless goodness!) he will hear,
Nor cast the meanest wretch away.

Then let me serve thee all my days,
And may my zeal with years increase;
For pleasant, Lord! are all thy ways,
And all thy paths are paths of peace.

If solid happiness we prize,
Within our breast the jewel lies;
And they are fools who roam:
The world has nothing to bestow,
From our own selves the joys must flow,
And that dear but, our home.

COTTON.

Minuteness of Atoms.—Goldbeaters, by hammering, can reduce gold to leaves so thin, that, 282,000 must be laid upon each other to produce the thickness of an inch; yet those leaves are perfect, or without holes—so that one of them laid upon any surface, as in gilding, gives the appearance of solid gold. They are so thin, that, if formed into a book, 1500 would occupy the space of a leaf of common paper; and an octavo volume of an inch thick would have as many pages as the books of a well-stocked ordinary library of 1500 volumes, with 400 pages in each. Still thinner than this is the coating of gold upon the silver wire of what is called gold lace, and we are not sure that such coating is not of only one atom thick. Platinum and silver can be drawn into wire much finer than human hair. A grain of blue vitriol, or carmine, will tinge a gallon of water, so that in every drop the colour may be perceived. A grain of musk will scent a room for twenty years, and will have lost little of its weight. The carrion crow smells its food many miles off. A burning taper, uncovered for a single instant, during which it does not lose one thousandth of a grain, would fill with light a sphere of four miles in diameter, so as to be visible in every part of it. The thread of the silkworm is so small, that many of them are twisted together to form our finest sewing thread; but that of the spider is smaller still, for two drachms of it, by weight, would reach from London to Edinburgh, or four hundred miles. In the milt of a codfish, or in water in which certain vegetables have been infused, the microscope discovers animalcules, of which many thousands together do not equal in bulk a grain of sand; and yet nature, with a singular prodigality, has supplied many of these with organs as complex as those of the whale or the elephant; and their bodies consist of the same substance, or ultimate atoms, as that of man himself. In a single pound of such matter, there are more living creatures than of human beings on the face of this globe. What a scene has the microscope opened to the admiration of the philosophic inquirer! Water, mercury, sulphur, or, in general, any substance, when sufficiently heated, rises as invisible vapour, or gas; that is, it is reduced to the aeriform state. Great heat, therefore, would cause the whole of the material universe to disappear, and the most solid bodies to become as invisible and impalpable as the air we breathe. Few have contemplated an annihilation of the world more complete than this.

Bounds of Charity.—Lend not beyond ability, nor refuse to lend out of thy ability; especially when it will help others more than it can help thee. If thy debtor be honest and capable, thou hast thy money again, if not with increase, with praise; if he prove insolvent, do not ruin him to get that, which it will not ruin thee to lose, for thou art but a steward, and another is thy owner, master, and judge. The more merciful acts thou dost, the more mercy thou wilt receive; and if with a charitable employment of thy temporal riches, thou gainest eternal treasure, thy purchase is infinite;—thou wilt have found the art of multiplying indeed.—Penn's Fruits of Solitude.

There is hardly any person so bad, as not to do homage to virtue, by imitating it in some way or other.

DILLWIN.

FOR THE FRIEND.

The anecdote below possesses interest sufficient in itself to deserve notice, especially as illustrative of an amiable trait in one of royal descent; but the story is re-told with so much touching simplicity in the subjoined verses, that we thought our young readers, at least, would be gratified by the insertion. It is copied from the last number of the "Christian Advocate and Journal."

THE MOTHER.

In "Letters from the Continent," by Frederick Matthiesson, we have the following anecdote.—The accompanying verses are published, with the anecdote, in the Monthly Repository of August, under the signature H. H., and dated Birmingham.

"Of Prince William Henry, who was for a long time resident at Hanover, I heard a trait which does honour to his heart. One day he met a woman, leading in her hand a half naked boy. 'Will you sell me your child?' asked the prince. 'You may be a very rich gentleman,' she answered, 'but I would not take all your money in exchange for my child.' 'Why not?' said the prince. 'Do you know then who I am? But come to-morrow to the castle, and if, indeed, I am not in circumstances to purchase your son, at least I can provide for him.' The woman appeared the next morning, as he had desired, and the prince not only had the boy creditably educated, but promised to take him into his service, if he should prove honest and diligent.

"Thy babe is naked, hungry, cold,
And thou art poor and famish'd too;
Exchange thy baby for this gold,
I'll buy thee bread and clothing new."

"Sore pressed by poverty we roam,—
My babe and I have scarce to eat,—
No friend we have, nor sheltering home—
Exposed to all the storms that beat:

"And thou dost dwell in lordly hall,
Where cold and want can ne'er intrude,
Where riches furnish at thy call
Both costly dress and dainty food:

"Yet all thy gold is worthless ere—
More dear my boy, though nurs'd in woe,
Than all thy state, than all thy store—
A mother's heart thou'lt fill dost know!"

"Thy beam rebuke my folly's aim!
My wealth thy treasure cannot buy;
Yet shall it answer misery's claim,
And light up pleasure in thine eye.

"Beneath my care thy boy shall grow,
While thou his rising worth shalt tend;
Your wand'rings o'er ye yet shall know
A home, and comfort, and a friend." H. H.

NEW PUBLICATION.

Kimber and Sharpless, and B. and T. Kite, booksellers of this city, have just published a new work, in one volume, octavo, viz. "An Exposition of the Faith of the Religious Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, in the Fundamental Doctrines of the Christian religion, principally selected from their early Writings"—By Thomas Evans. This publication has undergone the inspection, and has been duly authorized by the meeting for sufferings. It contains the most extensive exhibition of the views of Friends on doctrinal subjects, from the earliest period of their history to more recent times, any where extant; and constitutes, in fact, in these respects, a library in itself.—Orders for the work may be forwarded to the publisher of "The Friend," by whom they will be duly executed.

The most we know of the individual referred to in the subjoined proposals, besides what may be learned from the proposals themselves, is, that (as we have been informed) he is the author of Stanzas headed "Ocean," which appeared in our first number. The motive assigned for offering the book for publication, is a good recommendation to the patronage solicited.

Proposals for Publishing by Subscription, the POEMS OF ADRIAN.

Many of the poems now proposed to be published, originally appeared in the Essex Gazette, a newspaper printed in Haverhill, Mass., and were very favourably received by the readers of that paper. Some of them have been copied into the most respectable papers in various sections of the Union, with strong expressions of approbation. When the circumstances, under which these poems were written, are known, they will be particularly interesting. The author (a native of this town) is a young man about nineteen years of age, who has had, until very recently, no other means of education, than are afforded in a common district school, and such as he improved in the leisure hours of an apprenticeship to a mechanical business. It is believed by his friends, that these poems indicate genius of a high order, which deserves all possible culture. The design of thus offering his juvenile writings to the public is, to raise money to assist him in obtaining a classical education. He is a worthy member of the Society of Friends, and it is hoped that from them the volume will receive a liberal patronage.

CONDITIONS.

The proposed volume will be handsomely printed on a new type, and on superfine paper. It will probably contain about two hundred duodecimo pages; will be neatly done up in boards, with cloth backs, and will be afforded to subscribers at seventy-five cents.

No more copies will be printed than shall be subscribed for.

Any person who shall procure six subscribers, and be accountable for the same, shall be entitled to a seventh copy gratis.

Subscription papers to be returned to the postmaster, Haverhill, Mass., on or before the first day of February next—at which time it will be determined whether to proceed in the publication. The volume will not be published unless five hundred copies at least, shall be subscribed for.

Haverhill, December 1, 1827.

Taking into view the coloured part of the population of this city and suburbs, the extremely abject state of morals, the improvidence, and the poverty, which characterize the greater portion of it, an almost overwhelming sense of depression invests the benevolent mind, and the anxious inquiry is raised—where is the remedy for the evil? what can be done to improve their condition? A reformation in their habits, and a change in their moral condition, must obviously be a work of slow growth, but perhaps there is nothing within our power, calculated so effectually to bring about this desirable change, as a proper attention to the education of the young. It is, therefore, with special satisfaction that we find the association in this city for the establishment and support of infant schools, has it in contemplation to extend their plan, so as to embrace a school or schools, for coloured children, as appears by the following advertisement, which, at their request, we cheerfully insert.

The infant school lately established in this city, having proved a very useful institution, and having given great satisfaction both to the parents of the pupils, and to the citizens generally, who have witnessed its operation, the managers are desirous of extending the benefits of the system to a portion of the community less favoured, in many respects, than those at present enjoying its advantages, and particularly standing in need of opportunities for early education. They have, therefore, determined to ask the aid of the public, in founding a school for coloured children, on the plan of their present establishment. It is not their intention to appropriate any part of the funds now in their hands to this object, but they wish to obtain, from the benevolence of their fellow citizens, the means of accomplishing the proposed undertaking. A committee has been appointed to carry into effect the design of the managers, for which purpose subscriptions and donations will be received by the following individuals:

Susan Latimer, 220, Arch street—Margaret Vaux, 346, Arch street—Mary Moore, 183, Pine street—Elizabeth Pearsall, 218, Arch street—Martha Eagles, 222, Pine street—Ann Kittera, 140, Walnut street—Amelia Davidson, 268, Walnut street.

To a Wren in the midst of Winter.

Poor little trembler, why hast thou, alone,
The winter's rigour thus presum'd to try?
To other lands thy russet friends have flown,
To groves that wave beneath a kinder sky.

Through the long gloomy night and joyless day,
Destruction near thee rears its horrid form;
The louing tempest marks thee for its prey,
And cats, un pitying as the driving storm.

But know, this deluge of o'erwhelming woes,
This scene terrific will not long prevail;
Again shall beauty's hand unfold the rose,
Again shall sweetness float on every gale.

And when thy kindred, in that happier hour,
Return to visit each remembered tree,
In some sequester'd blossom cover'd bower,
This hand shall fix a peaceful home for thee.

The following tender lines have been recalled by a recent attendance at the sick couch of a beloved wife, and may possibly apply in more instances than one, at this critical season of the year, to the feelings of an affectionate husband.—Poul. D. Adver.

TO A WIFE,

(During a period of severe indisposition.)

BY CORNELIUS NEALE.

I said I would love thee in want or in wealth;
Through cloud and through sunshine, in sickness,
in health;
And fear not, my love, when thy spirits are weak—
The troth I have plighted, I never will break.

Aye sickness; but sickness it touches the heart
With a feeling, where how many feelings have part
There's a magic in soothing the wearisome hour,
Pity rears up the stem, and hope looks for the flower.

The rose smells as sweetly in sunshine and air,
But the green-house has all our affection and care;
The lark sings as nobly, while soaring above,
But the bird that we nurse is the bird that we love.

I have loved thee in sickness, I'll love thee in health;
And if want be our portion, why love be our wealth;
Thy comfort in sorrow, thy stay when most weak;
The troth I have plighted I never will break.

FOR THE FRIEND.

JOHN PEROT—No. 2.

During the controversy with John Perot and his followers, several tracts were written, with a view to prejudice the ignorant and unsuspecting against George Fox, and those who were united with him in endeavouring to preserve the Society from being severely contaminated with his restless and innovating spirit. In reply to the charges of tyranny and imposition, William Penn observes:—"How ingenuous is he, to rail against power and love it, to deny authority, and seek it! to accuse George Fox of tyranny, and use so much in doing so! to be angry, not that there is rule, but that he has no share in it! to repute our censure of a disturber, about such unprofitable and unseemly customs, as to keep on the hat in public prayer, a resemblance of the church of Rome's excommunications! and to rebuke a malapert stickler against the church's peace, USURPATION and OPPRESSION! But which is rarest of all, Socinians are to fledge their naked cause with this man's feathers, and his lies are to be their refuge."

The outcry which of late years has been made against those who have, with dignity and firmness, maintained the discipline and doctrines of the Society, comes principally from persons who, restive under wholesome restraints, spurning at the cross of Christ, and Socinians in principle, are therefore totally unfit for any participation in the government of the church, but who would nevertheless, to obtain that influence which they revolt at in others, even at the hazard of breaking up the foundations of all order.*

The authority for taking a part in the administration of the discipline, is only derived from the head of the church, and must be accompanied by integrity and self-denial. As this debars many from a participation, who would be great men in the church without these essential qualifications, we are told, in order to remove that obstacle, that all are upon a level; one has the same right to speak as another; and no one has any authority to judge of another's fitness—hence the doctrine that the voice of the majority should decide, has been latterly preached; and thus by departing from the original ground of a qualification derived from the Holy Spirit, the Society would degenerate into a mere civil association. We have heard Elias Hicks advance similar sentiments. When his favourite measure, the alteration of the discipline to destroy the authority of the elders, was under discussion, he asserted that it was to be presumed every person present had a right qualification to speak, and queried whether there was any individual there who had an inspiration from heaven, authorizing him to say that such an one was not qualified. Thus

* The necessity of curtailing the power of the elders appears was to be forgotten. Large additions have been made to that "arbitrary," "domineering order" within Bucks quarter, one of the meetings which proposed the alteration of discipline for that purpose, but since some of the advocates of the measure have been introduced into that office, they appear to think the discipline stands very safe as it is. It seems they were angry not that there is rule, but because they had no share in it.

when they find that it will not do to depend upon the claims of their partisans to divine revelation, these great pretenders to the light within can openly deny the church, the right to exercise a spirit of discerning and judgment respecting its members. William Penn, in reply to one affected with the spirit of Perot, says, "that we exalt ourselves, is a calumny of his making; we know our places in the body. And for his saying, every member is equal, it is false; for though it belongs to the same body, yet not to the same service; some are, in that sense, more honourable than others. This shows an aspiring, discontented mind in him, that when he cannot be superior, he would be equal."

The doctrine of immediate revelation was very early abused by some, who made it a plea to cover their opposition to the conclusions of the body of Friends. Every man, they assumed, had the light within, and should be left to follow it, as a safe and sufficient guide, whether he apprehended himself in conformity with the decisions of the body, or to disregard them. Robert Barclay, however, maintained that the church, in its collective capacity, is furnished by its divine Head, through those members who have long stood faithful to Him, with such directions and commands as he sees proper for its government and preservation; just as the divine will has been communicated through prophets and apostles in former ages, which being derived from the Holy Spirit, these injunctions are binding upon all the members. It is therefore a just inference, as a tree is known by its fruits, that the rejection of those conclusions indicates that such a member is not a follower of the light of Christ, whatever may be his professions of it. William Penn wrote a pamphlet to defend the Society in the administration of its discipline, against Perot and his adherents, styled "Judas and the Jews combined against Christ and his followers," &c. in which he observes—"Shall this position, I say, that all men ought to follow the light in themselves, deprive the church of the power of judging that for a dark imagination, which from the savour and sense of God's light and truth, she feels to be so; because some person or persons, plead that they therein follow the light? This opens a door to all licentiousness, and furnishes every libertine with a plea. What might have been said in this case against the ancient Christians? Every man ought to walk in the Spirit, and be led by the Spirit. Shall therefore any man's pretence to be led by the Spirit, that is not, secure him from the judgment of those that are really led by the Spirit? Or shall the judgments of those, who are led by the Spirit, against him that pretends to be so led, be reputed tyranny, and a going from the leadings and judgment of the Spirit, to the leadings and judgment of men?"

Many who had adopted the sentiments of John Perot, soon discovered their tendency, and abandoned them. For those who continued their attachment to him, a meeting was appointed in London, to convince them of their error, and to restore them to fellowship with their friends. William Penn, in speaking of it, says:—"Great and earnest were the desires and travails of those who opposed the spirit of J. Perot, that the Lord himself would please, in some signal manner, to break forth amongst them, that the judgment which should pass amongst them, in order to a reconciliation, might not be according to the judgment of man, but the judgment of God. These faithful cries entered the ears of the God of peace, whose compassions fail not, that with an high hand and an outstretched arm, he rent through the meeting, that both sorts were greatly broken and humbled before the Lord. In which deep and tender sense, many in fear and trembling, and great brokenness of spirit, to the astonishment of all beholders, plainly and fully testified against the spirit and practice of J. Perot, as being out of the life of the truth and unity of the body." Some acknowledged, "you are more righteous than we; if you had not stood, we had perished." Others who lived too remote to attend the meeting, transmitted confessions of their error in writing, which were publicly read.

The author of a pamphlet, called "The Spirit of the Hat, or the government of the Quakers," having mentioned several persons as coinciding with his sentiments, they published their disapprobation of his principles. The following is an extract from the testimony of John Swinton:—"And I do further testify, that the Spirit that hath wrought in a mystery against Friends, and to break their unity, under swelling pretences of FURTHER DISCOVERIES, and a singular, larger zeal, whether of that spirit which leads into the practice of wearing the hat in public prayer, or such like, to catch the minds of the young and simple, they not being aware of his devices, is the same, though under diversity of appearance, that works in the children of deceit and disobedience, to incline and to entice them to all manner of cruelty, lust and vanity, and is the ranting spirit, is Corah's spirit, that resisted and murmured against the servant of the Lord in former days; and therefore we find, that apostates from among us, and professors of all sorts and profane, can and do centre here in one spirit of enmity and opposition against the truth, and its followers and witnesses. And of this the Lord hath made me deeply sensible, and through the mercy and power of the Lord God, a zeal and indignation lives in my heart against that cursed twining spirit, and a care and travail in measure for all that have been entangled by it, that they may see and be sensible of it, and may be raised up to come forth in a clear and full testimony against it without reserve."

Perot and his followers did not limit their pretended testimony against forms, to their hats and beards,* but in process of time, on the same principle, those who still adhered to him declined attending meetings for divine worship, more particularly in this country, where they also manifested great aversion to the administration of a Christian discipline, and in some places occasioned much trouble. Perot himself entirely threw off all profession of the Quakers, wore a sword, and obtaining an office under the government, became a most rigorous exacter of oaths. Speaking of those people, William Penn observes:—"Their sect master returned with the dog to the vomit, to swearing, fighting, fine clothes; and cap and knee to men, who sat with his hat on his head, when he prayed to the most high God. Some of his followers ran into looseness and rantism, others into enmity and earthly mindedness; but far the more considerable returned to their first love and works, whom God hath since frequently blessed with his heavenly presence, and sealed to them the comforts of the holy communion of the brethren." FOR THE FRIEND.

We have often when engaged in reflection upon the novelties in doctrine propagated by our modern charlatans, wondered how any person, claiming to be governed by the dictates of sober reason, could, after pursuing them to their ultimate consequences, fail to be disgusted at their absurdity, and alarmed at their impiety. The following article taken from the last number of Bates's "Miscellaneous Repository," places these preposterous results in a striking point of view.

NEW DOCTRINES.

It is well known that in the various attacks which have been made on the doctrines of the gospel, a prominent object with the assailants has been, to present difficulties which are supposed to be found in those doctrines. But while Christianity has been ably defended against every objection which talents, wit, and ingenuity could invent, or laborious research draw from the dark recesses of oblivion, its opponents have not been very anxious to furnish us with a connected system, to supply the place of that fabric they have been endeavouring to pull down. Their sentiments lie scattered. It may not, therefore, be unacceptable to the reader, to see them put together, that their agreement or disagreement may be more clearly discovered.

We are told that "man was created, and placed in a garden of trees, full of trees—and what were the trees in the garden of Eden? They were the propensities of man in his animal body."

"The tree of the knowledge of good and evil was God—there was no other tree of the knowledge of good and evil but God himself." Satan is said to be "the tempting disposition in man," and the whole host of mankind has been challenged to show that there was any thing of this nature but the propensities of man. The primeval nakedness of our first parents was said to be a nakedness of soul—and the coats of skins, with which they were clothed after their transgressions, was the Holy Spirit.

According to this explanation—the garden being the animal body of man, and the trees his propensities, it would follow—that after he was formed of the dust of the earth—the Creator planted an animal body eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had formed. And the Almighty gave him permission free to eat of all the propensities of his animal body—that is, to subsist on Satan—but that he should not partake of God, for in the day he tasted of him he should surely die. But the propensities being more subtle than any beast of the field, tempted one of them to be not satisfied with living on Satan, but to enjoy God—they did so, and were now ashamed of the nakedness of soul they had been in. But in the cool of the day, they heard the voice of God walking in their animal bodies, and were afraid, and hid themselves among their propensities. But they were called to an account—Adam laid the blame upon Eve, and she blamed the propensities. The propensities were first condemned, and cursed above all cattle, &c. Adam and Eve were then severally condemned, and the ground cursed for their sake. After this had taken place, they were clothed with the Holy Spirit, and driven out of their animal bodies leaving their propensities behind them; for when they were turned out of the garden, it could not be supposed that they could carry the trees with them.

Having brought our first parents to this sad predicament, some perplexing questions seem naturally to arise out of their condition. Driven out of their animal bodies, and having left their propensities behind them, they were clear of Satan at once. But having left the tree of the knowledge of good and evil behind them, they were equally separated from their Creator, and yet it is supposed they were clothed with the Holy Spirit. In such a condition, we may reasonably inquire, what were they? Were they visible or invisible beings? And in either case, was their moral condition better or worse than it was before their transgression? And "by the analogy of reason," could their posterity have either animal bodies or propensities? Must we not be drawn to the conclusion, "it is impossible," and thus prove the necessity of a new creation, as the origin of the present race of mankind?

But some further inquiries seem to arise, in regard to parts of the representation which we have passed over.

If the tree of knowledge was God himself, how did it happen that our first parents were able to feed on Him, contrary to His will? How came it to pass, that man was absolutely and totally prohibited the enjoyment of the divine nature, on the penalty of death, while he was permitted to indulge with Satan without restraint? And further, if the propensities are the devil, does it not follow, that he is necessary to our very existence? And would it not set "the whole host of mankind" at defiance, to show how we could do without him? And does not the perfection of wisdom consist, not in excluding him from us, but in living with him on the best possible terms?

But it must be remembered, that on this view of things, some difficulty would present, in the way of understanding many parts of the Old and New Testament.

It would seem, from the scriptural account, that Job himself was not present when Satan accused him. And some difficulty, I should think, would be found in explaining how his propensities came to present themselves without him, or what he could have done in their absence. It is rather marvellous how his propensities should so far have deviated from the usual course of things, as to propose to strip him of all his possessions and outward comforts; and finally to touch him, not only to the skin, but to the very bone, with the most painful and loathsome disease. We would willingly inquire, which of the propensities—or how all of them combined together, could have done it?

In the New Testament, frequent mention is made of devils being cast out of persons. If these were their propensities, what could the persons do after losing them? In one case, it is said, a legion was cast out of a man. These must have been all that he had, to be sure, for it is difficult to conceive how a man could have more than 5000 propensities. But after they were expelled from him, what were they? were they active, powerful beings? If they were, then our propensities are distinct beings, and capable of continuing distinct and independent existence without us; and of producing powerful effects without our agency. If they are not capable of separate existence, how did they enter into the herd of swine, and cause them to rush headlong into the sea?

That this account is not an allegorical figure, but a literal truth, is proved by the fact that the people of that section of country, where the devils were cast out of a man, and entered into the swine—astonished at the transaction, besought our Lord to depart out of their coasts.

Angels are sometimes said to be men and women, and fallen angels to be fallen men and women. And sometimes they are represented as amiable dispositions.

Taking the former hypothesis, and it would follow that a good man, or woman, ascended in the flame of Manoah's burnt offering. A good man stopped the mouths of the lions, when Daniel was in the den. And David saw a good man standing between the earth and heaven, with a sword stretched over Jerusalem, having destroyed 70,000 of the Israelites in three days.

Taking the other supposition, that angels are amiable dispositions, then an amiable disposition slew all the first born of Egypt—destroyed 185,000 of the Assyrians in one night—an amiable disposition informed the shepherds of the birth of Christ—and, at his resurrection, rolled back the stone from the sepulchre, and sat upon it. The raiment of this amiable disposition was white as snow, and his countenance shining as the light, and for fear of him the keepers did tremble and became as dead men. An amiable disposition opened the prison doors, and brought out the apostles, and smote Herod with an incurable disease.

"Heaven," say the new doctrines, "is a state." "It is not a local place by any means." They say, it is every where, where God is. That is, simply, it is every where.

But what idea can we form of a state that is not in some place? What is a state but the condition of some being? And a being must be either omnipresent, or it must be in some local place. We do not ascribe omnipresence to any being but God. If, then, heaven is limited to the state of limited beings, separately considered, there are as many heavens as there are happy spirits. And no two souls can be in the same heaven. This would not merely suppose one local heaven, but myriads of them.

But if heaven is every where, then the earth, with all its population—its miseries—its crimes—its abominations—its scenes of all debauchery—its groans of oppression—its seas of blood—all this is in heaven; nay, hell itself, according to this position, is in heaven, or it is no where.

The humble Christian looks for a better heaven than this—where nothing that is impure can come—but where saints and angels—ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands, unite in ascribing, Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, unto him that sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb for ever and ever.

EPISTLE OF T. ELLWOOD.

"Yea, Friends, this spirit that hath led some now to set up their separate meetings, is the same that led Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, to set up his separate altar at Bethel, of which you may read, 1 Kings 12th and 13th chapters. He was afraid that if the people should continue to go up to the house of the Lord, to do sacrifice there, as they had been accustomed to do, and as the Lord had required, they would then forsake him, and return to the Lord again. And this spirit now is afraid, that if they whom he hath seduced, and drawn aside, should still frequent the assemblies of God's people, and continue to meet with Friends, as before; that heavenly power, which is eminently manifest in the meetings of God's people, might at one time or other reach unto them, touch their hearts, open the right eye in them, and give them to see the mischief and misery he is leading them into. And, therefore, to prevent this, and to keep his captives close unto him, he hath contrived to set up separate meetings, in opposition to the meetings of God's appointment, as Jeroboam set up his separate altar, in opposition to the altar which God had commanded to be set up; and to keep the people from going thither. And so subtilly did this spirit work then, as well as now, that Jeroboam contrived to have his false worship bear some resemblance to the true; that he might the more easily beguile the people; for he ordained a feast, like unto the feast that was in Judah, 1 Kings xii. 32. But it was in the month which he had devised of his own heart, ver. 33. Mark that; there is a blot upon it; how fair or specious soever the worship he set up appeared, or seemed to be, yet it was but the devise of his own heart; it was neither appointed by God, nor accepted of God. For you may read in the 13th chapter, that the Lord sent a prophet, a man of God, out of Judah to Bethel; and he cried against the altar in the word of the Lord, and prophesied the destruction thereof by Josiah; which was afterwards outwardly fulfilled, as you may read, 2 Kings xxiii. 15, &c. Now Josiah signifies the fire, or burning of the Lord. And in the holy dread of the living eternal God I declare, The fire of the Lord is kindled, and kindling, against this accursed separating spirit, and against its work and against all those that join with it therein. Therefore all fear before the mighty God, and stand still and consider your ways; and let none resist or reject the warning of the Lord, lest such be hardened to destruction. For Jeroboam, you may read, stood by his separate altar, ver. 1. And when he heard the saying of the man of God, when he cried against the altar in Bethel, he put forth his hand, saying, lay hold on him. But his hand which he put forth against him, dried up, so that he could not pull it in again to him, ver. 4. O Friends, consider, how hath dryness and withering come upon many a great and stout one in this day, who have lifted up themselves against the Lord; and have sought, by the devices of their own hearts, to establish themselves in their own way, against the way of the Lord; so that the hand they have put forth in that work, they could not pull in again. Now mind, I pray you, Friends, and observe the way of the working of this spirit in that day. Here was the enmity, the rough nature of Cain and Esau, the spirit of persecution, got up first in Jeroboam, to dismay the man of God; lay hold of him, says he. But when he saw that would not do, then the subtle serpent, the crafty fox, the fair speeches, the smooth words, the seeming friendship and show of kindness, to betray him. Come home with me, says he to the man of God, and refresh thyself, and I will give thee a reward, ver. 7. O Friends, stand in the fear and counsel of the Lord, and in the dominion of his power, over this wicked spirit in all its twistings and twinings. Let neither the frowns nor the fawnings, the threats nor the flatteries, the hard speeches nor the oily words, the Pharisaical friendship, the dissembling love, the seeming kindness, the familiar carriage, the free entertainment, the fine bit, the offer of advantages, &c. have any influence upon you, to draw you, in the least measure, to join or touch with God's enemy; with him that sets up a separate altar, a separate meeting, in opposition to, and to draw or keep from the right way of the Lord; mind well the answer which the man of God gave to Jeroboam's tempting invitation. If (said he) thou wilt give me half thine house, I will not go in with thee; neither will I eat bread nor drink water in this place, ver. 8. (This was where the separate altar was set up.) And he gives a forcible reason for it; for so was it charged me by the word of the Lord, ver. 9. Here now you see both the charge of the Lord, and the good resolution of the man of God; I will not go in with thee who hast revolted from God; neither will I eat or drink in this place, where an ensign of separation and opposition to the way of God is set up. Consider this well, I warn you all, in whom there is yet any true breathings after the living God, who retain any tenderness, and in whom there is any simplicity left; consider this well, I say, when thy pretended friend, or friends, in a great deal of seeming love and kindness, shall invite thee to partake with them at their separate altar, to set down with them in their separate meeting. Thou canst not be a man of God, and go in with them, or eat or drink in that place. Thou canst not sit down there, to wait for the bread of life, or the water of life, to be given thee there. No, the word of the Lord, if thou givest heed unto it, will charge thee otherwise. Therefore to that pure living word let every mind be turned, and thereto kept, in a diligent waiting to receive wisdom, strength, and power from the Lord therein; that none may be betrayed by the subtlety of the enemy, with whatsoever fair pretences he may come. For remember how the man of God, that was enticed by another to eat and drink outwardly at Bethel, the place where the separate altar was set up, lost his outward life therefore, ver. 18 and 24. And if thou shalt presume to go in, to eat or to drink spiritually; that is, to join in worship with the sons of Nebat at this day, in the separate meetings, which any of them have set up, in opposition to the assemblies of God's people, and to the blessed way and work of the Lord; how knowest thou, but thou mayest for ever lose thy spiritual life, and never know a day of quickening more?

(To be continued.)

ELISHA BATES AND THE BEREAN.

In the next number, the Berean takes up some parts of two paragraphs; I shall take the passages as they stand in the pamphlet, rather than as they are given in the Berean. For the sake of marking the distinction, I shall enclose, in brackets, the part which the Berean left out. I would not be understood as making any objection here to the liberty he has taken in this case; the part he extracted was enough for his purpose, but the whole will afford a rather more distinct view of my meaning.

"The human mind may still busy itself in vain speculations, instead of submitting to the renovating power of truth; or it may depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines which stand opposed to the great truths of redemption by Jesus Christ."

"These truths our primitive friends maintained. And their faith was made manifest by many clear testimonies, in word and writing; and tested by deep sufferings. [In those times of persecution, divers of their doctrines were misrepresented by their enemies, in order to injure their Christian reputation. Against these perversions of their principles, they defended themselves with great ability and clearness, making distinct declarations of their meaning, in those parts of their writings which had been differently construed; that they might bear a standing testimony to the various doctrines of the gospel.] What was then charged upon them by enemies, though, as some of them said, a thousand times denied, is now taken up by professed admirers of their lives and principles, and represented as their real sentiments."

In these passages, the Berean finds several charges against certain of my brethren, in religious profession: as, 1st, A denial of the great truths of redemption by Jesus Christ. 2d, An attempt to distort and misrepresent the sentiments of our primitive friends on this subject. 3d, A busying of themselves in vain speculations; which, he says, if not fully expressed, are fairly inferred.—These passages are not taken to be examined at present, whether the charges are either expressed or inferred, in what I have said, but to introduce a notice of a novel procedure of this writer. In order, it would seem, to refute the charges, he has drawn up a creed, of what THEY BELIEVE on these subjects. A creed for a class of people, no further defined by me, than—"What was then charged on [our primitive friends,] by enemies, though, as some of them said, a thousand times denied, is now taken up by professed admirers of their lives and principles, and represented as their real sentiments." And in order to deny the existence of such characters, he draws up a creed for them! If there are such persons, as attribute to our early friends sentiments which were charged on them by enemies, and by them denied, (and how can he dare to say there are not, within my knowledge?) if there are such, what signify all the creeds that the ingenuity of man could invent? The case is resolved into a matter of fact, and nothing that he can put into a creed can alter it. If there are no such persons, then it is useless to publish a creed for those who are not concerned. But in the very method he has taken to refute the charge, he has admitted its truth.

The reader may find this creed in pages 83 and 84, of vol. 2d, to which we shall have occasion to refer hereafter.

Before I leave this subject, I may remark, that there appears to be, in this part of the review, a singular oversight. Those who have read the Berean, well know, that one of the means, by which it has been attempted to represent, both the Doctrines and Extracts, in an odious point of view, has been to call them CREEDS. It has been, to me, really a matter of surprise, that men of talents and information, as the writers of these reviews appear to be, should so far presume on the ignorance and prejudice of their readers, as to raise such an objection. By a strange and unaccountable jumble of simple declarations of belief, and doctrinal treatises, and secular laws abridging the liberty of conscience, they have raised up a monster, frightful indeed to the beholder. And they have left the excited imaginations of their credulous readers, to identify this monster with the Pamphlet of Extracts, and the Doctrines of Friends.

But having adopted this course, it must have been a mere oversight, to draw up an instrument, which carries on the very face of it the character of a CREED.

In the article now under consideration, the writer brings the following charge: "In his quotations he has made the word 'PERSON EMPHATICAL, as also the terms FATHER, WORD, and SPIRIT,' by which he has rendered himself obnoxious to the same charge which he has brought against others, viz. that of 'giving currency to sentiments' as belonging to our primitive friends, WHICH THEY NEVER HELD, but denied a thousand times." He has not told us where these passages occur, but the reader may find them in pages 7 and 20 of the "Extracts." If the writer had examined the folio edition of Penn's Select Works, printed in London, 1771, from which the Extracts were taken, I believe he never would have made the above charge. For he would there have found the words in question, printed in Italics, as they are in the Pamphlet. And he would have seen that the whole force of his objection, instead of falling on me, would revert on himself.

But lest the reader might suppose that W. Penn made use of the word PERSON, in speaking of the doctrine of the Trinity, as seems to be inferred from the manner in which it is noticed by the Berean, he may be informed, that it occurs in a treatise, called "A Key," and published in 1692, and in the division of that treatise, headed "Of Christ Jesus, his Death, and Sufferings," in which, after the most pointed testimony to those great doctrines of the Christian religion, he says: "By all which it is evident to any moderate inquirer, that we acknowledge Christ in his double appearance, as in the flesh, 'of the seed of Abraham,' so in the Spirit, as he is 'God over all, blessed for ever.'" Wherein is a full confession both to him as a blessed PERSON, and as a divine PRINCIPLE of light and life in the soul.

His third article, p. 102, is chiefly taken up with the allusion I made in the Extracts, to the Arian controversy, to show the effects of speculation on subjects beyond the reach of mere human comprehension. This allusion touched the writer in a very sensitive part, and he has employed almost the whole of this article, in a defence of Arius and his principles; though he professes to have no design of doing this. But had he made a different profession, I should not have expected a more direct apology for Arius than he has made. It would be an unnecessary digression from my present object, to enter into an examination of that controversy, either as to the tenets or persecutions involved in it. The Berean seems to think, the cause of the convulsions of that period, was not to be found in the opinions of Arius, but a previous declension—there was "an aspiring clergy," and "the doctors who had applied themselves to the study of letters and philosophy, soon abandoned the frequented paths, and struck out into the devious wilds of fancy." That there is truth in this representation of the state of society, at that period, will be readily granted. There was an aspiring clergy, and Arius was one of the number. And it is not only true that these, leaving the frequented paths, struck out into the devious wilds of fancy, but there was also a superficial and degenerate people. The former were the means of sowing widely the seeds of innovation and discord, the latter furnished a fruitful soil, in which they not only took root, but brought forth a luxuriant crop of corruption. And these two causes have generally combined, in every general apostasy, which has taken place in the visible church. Teachers and writers, who, stimulated by the thirst for popular applause, or by some other corrupt passion of the human heart, leaving the frequented paths, have struck out into the devious wilds of fancy; and a people, superficial in their profession of religion, who find it more congenial to their corrupt inclinations to indulge in curious speculations, than to subject their feelings to the sanctifying and regulating influence of divine grace—have swallowed with avidity the food poured out for them by ministers and writers, and become the pliant, ready instruments of every scheme of ambition or confusion. It is thus that not only the legislative hall, and the seat of justice, have been prostituted to the vile purposes of ecclesiastical ambition and corruption, but even the places of divine worship, have been converted into scenes of disorder and riot. However, in the lapse of time, the circumstances of society may change, however the names of offices may vary, and the means of obtaining personal aggrandizement assume new forms, still the thing in itself is substantially the same—the prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests bear rule by their means, and the people love to have it so; but though these things may triumph for a time—though they may seem to bear down all opposition—still the important query remains to be answered—What will ye do in the end? For my own part, I have no doubt that He, who has been the Rock and Refuge of the righteous in all ages, will be their sun and shield, and final great reward. And however He may, in his inscrutable providence, permit error to raise its head, in the exaltation of its imagined power, He will still confound the wisdom of the wise, and bring to nought the understanding of the prudent. However infidelity may shift its ground, however it may assume the grossness of a Paine, or the refinements of ancient or modern unbelievers—we need not apprehend that it will ever be able to triumph over those important truths which were spoken by the Lord, and have been confirmed unto us by them who heard him; God also himself bearing them witness by signs and wonders, and divers miracles, and gifts to the Holy Ghost.

[To be continued.]

FOR THE FRIEND.

FRAGMENTS, No. 1.

As it appears to be the object of the Friend to promote practical virtue, as well as to hold up a beacon to posterity, by recording the errors of the present day, I propose to furnish, if it meet the views of the Editor, a series of selections from the writings and history of Friends, illustrative of their morals, religious principles, and testimonies, and the firmness with which they faithfully supported them. Should it prove the means of awakening reflection upon the high responsibility which attaches to their successors, and induce them to labour earnestly for reformation from the degeneracy which has lamentably overtaken us, a good end will be answered.

1735. George Fox. "In my very young years, I had a gravity and stayedness of mind and spirit, not usual in children; inasmuch, that when I have seen old men carry themselves lightly and wantonly towards each other, a dislike thereof hath risen in my heart, and I have said within myself, 'If ever I come to be a man, surely I should not do so, nor be so wanton.' When I came to eleven years of age, I knew pureness and righteousness; for while I was a child, I was taught how to walk so as to be kept pure. The Lord taught me to be faithful in all things, and to act faithfully two ways, viz. inwardly to God, and outwardly to man; and to keep to yea and nay in all things. For the Lord showed me, though the people of the world have mouths full of deceit and changeable words, that I was to keep to yea and nay in all things; that my words should be few and savoury, seasoned with grace; and that I might not eat and drink to make myself wanton; but for health, using the creatures in their service as servants in their places, to the glory of him that created them."

Richard Davies. "And being under a serious consideration of what I read in the Scriptures, believing the Spirit of the Lord to be the interpreter thereof, those great mysteries, which were hid from ages and generations, and are hid now, in this our age, from many, are come to be revealed by the Spirit of God; and if any would have comfort in reading the Scriptures, they must wait in that measure of the Spirit which God hath given them, which is the only key that opens them to the understanding of those that are truly conscientious in the reading of them. And though I read them formerly, as many do now, without a true sense and a due consideration, yet now I can bless God for them, and have great comfort in the reading of them; they being no more as a sealed book unto me, and many more, who wait for the assistance of God's Holy Spirit, in all their duties and performances that the Lord requires of them; for without Him we know we can do nothing that is pleasing unto Him."

So far from the manifestations of the "light within" contradicting the Holy Scriptures, or rendering them unnecessary to the Christian, this worthy friend, under its divine influence, expresses his gratitude to the Almighty for them, and acknowledges the great comfort which he derived in reading them.

James Gough, in the narrative of his own life, relates of John Ashton, of Kilconimore, who was an old man when J. G. saw him, that,

"He, with his wife, when at liberty," constantly attended the meeting at Birr twice a week, generally walking on foot thither, being about seven English miles, and a very bad road, wading through a river both going and returning. In winter, they sometimes had the ice to break in crossing this river; and John said, he had wept to see the blood on his wife's legs, in coming through it. In those days, truth was precious to its professors who also possessed it, and no difficulties nor dangers could prevent them from getting to their religious meetings, to enjoy the renewings of divine love and life with their brethren."

Robert Barclay. It is recorded of this friend, that as he was returning from a journey into Hertfordshire, his life was in some danger from the attack of a highwayman. His wife had observed him in the morning to be more pensive than usual, and he then told her, he believed some uncommon trial would that day befall the company. When the robber presented his pistol, Robert calmly asked him, How he came to be so rude, and took him by the arm; on which the robber let the pistol drop, and offered him no further violence.

Leonard Fell, one of Judge Fell's sons, travelling one time alone, was attacked by a highwayman, who demanded his money, which he gave him; then he desired to have his horse; Leonard dismounted and let him take it. Then feeling the power of truth rise in his mind, he turned to the robber, and under its authority, solemnly warned him of the evil of his ways; but he, flying into a passion, asked the friend why he preached to him, and threatened to blow out his brains. But Leonard replying to this effect, "Though I would not give my life for my money or my horse, I would give it to save thy soul," so struck the astonished robber, that he declared, if he was such a man as that, he would take neither his money nor his horse from him; and returning both to the faithful friend, went his way, leaving Leonard to the enjoyment of that peace attending the honest discharge of his conscience, to obtain which he had not counted life dear."

Edward Burrough. "He was a man of undaunted courage, though but young; the Lord set him above the fear of his enemies, and I have beheld him filled with power by the spirit of the Lord. For instance, at the Bull and Mouth, when the room, which was very large, hath been filled with people, many of whom have been in uproars, contending one with another, some exclaiming against the Quakers, accusing and charging them with heresy, blasphemy, sedition, and what not; that they were deceivers, and deluded the people; that they denied the Holy Scriptures, and the resurrection; others endeavouring to vindicate them, and speaking of them more favourably;—in the midst of all which noise and contention, this servant of the Lord hath stood upon a bench with his Bible in his hand, (for he generally carried one about him,) speaking to the people with great authority from the words of John: "And there was much murmuring among the people concerning him (Jesus); for some said, He is a good man; others said, nay, but he deceiveth the people;" and so suitably to the present debate amongst them, that the whole multitude were thereby overcome, and became exceeding calm and attentive, and departed peaceably, and with seeming satisfaction." Crouch's Memoirs. If the ministers among friends in the present day, were to attempt to preach with a Bible in their hands, they would be soon derided by the high pretenders to the Light, as "receding from genuine Quakerism, and approximating to the reformed churches."

1652. Christopher Taylor being imprisoned at Appleby, in company with several of his friends, endured much suffering from the cruelty of the jailer. In the winter they suffered greatly with the cold, being deprived of fire; and in the hot weather, were nearly suffocated with the stench of a filthy prison, where they were frequently so closely shut up, as to become extremely faint for want of air. Their friends debarred from access to them, they were sometimes in danger of starving, and were often unable to obtain a little water to allay their intense thirst. The rage of the jailer vented itself in destroying every thing in their possession which might contribute to mitigate the tediousness and horrors of their confinement, and in beating them in a bloody and barbarous manner. He deprived them of their flint and steel, and made a charge for lighting a candle at his fire. On one occasion, Christopher states, the jailer held a blazing candle under one friend's chin, and afterwards, like a cruel tyrant, to his nose," until his breath extinguished it.

John Smith. At our Yearly Meeting at Philadelphia, the 25th day of the 9th month 1764, John Smith, of Marlborough, aged upwards of eighty years, a faithful minister, though not eloquent, stood up in our meeting for ministers and elders, and appearing to be under a great exercise of spirit, informed friends, in substance as follows, to wit: That he had been a member of our Society upwards of sixty years, and well remembered, that in those early times, friends were a plain, lowly-minded people; and that there was much tenderness and contrition in their meetings. That at twenty years from that time, the Society increased in wealth, and in some degree conforming to the fashions of the world, true humility was less apparent, and their meetings, in general, not so lively and edifying. That at the end of forty years, many of them had grown very rich; that wearing of fine costly garments, &c. became customary with them; their sons and daughters, and many of the Society, made a specious appearance in the world; which marks of outward wealth and greatness appeared on some in our meetings of ministers and elders; and as these things became more prevalent, so the powerful overshadowings of the Holy Ghost, were less manifest in the Society. That there had been a continual increase of these ways of life even until now; and that the weakness which hath now overspread the Society, and the barrenness manifest among us, is matter of much sorrow. He then mentioned the uncertainty of his attending these meetings in future, expecting his dissolution was now near; and having tenderly expressed his concern for us, signified that he had seen in the true light, that the Lord would bring back his people from these things, into which they were thus degenerated, but that his faithful servants must first go through great and heavy exercises therein."

Virtue could see to do what virtue would
By her own radiant light, though sun and moon
Were in the flat sea sunk. And wisdom's self
Oft seeks to sweet retired solitude,
Where with her best nurse Contemplation,
She plumes her feathers and lets go her wings,
That in the various bustle of resort
Were all too ruffled, and sometimes impaired.
He that has light within his own clear breast
May sit 't' th' centre, and enjoy clear day;
But he that hides a dark soul, and foul thoughts,
Benighted walks under the mid-day sun;
Himself is his own dungeon. MILTON'S COMUS.

A cure may sometimes appear to be the result of a very long course of medicine, merely because a very long course of medicine allows time for the operations of nature, which, of itself, will often restore a patient, in spite of all the nauseating doses that are administered.—Med. Rev. vol. iv.

Scenes and Occurrences in Albany and Caffer-Land, South Africa. London printed 1827.

We have derived considerable entertainment and satisfaction from the perusal of this small volume. Without making any high pretensions, in a plain but intelligible style, it presents a description of scenery, customs, manners, &c. sufficiently lively to be interesting, and with an air of truth that gains the confidence of the reader. To use the author's own words in the preface to the book, "the country, as it now appears, is sketched; and however faint the outline may be drawn, the picture is painted as it was seen;—the aid of fiction has never been called in to decorate it,—every anecdote is fact, and every delineation is nature." The information given by the later writers, relative to this portion of that extensive continent, conveys a very different impression, both as respects the country itself, and its inhabitants, from that previously imbibed; for, with the name of Hottentot, under which denomination the adjacent tribes were generally included, was associated the idea of the very lowest degradation of the species. From the representations of this writer, the country, in many parts of it, is pleasantly diversified, and highly susceptible of cultivation; and several of the tribes are by no means that despicable people which we have been led to imagine. Quoting again the language of the author, "the native tribes, although in a state very little beyond that of nature, do not appear to be the sanguinary, vindictive, and ferocious monsters, heretofore described and supposed; on the contrary, they seem to be capable of receiving and justly appreciating the blessings of civilization—to possess kindly feelings, and to be susceptible of gratitude for favours received, as well as deserving of confidence bestowed. They are a fine race of people, infinitely superior in physical energies, and in manly appearances, to the other tribes of that quarter of the globe, and possessing mental capabilities which may hereafter render them a flourishing and happy people, when the knowledge and precepts of Christianity, rapidly following in the track of civilization, may have softened their manners, and totally eradicated every savage custom, by giving moral principles, and enforcing legal restraints.

"Having long intended," says the author,

"making an excursion into the interior of Caffer-Land, and hearing of others of my countrymen who were going on the same expedition, I resolved to join the party. Accordingly we embarked at Cape Town (Cape of Good Hope) in the commencement of the Cape summer of 1825, and after a tedious passage of ten days, came to anchor in Algoa Bay." He then proceeds to speak of their landing, visit to the government house, procuring a wagon and other equipments for the journey, not omitting guns and dogs, for being a sportsman, these were, of course, indispensable. They commence their journey, reach Bethelsdorp, a missionary establishment, are hospitably accommodated by the missionary, &c.

"We sent on our wagon from hence to wait for us at the Zwartkops river, resolving to amuse ourselves in search for game. We shot several birds of beautiful plumage, turtle doves, which are very good eating, and rabbits. These latter are much larger than the European rabbit. We flushed and killed a brace of what are called Cape pheasants; they have something of the grouse flavour, with red legs, and are good eating. Some Hottentots passed us riding on oxen, which they manage by running the bridle through the cartilage of the nose, and thus render those noble animals perfectly tractable."

After crossing the Zwartkops (Blackhead) river, the travellers arrive at Witenhage, where meeting with an acquaintance, they were hospitably entertained, being detained by heavy rain the following day.

"The next morning was still unfavourable, but about noon it cleared, and we commenced our journey slowly; the ground was so saturated, that the oxen could not travel at their usual pace, but this enabled us to pursue our sports, and in one of our rambles, we came to a Dutch farm house, with a fine garden, containing oranges in profusion, and a running stream which waters it all over. We found that the boor and his wife were unluckily gone to another farm, and had left their Hottentots in charge. We amused ourselves in endeavouring to converse, and in showing them our pocket books, knives, &c. The spying-glass delighted them beyond measure, and produced peals of laughter, particularly from the women; one snatched it away, and called to an old man to come and look, who, by his manner, appeared as if he has seen one before, and called it far looker. We overtook the wagon at the Coega rivulet, and as the moon shone with brilliancy, we were induced to continue our route till twelve o'clock."

"We saw several harte-beas*, one of the largest species of deer, with very handsome horns; and the pride of the plain, the spring buck: the latter, which are extremely timid, are about the size of the common deer, and of the same colour, with a white stripe on each side, and a black stripe along the back, which they have the power of closing and expanding. They take their name from the amazing springs which they make over paths, rocks, or any thing that obstructs their way; and it is done in a singularly graceful manner, the head bowed, the legs hanging, and the body curved, so that the animal appears as if suspended in the air; the fleetest greyhound only can overtake them. It is very amusing to see their contemptuous treatment of all other pursuers; they allow them to come near, then give a bound and a short, and trot off to a little distance, when they expand the hair on their backs, and appear quite white. They are very destructive to the corn, and are seen on farms in numerous herds."

"The partridges abound, and we killed a few brace; they live in long grass or rushes, and suffer you to approach very near, when they often rise singly, and with good dogs a covey is soon annihilated; they are fine eating, with much of the game flavour, and are larger than the European, but with the exception of the horse-shoe mark, resemble them. There are two kinds, the red and gray wing, the former most plentiful."

"Our tent was soon pitched, a fire kindled, and the Hottentots prepared an excellent repast, which we partook of with very keen appetites."

"The sun called us early, and we were soon in readiness to depart for our next stage, which was to be the Sunday river post. Our road lay principally through bush* which grows very thick near the post. They kill here great numbers of the leopard or panther, and many of the skins were hanging up to dry: these animals are very destructive to the sheep, and very difficult to be taken in traps or with spring-guns, as they will not touch any dead bait, and are so wary that it is impossible to kill them by watching."

"We crossed the Sunday river, which is very shallow, with a channel so broad, that fancy may conceive it to have been formed by the passage of the waters of the deluge off the land."

"We had heard much of the enchanting prospect from Addo's height, which we now began to ascend; the road winds through bushes of evergreen, many in full bloom; the wagon, which occasionally deviates from its track, crushes the branches, and the most aromatic odour scents the air. When we reached the summit, the view was magnificent. Algoa bay constitutes a principal feature in the scene, with ships in the distance, lying at anchor. Running quite inland were seen those naked mountains which form a belt almost the whole way from Cape Town. Surrounding us on every side, were fine undulating hills, the summits here and there covered with shrubs or verdant grass, and numerous herds of deer were dispersed about. The whole scene is captivating; the grass had been lately burnt, but rain had fallen, and it was a complete grass-plot. I had loitered so long, admiring this view, that I had considerable difficulty in overtaking my companions."

"The bush, as we proceeded further on, was more broken, and formed into complete shrubberies, always circular, the more lofty in the centre. It is difficult to persuade one's self that they are natural, the whole appears kept in such perfect order, owing it is probable to the browsing of the deer and other animals."

"The whole country continued so beautiful, as to render it almost impossible to give an adequate idea of its varied charms; the road smoother than any gravelled walk, being of a strong sandy texture; veins of stone are occasionally found across the road. Clumps of shrubs with various shades of green, some blooming, others seeding, geraniums, with various creepers ascending the stems; then falling gracefully down the branches, the beautiful plumage of the birds dazzling in the sun's rays, a bush buck darting now and then from one shrubbery to another, altogether form the most enchanting scenery imagination can depict."

* A term used by the inhabitants, and very appropriate, for it is neither timber nor brushwood, but a growth peculiar to this country.

"When we reflect that all this is nature, that no human being ever tilled the ground, or altered the face of it since the creation of the world, the mind is filled with an association of ideas, interesting and sublime.

"—Was every faltering tongue of man,
Almighty Father! silent in thy praise,
Thy works themselves would raise a general voice,
Even in the depth of solitary woods,
By human foot untrod, proclaim thy power,
And to the choir celestial Thee resound
The eternal cause, support, and end of all!"

"Between nine and ten o'clock, we pitched our tent on Quaggaflat, close to bush and water; the cattle were tied up round the wagon, to prevent them from straying in the night, but our rest was occasionally disturbed with the cries of wild animals. The jackal is first heard approaching, making a sound like a puppy when beaten. In the middle of the night, the hyæna prowls about in quest of prey, making rather a dismal moan, but on the dogs barking, or the least noise, they make off; although the hyæna has immense power, yet this animal is remarkable for cowardice."

"Just as we were passing a gloomy and intricate part of the thicket, one of the dogs made a steady point, we prepared, and moved forward, when up rose an immense leopard. The person in advance fired, but his musket was only loaded with slug shot, and the monster made off, and climbed with difficulty a tree. A second shot missed;—he then crouched, shook his tail and was in the act of springing, when we immediately retired; he then jumped down, and the boor instantly fired, but only wounded him. He growled tremendously;—the dogs attacked him, and forced him up another tree,—the boor took a favourable position, fired, and the animal fell, mortally wounded. It was very large, and the skin was beautifully marked."

FOR THE FRIEND.

DR. JOHN FOTHERGILL AND ACKWORTH SCHOOL.

To a reflecting and elevated mind there are few more powerful incentives to virtuous effort, than the examples of those illustrious good, who, having trod the pathway of life before us, have left us their good name, as a light-house on the shore to illumine, and to attract us to that haven, into which they have entered and have found rest.

Among such beacon fires on the coast, the life and character of the late Dr. John Fothergill present us with a bright and shining instance; endowed by nature with a comprehensive intellect, improved by a sound and elegant education, and well grounded in the practice and precepts of the Christian religion, he early in life selected the profession of physic, as particularly congenial to his taste, and affording a wide field, not only for the exercise of his vigorous talents, but also of those softer feelings, by the extended cultivation of which he became one of the most renowned philanthropists of his age.

And although Dr. Fothergill arose to the highest eminence in his profession, and acquired a degree of celebrity at home and abroad which is seldom attained by the most ardent cultivators of the medical profession, yet it is a question whether he was most known to fame as a philanthropist or as a physician; indeed, the life of this excellent man seemed to flow in one continued stream of fertilizing charity.

Among the varied instances of his indefatigable efforts to advance the interests of his fellow man, we have conceived the following relation of the origin of the celebrated school at Ackworth, as happily illustrative of the wide embrace of his views, and the good effects which have resulted from his labours.

"In the wide stream of public good he did not overlook the situation of his own religious persuasion; where his influences were most powerful, and where congenial minds were more united in promoting his laudable views. He had long endeavoured to institute an extensive establishment for the education of the children of Friends not in affluence; but nothing was effectually done until, as Dr. Hird observes, 'by one of those fortunate events on which hangs the fate of many great undertakings, the whole of his design became easy and practicable.' On his return from Cheshire, through Yorkshire, in 1778, he did me the favour of being my guest a few days, during which time he was visited by many of his friends in those parts. In one of these interviews, the conversation turned on an institution at Gildersome, a small establishment for the education of poor children amongst the society. The doctor was inquiring into its state and management, and how far it might serve as a model for a larger undertaking; a just description being given of it, with the following remark, that not only this, but all others, however laudable the motives from which they took their rise, must fail of success, without a constant superintending care and unremitting attention to the first great object of the institution. This idea was exemplified by the then present state of the foundling hospital at Ackworth; which, although originating from the most humane principle, and erected at a vast expense, was, from repeated inattentions to the first design, in danger of dilapidation, and ready for public sale. This relation struck the doctor forcibly; 'why may not this,' said he, 'serve the very purpose I am in pursuit of?' To be short, the building, and an estate of eighty acres of land, were purchased, improved, and furnished by subscription. The doctor set a generous example by his own contribution, and an endowment by his will in perpetuity."

"The success of this school rewarded Dr. Fothergill's well grounded expectations, and Dr. Hird's description, communicated in 1781, affords a pleasing prospect of its utility and probable permanency; and I may add, that its improved state at the present time, affords further confirmation of its success. 'There are,' he observes, 'above three hundred children, of both sexes, under the roof, furnished with all the necessary conveniences and comforts of life, properly clothed, and educated in every branch of knowledge suitable for the station in which it is presumed they may be placed. And to the satisfaction of every benevolent heart, it may be truly said, that the institution is at present in a most flourishing state, fully answering the design of its founders; being conducted under the care of a number of chosen guardians, of ability, and of exemplary conduct, with an exactness of order, decency, and propriety, extremely striking, and perfectly pleasing to all who have visited it, though not of the same society. The children are taught habits of regularity, of decency, and respectful subordination to their superiors; of forbearance, affection, and kindness towards each other; and of religious reverence towards their Maker; and I may further add those habits of silence and recollection, taught and practised in the ancient schools of philosophy, inculcated in the scriptures, and most emphatically called the true door of entrance into the school of wisdom."

POISONED WOUNDS.

Many of our readers may recollect having seen in the public prints, accounts of the effects of cupping glasses in arresting the symptoms produced by poisoned wounds. As a large portion of our countrymen are subjected to injuries of this description, from rattlesnakes and other venomous reptiles, it may not be amiss to republish the following extracts from a medical journal, one of which contains an account of a discovery by one of their countrymen. The inference which I would draw from the extracts is this: when a person is bitten by a venomous serpent, (and it is to be presumed that the same principle applies to stings of wasps, &c.) he should immediately apply a large metal button, or some other smooth and hard substance, over the wound, and bind it on extremely tight; to remain so, until proper relief can be had, either by sucking out the poison, with or without the enlargement of the wound, by cutting out the wounded part, &c. &c.

It is reported that the antidote used by the individual who lately allowed himself to be bitten by rattlesnakes in Philadelphia, was found to be a species of St. John's wort, (hypericum.) The evidence of its agency has not been, as yet, deemed entirely conclusive; as the same snakes inflicted several bites which were not followed by violent symptoms; probably from having expended their venom.

The North American Medical and Surgical Journal, published by the Kappa Lambda Society, 1st month, 1828, in speaking of an Essay on Fever, by Dr. Marsh of Dublin, the reviewer proceeds—

"Allusion is made to that portion of Dr. Barry's experiments, which go to prove the suspension, or even prevention of the action of the most powerful poison, applied to an abraded surface, by placing over the part an exhausted glass. Dr. Marsh, in admitting the fact, contests the validity of the inference attempted to be drawn, viz. that the cupping glass operates by preventing the pressure of the air, and consequently, by preventing absorption. He believes, on the contrary, that the edge of the glass presses so strongly, and at times painfully, against the skin, as to produce all the effects of a ligature; and thus cuts off the communication between the parts within the glass, and the rest of the system: added to which, the capillaries of the included part are immensely distended, often to a degree sufficient to produce ecchymosis and petechiæ. In fine, there is not only a suspension of absorption, but every vital action must be impeded in a part so circumstanced: and experiment has proved, that the same effects are produced by a ligature round a limb, as by the cupping glass; and a strong pressure made by a circular body, without at all removing the pressure of the air, will be as efficacious as the exhausted glass. Thus the experiment with the cupping glasses, neither prove that absorption is necessary; nor, admitting its necessity, do they prove that atmospheric pressure has any thing to do with the matter.

We are informed that C. W. Pennock, of this city, has performed a series of experiments on poisoned wounds; in which he has found that the pressure of a flat, circular body, in all instances, arrested the consequent symptoms with the greatest promptitude, to re-appear when the pressure was interrupted. This fact is worthy the attention of those who are exposed to the bites of rattlesnakes.

FOR THE FRIEND.
WOMAN.

Yes, "highly favour'd," to thy care,
Was Light, and Life, and Love confided;
Liv'd on thy bosom, kind and fair,
Th' August, whom men abus'd, derided.
And never, through life's gloomy day,
Was ere one act of thine recorded,
But such as sooth'd His rugged way,
And love, or faith, or hope afforded.
Yes, woman, yes, thy faithful love,
More strong than death, death could not chill;
Earliest and last, thy actions prove,
That even in death thou lov'd him still.
For, lo, unawed by scenes of dread,
Which female fears are wont to fly;
The yawning grave—the rising dead—
The earthquake, and the darken'd sky—
Whilst Palestine's sacred tower
Lay wrapt in twilight's mystic gloom,
Regardless of the lonely hour,
Her daughters seek their Saviour's tomb,
From doubts, from fears, their souls to free,
The truth commission'd angels teach;
A risen Saviour first they see,
A risen Saviour first they preach.
Nain witness'd acts of special grace,
Vouchsaf'd to female bosoms riven;
The widow doth her son embrace,
And Mary weeps o'er sins forgiven.
Simon's cold, calculating pride,
Could disapprove of love's excess;
The costly perfume thus applied,
The streaming tear—the flowing tress.
But He who form'd the eye—the heart,
Her faith, her penitence, could see;
"Daughter, be cheer'd—in peace depart"—
"Much hast thou lov'd—from sin be free."
"And wheresoe'er my gospel's told,
In every clime—to bond—to free;
This act of thine it shall unfold,
A bright memorial of thee."
The coasts of Tyre thy name confess,
A Grecian mother worships thee;
Samaria's daughter hears to bless,
And hastes, that others too may see.
And last—and latest—ere the close
Of His stupendous work of grace;
One lingering wish the Saviour shows,
And found for female love a place.
—O work beyond the reach of thought!
Unfathom'd by archangel's eye;
When justice, and when mercy wrought
For man's redemption! oh, 'tis high—
"High as the heavens"—yet sinners scorn—
The glorious truth they dare deny!
Better we never had been born—
Never had liv'd, than thus to die.

FOR THE FRIEND.

Melioration in criminal law and prison discipline, was among the early and wise determinations of the founder of Pennsylvania. In the infancy of the colony, the "great law" given at Upland,* abolished all the cruel and vindictive penalties known to the code of England, from the days of Alfred to the reign of the second Charles. During the life of Penn, the Province maintained its integrity in this important respect; but in 1718, the entire penal law of Great Britain was enforced here, and continued to be so, down to the revolution. Subsequently, through the labours of some benevolent and gifted minds, the evils and miseries of the old system, were again removed, and great improvements adopted. The example thus furnished, has ever since exerted an influence on the legislation of the states of this continent, in this respect, and Europe herself has profited by the lessons taught in Pennsylvania.

The final consummation of the plan so long ago begun on this favoured spot, is greatly to be desired, and we therefore feel anxious that our readers should cultivate a disposition to inquire, and fully understand the merits of the principle, of the separate, or solitary confinement of convicts.

We had prepared some essays on this subject, which, however, are withheld, to make room for the interesting article below. The experience at the Glasgow Bridewell is highly interesting, and conclusive, on the merits of the plan of treatment, which the new penitentiary near Philadelphia is calculated to enforce.

Our doctrine on this matter, in a few words, is—that punishment should be mild, but sure; that the reform of the criminal, and the prevention of crime, are the true purposes of penal jurisprudence; and that to accomplish these great ends, each individual offender should be kept alone, and treated with reference to his particular moral condition.

GLASGOW BRIDEWELL.

(From the Edinburgh Phrenological Journal, for November, 1827.)

We recently visited this establishment, and were highly pleased with the manner in which it is kept, and with the intelligence, frankness, and practical good sense of Mr. Brebner, the superintendent.

From the 2d of August, 1825, to the 2d of August, 1826, the total number of prisoners committed was 1389.

The four great classes of offences were the following, viz.

1. Theft, pocket-picking, and attempting to steal,	390
2. Reset of theft, fraud, and swindling,	77
3. Assaults, outrages, breach of the peace, rogues, vagabonds, vagrants, and disorderly characters following no lawful employment,	275
4. Women of dissolute habits, guilty of breaches of the peace,	323
	1065
Add returning from banishment, having been formerly convicted of crime,	194
All other offences,	130
	1389

In the Glasgow bridewell (with very few exceptions) every prisoner has a sleeping cell and a working cell for himself; and all communication with each other is completely prevented. They are employed in picking cotton, spinning, winding yarn, weaving, making shoes, &c. in solitude, during the day, and are locked up in solitude during the night. Even on Sundays they are not permitted to assemble together. On week days a regular teacher visits each cell, and communicates instruction; and on Sundays, some pious individuals teach religion. These meritorious persons have formed themselves into a society, and all their members are freely admitted to the prisoners; ladies visit the females, and gentlemen the males.

* Now Chester, the first capital of the Province.

The effect of this treatment will obviously be, to abate the vivacity of the animal propensities, and to rouse the moral and intellectual powers. Solitude and labour will tend powerfully to accomplish the first end; but the means for obtaining the last we think too limited. The average number of prisoners in confinement is 250, and the teacher and visitors can scarcely remain a sufficient time with each to make a deep and lasting impression. The periods of confinement, also, are too short, to favour reformation by moral means. Mr. Brebner furnished the following tables of commitments.

Number of commitments during the year ending 31st Dec. 1825—Males 558—Females 703—Total 1261.

Deduct recommitments of same individual in currency of the year—Males 101—Females 279—Total 380.

Remains nett number of different persons—Males 457—Females 424—Total 881.

Whereof in custody for the first time—Males 360—Females 209—Total 569.

Old offenders—Males 97—Females 215—Total 312.

Number of commitments during the year ending 31st Dec. 1826—Males 688—Females 713—Total 1401.

Deduct recommitments of same individual in currency of the year—Males 124—Females 281—Total 405.

Remains nett number of different persons—Males 564—Females 432—Total 996.

Whereof in custody for the first time—Males 444—Females 189—Total 633.

Old offenders—Males 120—Females 243—Total 363.

He has observed that offenders committed for the first time, for only a short period, almost invariably return to bridewell for new offences; but if committed for a long period, they return less frequently. This fact is established by the following table, framed on an average of ten years, ending 25th of Dec. 1835.

Of prisoners sentenced for the first time to 14 days confinement, there returned for new crimes about	75 per cent.

During the 10 years 93 persons were committed for the first time for two years, of whom not one returned.

We conceive that all criminals should be regarded as patients, whose cure should be the chief object of their treatment. Mr. Brebner, on the contrary, thinks that punishment must never be lost sight of. The effect of the two years confinement, he attributes partly to the fear of punishment, and partly to the habits of order and industry acquired during it. When prisoners come back two or three times, they go on, returning at intervals for many years. He has observed that many prisoners committed for short periods for first offences, are afterwards tried before the high court of judicary, and transported or hanged.

These results confirm the doctrine, that individuals cannot change their character and conduct by a mere act of volition, but that their minds must be operated upon by long continued influences, and gradually ameliorated; just as disease cannot be removed from the body by a spell, but by a sanative process, requiring both time and attention for its completion. The present practice is founded upon ideas of punitive justice, which appear, at first sight, natural and beneficial, but which do not stand the test of reason and rigid analysis. A boy picks a gentleman's pocket of a handkerchief, and is sentenced to fourteen days imprisonment in Bridewell, which seems a moderate and just punishment for a trivial offence; and if any one were to propose to imprison him for two years, the extravagance of the infliction in proportion to the crime, would startle the public mind, and he would become an object of general sympathy. Yet, if the real welfare of the boy be kept in view, and if we believe the foregoing facts, we shall find it difficult to resist the conclusion, that the sentence of fourteen days is, in its ultimate results, attended with far greater severity, and more positive injustice, than would accompany confinement for two years. The offender, in the former case, becomes familiarized with crime, almost invariably returns to Bridewell, and proceeds, from step to step, till he is transported or hanged; in the latter case, his whole habits are changed, and so deep an impression is made on his mind, that he very rarely re-appears in the criminal calendar. We say rarely, because the circumstance of his not afterwards becoming an inmate of Glasgow Bridewell, is no proof of his entire reformation: he may have removed to another territory, where he thinks the law will be administered with less severity. But if the great majority of those confined for long periods did not abandon their criminal pursuits, some would undoubtedly find their way back to their old quarters; and as none appear to return, we may safely infer that many are permanently reformed.

It seems to us, then, that a sentence of fourteen days for a first offence, is, in its ultimate consequences, more prejudicial to the welfare of the criminal than one for a longer period; and yet there appears an evident absurdity in proposing to punish a grave delinquency with imprisonment for fourteen days, and a trivial one with confinement for two years. But this just proves that there is an error in the principle on which criminal justice is administered. The absurdity arises from this circumstance, that the criminal law regards every offender as a voluntary devotee to crime, and occupies itself exclusively in administering a certain quantity of suffering for a certain degree of guilt, without reference either to the causes of the transgression, or the consequences of its own treatment. If this principle were sound in nature, it would be successful in practice. The infliction of fourteen days confinement would not, in its general effects, turn out more severe than imprisonment for two years. In short, the facts contained in the table of "prisoners returning" could not happen.

The extent and depth of the disease are to be gathered from the whole symptoms and condition of the patient, and the sanative process ought to be conducted with reference to these. A boy, whose father is out of work, and who has tasted no food for twenty-four hours, may steal a loaf from a baker's basket standing temptingly on the street; another boy, well-fed, clothed, and educated, may pick a pocket, and drink the produce of his depredation. Both of these acts are thefts; but the one may happen with a boy of very considerable natural morality, who would be completely protected from offending again by removal of the temptation; in other words, by being supplied with food. The other indicates a decided deficiency of natural morality, with great strength of depraved appetite; and to protect the offender from repetition of his crime, his mind would require to be subjected to a long course of discipline; one part of which will necessarily consist of measures for abating his evil propensities, and another of means for elevating his moral and intellectual principles. According to this view, the treatment of each criminal would bear reference to his depravity, and not depend exclusively on the external form in which his evil qualities manifested themselves. One man may fall senseless to the ground through inanition, and another from apoplexy. What should we think of the physician who should treat both in the same way? The case of the mind is parallel; and it is only gross ignorance of mental philosophy that can perpetuate the present system of criminal legislation.

Mr. Brebner admitted, that a boy confined for a long period for his first offence, was really more fortunate than one confined only for a few days; but he objected to the apparent injustice of long imprisonment for slight offences. The injustice, however, is obviously only apparent; the real severity is in the short confinement. No doubt, as long as offenders are committed with the view of punishment exclusively, Mr. Brebner's objection is unanswerable; and the principle of cure or reformation must be adopted, before consistency between intention and result can be obtained. In the Glasgow Bridewell, every thing that can be done, in the way of restraining evil tendencies, appears to be accomplished. The solitary confinement, regular employment, and mild treatment of the prisoners, are well calculated to allay the excessive activity of the animal propensities; but we repeat, that, in our opinion, much is wanting to elevate their moral and intellectual faculties. The effects produced by long and solitary confinement, even with this deficiency, however, show forcibly how much good might be accomplished by a well conducted penitentiary.

The following lines are so in accordance with nature, and the sensibilities which must swell the bosom of a virtuous parent towards his offspring, that we thought they might properly fill a space in our pages. There is a sweet and tender pathos in the last stanza but one, an elevation of moral and pious feeling in the third, fifth, and last.

From the Spirit and Manners of the Age.

TO MY INFANT SON.

Thy mother bade me weave a lay,
A lay of love, for thee;
And I with willing mind obey,
Though tuneless all it be,
Though words but mock the fond excess
Of love, of hope, of tenderness,
Which thou hast wrought in me;
And though my harp's degenerate chords,
Faint echos yield to powerless words.

O could my heart, flown to my tongue,
Dissolve itself in sound;
Or did my harp, now all unstrung,
With dulcet tones abound;
Then would I strike a chord should chain
The mind, and draw forth tears like rain,
When I am in the ground:
But thou, should heaven thy life prolong,
May'st value e'en this rugged song.

But it may be, my boy, thy life
Is in its spring to cease;
It may be, that e'er manhood's strife
Thou'lt find eternal peace;
And ne'er should wish of mine be lent,
Were wishes potent, to prevent
Thy happy soul's release;
He metes thy days, my little one,
Who gave thee life—His will be done!

And this world many a peril hath,
If thou should'st tarry here,
Toils, cares, and griefs, lie in thy path,
And manhood's rough career
Will dash the gladness from thy brow,
The freshness from thy cheek, and thou,
Perchance, may'st shed the tear
O'er all thou lov'd'st, as earth receives
Them one by one, like autumn's leaves.

But ever pure may be thy breast,
In grief—in joy, the same;
And never may dishonour rest
Its cloud upon thy name;
But may'st thou early learn to prize
The plaudits of the good and wise,
Alone as real fame;
Nor let the race absorb thy soul,
But keep thine eye fixed on the goal.

Thy mother!—never may her eye
Be damp with tears for thee,
Save for those little ills which try
Thy tender infancy;
And may'st thou to man's sterner worth
Join her warm heart—her guileless mirth—
Her frankness—constancy;—
Her love, which time cannot estrange,
Which knows no ebb—and knows no change.

And when at length into thy breast
Death's chilling tremors creep,
O may'st thou sink into its rest,
As to a gentle sleep,
Unreach'd by doubt—unchafed by pain—
Leaving behind thee not a stain
O'er which the good may weep;
But with thy spirit plumed to rise
To that pure world beyond the skies.

In the following personification and description of Envy, from Spencer, the prince of Old English poetry, there is admirable energy and truth of delineation.

Malicious Envy rode
Upon a ravenous wolf, and still did chew
Between his canker'd teeth, a ven'mous toad,
That all the poison ran about his jaw:
But inwardly, he chewed his own maw
At neighbour's wealth, that made him ever sad:
For death it was when any good he saw,
And wept, that cause of weeping none he had,
But when he heard of harm, he wax'd wond'rous glad.

He hated all good works, and virtuous deeds,
And him no less that any like did use;
And who with gracious bread the hungry feeds,
His alms for want of faith, he doth accuse;
So every good to bad he doth abuse;
And eke the verse of famous poet's wit,
He does backbite, and spiteful poison spews
From lep'rous mouth on all that ever writ:
Such one, vile Envy was.

Successful pursuit.—Nathaniel Snellson, teller of the discount office of the bank of Virginia, having absconded on the 21st of October, with about 40,000 dollars, chiefly in Virginia bank notes, of one hundred dollars each, and bills upon some houses in Liverpool, was traced through the United States to Quebec, where he took his passage on board the Mary Cumming, bound to this port, which sailed on the 2d November, twelve hours before his pursuer reached that place. Notices of these circumstances, with copies of a handbill describing his person, and offering a reward of $500 for his apprehension and safe delivery to the jailor of the town of Petersburg, from which he had absconded, were forwarded hither by a vessel which sailed from Quebec on the 3d November, and arrived here on Saturday; as also from New-York, by the packet ships Leeds, which arrived on Sunday, and Canada, which arrived on Tuesday; in the latter of which, one of the directors of the bank came as passenger. Boughey and Roberts, the police officers, were accordingly directed to look out for the arrival of the Mary Cumming, which they boarded as she was entering the King's dock basin, on Wednesday last; and acquainting the delinquent with their errand, received from him about $30,000, in notes and bills; being the whole of the stolen property which remained. He also quietly surrendered himself, and expressed his willingness to return to America with the gentleman who had followed him hither. —Liverpool Chronicle.

ELISHA BATES AND THE BEREAN.

In pursuing the "reviews" of the Pamphlet of Extracts and doctrines of Friends, as they have been carried on in the Berean, it is not my wish to descend into unnecessary strictures, nor yet to pass over any thing which may have contributed to make a wrong impression on honestly inquiring minds.

In the review of the pamphlet, and more particularly in that of the "doctrines," the charge of Trinitarianism is advanced against me, first, as not being held "knowingly," and then as being "a favourite point," "strenuously inculcated," and that I have shown "more anxiety to maintain and defend it than any other in the whole book;" while our early Friends are represented as denying the doctrine of distinctions and every modification of the Trinitarian scheme, &c. How far these representations are just, I shall leave to the impartial reader. But before I proceed to adduce authorities for the views I have presented to the public, I will take the liberty to observe, that the Berean, finding certain passages in the writings of the early members of the Society, designed to expose the gross ideas of "THREE DISTINCT, and SEPARATE PERSONS in the God-head," "the IMPOSSIBILITY of God's pardoning sinners without a plenary satisfaction," and "the JUSTIFICATION of IMPURE persons by imputative righteousness,"—has availed himself of such passages to support opinions directly UNITARIAN. The reader, when perusing the controversial writings of our ancient friends, is requested to bear in mind what were the grounds of controversy then. As respects what is called the doctrine of the Trinity, the society have never acknowledged the propriety of the use of the terms distinct and separate persons, and they have occasionally, in opposing them, pointed out the gross ideas which are apt to arise from a use of those terms. And it deserves to be noticed, that some professed Trinitarians, of modern times, have acknowledged that the term person is not appropriate, and regret that it was ever introduced.

It will, therefore, I think, be obvious to the unbiased mind, how unfair it is to keep out of view the ancient ground of controversy, and gather up the most pointed arguments which were formerly used against distinct and separate personality, and construe them to maintain the opposite extreme of unitarianism, when so many incontestible evidences have been left on record, to guard against such a construction.

The caution with which the writers of the Society have guarded against giving definitions of the mode of subsistence in the Divine Nature, and the reasons on which were founded the use of the terms, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, ought not to be construed into the denial of a doctrine which they distinctly acknowledged—confessed to be a great mystery, and wished to leave on the ground of Scripture testimony.

In the Doctrines I made the following observations: "Should any have remarked that I have not made the Trinity or the Atonement subjects of distinct articles, and be dissatisfied with the supposed omission, I would observe: that a belief in God, and his divine attributes, is evident throughout the whole work, and did not appear to require a particular article; seeing also, that this first principle of religion is universally believed. The divinity of Jesus Christ, together with his appearance in the flesh—and the benefits which all men have derived from what he did outwardly and may derive from what he does inwardly, is fully acknowledged in an article devoted to that purpose; and also to several other articles, which are nominally on other subjects. The Holy Spirit, and its presence and operation in the hearts of men, according to the precious promises of our blessed Lord, are acknowledged in the article on Immediate Revelation, and in divers other parts of the work. I have therefore chosen to follow the example of the Holy Scriptures, or the holy men who were inspired to write them, in leaving the subject on this general ground, rather than to imitate those speculative theologians, who, attempting to explain the divine Nature, and its mode of subsistence, have involved themselves in endless difficulties."

In the pamphlet I quoted three short passages, the first from William Penn's "Testimony to the Truth," and the whole of what he had arranged in that division of his treatise; which was written expressly to remove certain unjust imputations which had been cast on the Society; the second an extract from an epistle in the name of the Society, and which appears to have been written by Geo. Fox, dated 1668; the last from Robert Barclay's Vindication of his Apology. These, therefore, were all EXPLANATORY—they were declarations, made to remove certain imputations against the Society, in relation to the question before us. I made no explanation or application of these extracts—I stated nothing of my own on the subject of the Trinity. In the beginning, I said no more than was necessary to introduce the quotations, and after that from Wm. Penn, made the following remarks:

"This treatise was written thirty years after the Sandy Foundation Shaken. But we see this testimony from the same author, and after so many years, of what he, in common with his friends, 'ever believed and constantly maintained.'"

In page 104, the Berean says: "The quotations that the author [of the pamphlet] has made from the writings of primitive Friends to prove that they believed in the doctrine of distinctions, or in some undefined modification of a threefold existence of the divinity, and that they held such an outward apprehension thereof as a fundamental in religion, will avail nothing. A volume of Extracts called the 'Christian Quaker,' has already been published to prove the CONTRARY. The conclusion to be drawn then, is, that these writers, when beyond the limits of their own experience, were divided among themselves on certain points more speculative than practical."—I had said nothing of "the doctrine of distinctions," or "modification of a threefold existence of the divinity." I left the extracts themselves to express their own meaning. And therefore the Berean had nothing but the extracts to explain the propositions which they were taken to prove.

But we are told these quotations will avail nothing, not because they do not, as they stand in the pamphlet, express the writers' sentiments, but because other extracts have been published to prove a contrary opinion—and the conclusion of the argument is, not the truth or falsity of either opinion, but the fact that these writers, venturing beyond the limits of their experience, were divided among themselves. But who were the parties in this division? Wm. Penn, Robert Barclay, and the Society of Friends, on one side, (for these are the authorities which I had quoted,) and Wm. Penn and George Whitehead on the other, (for these are the persons, from whose writings that volume of Extracts was taken, as the Berean said, to prove the CONTRARY.) A singular division indeed! Wm. Penn holding the most prominent place on both sides! But it appears that the extract I had taken from Penn's Testimony, was written in the year 1698; 30 years after the "Sandy Foundation," and 25 after the "Christian Quaker," which are the two most remarkable pieces contained in the volume of Extracts, to which the Berean refers. And Wm. Penn expressly says, that he and his friends ever held, and as constantly maintained, the doctrine contained in that extract from his Testimony. (A corroborating testimony will also be produced from George Whitehead.) Thus, his proof to "the contrary," amounts to nothing, because this declaration of Penn's in '98, applies to every thing which had been previously written, that had been construed to express a CONTRARY opinion. It is a testimony too, in point, that friends of that day were not divided among themselves on the subject.

Though the Berean had told his readers that the extracts I had made would avail nothing; and to make sure of it, drew the conclusion, that the writers of that period, when beyond the limits of their experience, were divided among themselves, he seemed sensible that all this would not answer his purpose; and, accordingly, in his next number, p. 116, takes up the subject again, and gives the first of these quotations which I had made, and which I also will insert, for the convenience of those who have not seen the pamphlet of Extracts.

"Concerning the Father, the Word, and the Spirit: Because we have been very cautious in expressing our faith concerning that great mystery, especially in such school terms and philosophical distinctions as are unscriptural, if not unsound, (the tendency whereof hath been to raise frivolous controversies and animosities amongst men,) we have, by those that desire to lessen our Christian reputation, been represented as deniers of the Trinity at large: whereas, we ever believed, and as constantly maintained, the truth of that blessed (Holy Scripture) Three that bare record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and Spirit, and that these Three are One; the which we both sincerely and reverently believed, according to 1 John v. 7. And this is sufficient for us to believe and know, and hath a tendency to edification and holiness; when the contrary centres only in imaginations and strife, and persecution, where it runs high, and to parties, as may be read in bloody characters in ecclesiastical histories."—Penn's Select Works, p. 811.

The Berean queries: "What then did they believe, and constantly maintain according to this writer? Why the Trinity at large." I might ask, what writer? W. Penn or E. Bates? It was W. Penn that said they had, by those that desired to lessen their Christian reputation, "been represented as deniers of the Trinity at large." The Berean goes on to say: "Now what construction shall be put on this indefinite expression of Penn? That he believed in a Trinity? Certainly not." And he expresses a fear that I have not dealt quite fairly with W. Penn, and our primitive friends, in selecting this passage, which he calls the most obscure and incautious; he "remembers to have seen in their writings."

And then reiterates a charge, that I have selected certain passages from the writings of our primitive friends, in order to prove that they maintained certain doctrines which they denied a thousand times! The injustice of this retort will be evident from the simple fact, that this passage from Penn, is a declaration of belief in vindication of the Society from an unjust censure, and all the explanation which he gave under that head, and I gave it as W. Penn did, without abridgment, enlargement, or construction.

To show, however, that I have not done injustice to our friends of early times, and attributed to them opinions which they denied a thousand times, I will add a few other quotations. And here, as in the former case, I shall leave it to themselves to designate what they did and what they did not hold in relation to the Trinity.

"Therefore, all friends, watch against every temptation thereunto, as you love your lives, as you regard the good and eternal welfare of your souls; and let not the name, nor person of any man have power over you, to draw you aside, neither let numbers sway with you; in which, I know, these adversaries of truth do not a little boast, (though, blessed be God, with little reason,) but remember that Jeroboam of old had ten tribes out of twelve to cry up his separate altar; notwithstanding which, he is branded to posterity in the holy record with this brand. Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin. 2 Kings xiv. 24. Therefore, let not any follow a multitude to do evil. Exod. xxiii. 2. But all follow that which is good, both among yourselves, and to all men. 1 Thess. v. 15. For, friends you know whither the broad way leads, and what it is the wide gate opens into, which the many go in at; but keep ye to the strait gate, and walk ye on in the narrow way; for in it is safety, and at the end of it everlasting happiness.

"But, friends, because of the straitness of this gate and the narrowness of this way, some that have attempted to walk in it, are grown weary of it, and have sought out another way, a way which (Jeroboam like) they have devised of their own hearts; wherein they may have more room, more scope, more company, ease in the flesh, liberty to the flesh, and all without control. And this, I am satisfied, hath not been the least motive to the separation in this day (as it was the greatest in days past,) though some that have been drawn into it may not, perhaps, see the ground upon which it was undertaken. But the Lord hath opened an eye in many, which sees the rise and ground, entrance and end of this libertine spirit and its work. And this eye will the Lord daily open more and more in all that diligently and in sincerity wait upon him. Therefore, all friends, every where, who have not yet a clear sight, and a thorough understanding of the nature and work, design and drift, of this dividing spirit, wait, I beseech you, in simplicity of heart, and lowliness of mind, upon the Lord, and keep to the measure of the grace you have received from him; and suffer not your minds to be swayed or biased by any personal kindness, natural affection, relation, kindred, or acquaintance; but stand single and open to the Lord; not joining to, nor any way countenancing that which the testimony of truth, in the risings of the heavenly life, and breakings forth of the divine power through any, goes forth against. So will your present standing be safe and you be preserved out of the same snares of this insinuating and treacherous spirit; and the Lord, in his appointed time, as you abide with him, will open your understandings further, and give you a clearer sight of that, which at present you do not fully see; and thereby bring you to that certainty and assurance, which (blessed be his name) he hath brought many unto.

"And you, my dear friends, whose spirits the Lord hath stirred up, and whose hearts he hath engaged in an holy zeal, to stand up for his blessed name and truth, and to bear a faithful testimony against this wicked, rending spirit: go on in the strength and power of the Lord, in the might of the God of Jacob; for you are assuredly on the Lord's side; and the Lord Jehovah, the strength of Israel, is on your side. Therefore, friends, be encouraged in the Lord to stand steadfast in your testimony, not giving way to the enemy, no, not for a moment. And take heed, I beseech you, in the love of God, how ye enter into any treaty of peace, or terms of agreement with this ungodly, treacherous spirit, which is out of the truth, and draws out of the truth, and fights against the truth; for there is no peace unto it, saith my God. And they who have joined themselves unto it, and have wickedly given themselves up to be acted by it, and to act for it, must pass through the river of judgment, if ever they be redeemed from under its power. Friends, condemnation must first be felt and owned, before reconciliation can be known; and the fire of the Lord must pass upon the transgressor, to consume the works of darkness, the ungodly deeds, the envious, reviling speeches, the wicked, malicious, slanderous books and pamphlets, &c. and to burn up the ground from whence they sprang. For a flaming sword hath the Lord God set in his Eden, which turneth every way; and none that are gone out can ever come in again, but these must pass under the flaming edge thereof. Therefore, my dear friends, stand your ground in the authority of the heavenly life, and tamper not with God's enemies; remember the word of the Lord to the prophet, Let them return unto thee; but return not thou unto them, Jer. xv. 15. And then what follows? I will make thee unto this people a fenced brazen wall, and they shall fight against thee, but they shall not prevail against thee; for I am with thee, to save thee, and to deliver thee, saith the Lord, ver. 20. So the God of life fill your hearts daily more and more with a Phineas' zeal for the honour of his name; and furnish you abundantly with wisdom and counsel, with boldness and courage, with strength and power, to encounter and overcome the enemy; and make every one more watchful against the spirit of the world, to withstand it in all its allurements to vanity of whatsoever kind; that whatsoever would defile the camp of the Lord may be purged out, and kept out, that the Lord may more and more delight in his people, and shower down his blessings upon them."

FOR THE FRIEND.

The following memoir presents us with a short, but interesting account of a sincere, devoted, and humble Christian. It adds another to the innumerable company of the just made perfect, who have gone before us unto glory, who lived and died in the faith of the gospel, and attested the sacred truths of the divinity and propitiation of Jesus with their dying breath. It furnishes another evidence to corroborate the testimony of a cloud of faithful witnesses, that not only through the temptations and afflictions of life, but in the agonies and awful conflict of death, these doctrines of our holy religion furnish the purest consolations, the holiest hopes, and the surest safeguard to the soul; that they exert a moral and religious influence over the mind, which not only animate and purify it, during the period of its earthly probation, but accompany it beyond the grave, and unlock the mansions of eternal bliss.

Solomon Underhill was among the first to detect the unsoundness of Elias Hicks; he saw the dangerous consequences which would inevitably follow from his principles; and he set himself, with the firmness and zeal of a faithful watchman, to oppose their propagation, and to warn his friends against adopting them. He continued steadfast in his testimony against them, to the close of life; and when laid upon a dying bed, his faith in Christ triumphed over the infirmities of nature, and enabled him to rejoice even in suffering, having an unshaken evidence that he had not followed cunningly devised fables, but the eternal truth as it is in Jesus.

A BRIEF MEMOIR OF SOLOMON UNDERHILL.

SOLOMON UNDERHILL was born at Cedar Swamp, near Westbury, Long Island, the 30th day of the 10th month, 1748. His parents, Amos and Elizabeth Underhill, respectable members of the religious Society of Friends, were desirous of giving him as good an education as the schools in the neighbourhood afforded; but both of them dying whilst he was young, he was left under the care of his elder brothers, who kept a distillery, in which he was put to labour. This occupation exposed him to many temptations, calculated to alienate his mind from the path of piety and virtue; but through the condescending mercy of our blessed Redeemer, he was visited with the secret influences of his Holy Spirit, whereby he was early convinced of the iniquity of the business, and became so deeply impressed with it, that he endeavoured to dissuade his brothers from continuing in the employment. His uneasiness with it increased, until he believed it right for him entirely to decline labouring in the distillery; and so scrupulous was he in relation to it, that he was not easy to carry any article to those engaged therein.

When about seventeen years of age, he was deeply exercised on account of his everlasting welfare; and after a time of close, inward conflict, was strengthened to surrender himself to divine disposal, entering into solemn covenant with his heavenly Father, to serve him in all his requirings. Through the continued extension of divine assistance, he was enabled to keep covenant with his God, and to yield more entire dedication to the Lord's will than he had hitherto done.

Having patiently submitted to the crucifying power of the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, and endured those refining baptisms which are necessary to qualify for service in his church, he was called to the work of the ministry of the gospel, and his appearance in this line being acceptable to his friends, he was acknowledged as a minister in unity with the society.

Believing it required of him to travel in the work of the ministry, he performed a religious visit to Friends in New England, in the year 1779, which act of dedication to the Lord's will, yielded him the reward of true peace. After this, he twice visited those parts, and by the accounts received from Friends there, his labours of love appear to have been satisfactory and edifying. In one of these visits, he accompanied David Sands, an eminent minister in the Society of Friends, and through the divine blessing their labours were made instrumental in reclaiming some persons who had been drawn from the right way. In one meeting, particularly, an individual who stood in the station of a minister, for want of greater watchfulness and humility, had become exalted above the pure witness of the truth in his own mind, and by various plausible pretexes had deluded many unwary and unstable minds. Those Friends who could not unite with him and his party, had yielded to discouragements, and almost entirely withdrawn from the attendance of their religious meetings, except one Friend, who dared not absent himself, but stood firm through all opposition. David Sands and Solomon Underhill paid a visit to this meeting, and laboured, with much affectionate fervency, to reclaim the disaffected, and to reanimate the friends of truth to a faithful discharge of their religious duties. These labours of love were enforced by a committee of the yearly meeting who attended, and the strength and assistance thus afforded proved so effectual, that Friends resumed the attendance of their meetings, and were enabled to maintain the discipline over the heads of those disorderly persons. They afterwards set up a separate meeting, which however continued but a little while, when they became divided among themselves, and dwindled entirely away.

About the thirty-second year of his age, he was married to Lydia Mott, an amiable and pious woman, and settled himself in the business of farming, but his mind being chiefly concerned about those things which pertain to life and salvation, and the welfare of the religious society of which he was a member, he freely devoted himself to the service of his divine Master: being in good measure redeemed from the desire of laying up treasures on earth, he pursued business with becoming moderation, endeavouring to make his temporal affairs a secondary consideration.

During the middle part of his life, he was a member of the meeting for sufferings in New-York, in which, as well as other services of the Society, he was often usefully employed. His example in the due attendance of all our religious meetings, both for worship and discipline, was worthy of imitation; never suffering his business to interfere with his reasonable duty, but cheerfully giving up all, in order to present himself before the Lord. When thus assembled with his brethren, his deportment was solemn and weighty, well becoming the occasion for which they had met, and showing that his mind was seriously engaged in the great duty of humbly waiting upon the Lord for the renewal of spiritual strength.

He took great delight in perusing the Holy Scriptures, and was well instructed in those divine precepts and holy doctrines which they contain. He always entertained a reverent esteem for these sacred records, and spent much of his time in reading them, and the writings of our primitive friends. His mind being earnestly engaged to seek for right instruction, he became well grounded in the belief of the truths of the Christian religion, which he frequently enforced upon his auditory in his public testimonies, especially of recent time. His faith, however, did not consist in a mere historical belief of those saving truths which are there recorded, but having yielded to the sanctifying operation of the Holy Ghost, he was made an experimental witness of the benefits of salvation in and through Christ Jesus, as our Mediator and Atonement, and could say with the apostle, "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of Life; that which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us, and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ."

During the last twenty years of his life, his labours were principally confined to his own meeting, and those in the vicinity, where he had frequent religious service. Within a few years past his mind became deeply exercised under an apprehension that a spirit of unbelief in some of the essential doctrines of the Christian religion, was secretly spreading among the members of his own Quarterly Meeting. Although this subtle spirit made its insidious approaches under the specious guise of a high profession of spirituality in religion, and a sanctimonious exterior, yet he quickly detected it, and, with Christian boldness, laboured to expose its deceit, and the dangerous consequences which it would inevitably produce. Unhappily many were deluded by it, some of whom became open advocates of unsound principles, boldly rejecting the truths of the gospel, and substituting for them the plausible but fallacious systems of human contrivance.

He continued, however, to the end of his days, to maintain a firm and undaunted testimony against it, unmoved by all the persuasion and smooth professions of love, which were resorted to, in order to change his opinions. At the public meeting succeeding the quarterly meeting at Westbury, in the seventh month, 1825, a person* addressed the audience at considerable length, on doctrinal subjects. After this discourse was concluded, an aged and worthy elder belonging to that quarterly meeting rose, and in a concise and respectful manner informed the assembly that some of the sentiments delivered were not held or acknowledged by the Society of Friends. Solomon Underhill, in a proper and becoming manner, also expressed a similar opinion.

This simple expression of his sentiment was construed by some individuals into an offence, and he was accordingly arraigned before the monthly meeting. Having acted on the occasion, in conformity with what he conscientiously believed to be his religious duty, and feeling the reward of peace for his obedience therein, he could not consent to make any acknowledgment of error, nor in any wise to retract what he had said. After continuing his case under care for eleven months, during all which period he was deprived of the privilege of sitting in meetings for discipline, it was finally dismissed from the minutes. At this time his health had greatly declined, which, with his age, and the infirmities consequent upon it, prevented him from ever attending a monthly meeting afterwards.

FOR THE FRIEND.

THE ELDERS OF PHILADELPHIA AND ELIAS HICKS.

I have related in a former paper the failure of the attempt to procure an interview between Elias Hicks and Ezra Comfort. One of the same friends called on him again on the 9th, and urged the propriety of the interview, with no better success than before. Elias Hicks had, in the mean time, preached at Pine street in the morning, and at Green street in the afternoon of the 8th. His sermons at both places were exceptionable, and marked by the peculiarity of his views. On the next day, the elders of the five meetings in the city were convened to deliberate on the course which it was proper to pursue in the discharge of their duty as officers of the church. They deputed two of their number to call on him, and request that he would meet the elders, in a private interview, and allow them an opportunity of laying before him the serious charges which had been made against him, and the concern and exercise which had been occasioned by his public ministry. The request was refused by Elias; but on the next day, the 10th, one of his friends called on an elder, and informed him that Elias would meet them at Green street meeting house, on the 12th, at 5 o'clock, P.M. The elders agreed to meet him, and repaired to the place at the time appointed. They had received no intimation that any others were to be present than Elias and his companion, and were much surprised at finding a promiscuous assemblage of persons, among whom were many not members of any meeting of ministers and elders. It would have been contrary to the whole spirit and practice of our discipline to have entered upon the subject of such a conference before so mixed a company; and as those persons refused to withdraw, and as Elias showed no disposition to accede to a private interview, the elders left the house.

Upon the following correspondence which ensued, I shall offer some remarks and illustrations in the next number.

To Elias Hicks—Friends in Philadelphia having for a considerable time past heard of thy holding and promulgating doctrines different from, and repugnant to, those held by our religious society, it was cause of uneasiness and deep concern to them, as their sincere regard and engagement for the promotion of the cause of truth, made it very desirable that all the members of our religious society should move in true harmony, under the leading and direction of our blessed Redeemer. Upon being informed of thy sentiments expressed by Joseph Whittall, "that Christ was not the Son of God, until after the baptism of John, and the descent of the Holy Ghost, and that he was no more than a man; that the same power that made Christ a Christian must make us Christians; and that the same power that saved him must save us;" many Friends were much affected therewith, and sometime afterwards, several Friends being together in the city on subjects relating to our religious society, they received an account from Ezra Comfort, of some of thy expressions in the public general meeting immediately succeeding the southern quarterly meeting, lately held in the state of Delaware, which was also confirmed by his companion, Isaiah Bell, "that Jesus Christ was the first man who introduced the gospel dispensation. The Jews being under the outward and ceremonial law or dispensation, it was necessary that there should be some outward miracles, as the healing the outward infirmities of the flesh, and raising the outward dead bodies, in order to introduce the gospel dispensation. He (Jesus) had no more power given him than man, for he was no more than man, he had nothing to do with healing the soul, for that belongs to God only. Elisha also had the same power to raise the dead; that man, being obedient to the Spirit of God in him, could arrive at as great, or a greater degree of righteousness, than Jesus Christ. That Jesus Christ thought it not robbery to be equal with God, neither do I think it robbery for a man to be equal with God: then endeavoured to show that by attending to that stone cut out of the mountain without hands, or the seed in man, it would make man equal with God, saying, for that stone in man was the entire God." On hearing which, it appeared to Friends a subject of such great importance, and of such deep interest to the welfare of our religious society, as to require an early extension of care, in order, that if any incorrect statement had been made, it should, as soon as possible, be rectified, or, if true, that thou might be possessed of the painful concern of Friends, and their sense and judgment thereon. Two of the elders accordingly waited on thee, on the evening of the day of thy arrival in the city, and although thou denied the statement, yet thy declining to meet these two elders, in company with those who made it, left the mind of Friends without relief; one of the elders who had called on thee, repeated his visit on the next day but one, and again requested thee to see the two elders and the Friends who made the above statements, which thou again declined. The elders from the different monthly meetings in the city were then convened, and requested an interview with thee, which thou also refused; yet next day consented to meet them, at a time and place of thy own fixing. But when they assembled, a mixed company being collected, the elders could not in this manner enter into a business which they considered of a nature not to be investigated in any other way than in a select private opportunity. They therefore considered that meeting a clear indication of thy continuing to decline to meet the elders, as by them proposed. Under these circumstances, it appearing that thou art not willing to hear and disprove the charges brought against thee, we feel it a duty to declare, that we cannot have religious unity with thy conduct, nor with the doctrines thou art charged with promulgating.

Elias Hicks' Reply.

To Caleb Pierce, and the other Friends—Having been charged by you of unsoundness of principle and doctrine, founded on reports spread among the people in an unfriendly manner, and contrary to the order of our discipline, by Joseph Whittall, as stated in a letter from you, dated the 19th instant; and as these are charges not literally true, being founded on his own forced and improper construction of my words, I deny them; and as I do not consider myself amenable to him, or any other, for crimes laid to my charge, as being committed in the course of the sitting of our last yearly meeting, as not any of my fellow members of that meeting discovered or noticed any such things, which I presume not to be the case, as not an individual has mentioned any such thing to me, but contrary thereto, many of our most valuable Friends (who had heard some of these foul reports promulgated by an individual of our city) acknowledged the great satisfaction they had with my services and exercise in the course of that meeting, and were fully convinced; that all those reports were false, and this view is fully confirmed by a certificate granted me by the monthly and quarterly meetings of which I am a member, in which they express their full unity with me, and which meetings were held a considerable time after our yearly meeting, in the course of which Joseph Whittall has presumed to charge me with unsoundness, contrary to the sense of the yearly, quarterly, and monthly meetings of which I am a member, and to whom only I hold myself amenable for all conduct transacted within their limits. The other charges against me made by Ezra Comfort, as expressed in your letter, are in the general incorrect, as is proved by the annexed certificate, and moreover as E. Comfort has departed from gospel order in not mentioning his uneasiness to me when present with me, and when I could have appealed to Friends of that meeting to have justified me, therefore I consider E. Comfort to have acted disorderly and contrary to discipline; and these are the reasons that induced me to refuse a compliance with your requisitions, as considering them arbitrary and contrary to the established order of our society.

Philadelphia, 1mo. 4, 1823.

To Elias Hicks—On the perusal of thy letter of the 21st of last month, it was not a little affecting to observe the same disposition still prevalent that avoided a select meeting with the elders, which meeting, consistently with the station we are placed in, and with the sense of duty impressive upon us, we were engaged to propose and urge to thee as a means wherein the cause of uneasiness might have been investigated, the Friends who exhibited the complaint fully examined, and the whole business placed in a clear point of view.

On a subject of such importance, the most explicit candour and ingenuousness, with a readiness to hear and give complete satisfaction, ought ever to be maintained; this the gospel teaches, and the nature of the case imperiously demanded it. As to the certificate which accompanied thy letter, made several weeks after the circumstances occurred, it is in several respects not only vague and ambiguous, but in others (though in different terms) it corroborates the statement at first made. When we take a view of the whole subject, the doctrines and sentiments which have been promulgated by thee, though under some caution while in this city; and the opinions which thou expressed in an interview between Ezra Comfort and thee on the 16th ult. we are fully and sorrowfully confirmed in the conclusion that thou holds and art disseminating principles very different from those which are held and maintained by our religious society.

As thou hast, on thy part, closed the door against the brotherly care and endeavours of the elders here for thy benefit, and for the clearing our religious profession, this matter appears of such serious magnitude, so interesting to the peace, harmony, and well being of society, that we think it ought to claim the weighty attention of thy friends at home.

Signed, Caleb Pierce, Samuel P. Griffiths, Thomas Stewardson, Edward Randolph, Israel Maul, Ellis Yarnall, Thomas Wistar, Leonard Snowden, Joseph Scattergood.

Being present when the foregoing letter was concluded on, I unite with the concern and care of my brethren, the elders of this city, that our religious Society might not be under the imputation of holding doctrines which do not accord with the testimony of the Holy Scriptures. JONATHAN EVANS.

REVIEW

Of "An Exposition of the Faith of the Religious Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, in the Fundamental Doctrines of the Christian Religion; principally selected from their Early Writings. By Thomas Evans. 'Speak thou the things which become sound doctrine.' Paul to Titus. Philadelphia, 1828. Kimber and Sharpless, 10, south Fourth street, and B. and T. Kite, 20, north Third street."

It is a remarkable fact, that whilst our religious Society has been calumniated and misrepresented by open enemies, and treacherous friends, to a degree scarcely paralleled in the history of the Christian church, no people have been more frequent, candid, and earnest in their endeavours to promulgate and expose before the whole world their true faith and principles.

In the early days of the Society, individual members, and the body in its associated capacity, issued numerous declarations of their faith, setting forth in the clearest and most indubitable manner, the truly Christian and scriptural nature of their profession. With an anxious desire that none should misunderstand, misrepresent, or calumniate their high and holy calling, rarely was an opponent left to pass by unnoticed or unproved, or a degenerate brother left without proper warning and rebuke. Unwearied in their endeavours to hold forth their sacred profession in its unsullied brightness, they patiently met and refuted again and again the very same charges, preferred sometimes by one opponent, and sometimes by another; nothing was esteemed too malicious, too trivial, or too harmless, to escape prompt and specific notice, if it tended to mar, in the eyes of the beholders, the beauty and excellency of the truth as it was in Jesus. Hence it was that our faithful predecessors, amidst all their labours, travels, and imprisonments, published to the world so large a number of works, as we find were issued during the first 50 years after the foundation of the society. It is really cause of rejoicing that we have preserved to us so many and various expositions of the principles of the society from the pens of nearly all the most distinguished and exemplary of its primitive members, as it enables us to ascertain what it was that our forefathers professed, for what they suffered, and what the inheritance is that they have transmitted to us, and which it is our indispensable duty to maintain unsullied and unimpaired.

Notwithstanding (to use the language of sacred writ) "we are encompassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses," it is cause of painful feeling, that so many should have, at this time of day, departed from the good old ways in which their fathers walked, should have rejected the very profession for which they endured the deepest sufferings; and have lightly esteemed that blessed Redeemer, who was the rock of their salvation, and the hope of their glory.

One cause, perhaps, of the present state of affairs amongst those who have been called by the name of Quakers, is to be found in the deplorable ignorance, which has prevailed, of the real doctrines and principles of the Christian religion, as held by our primitive Friends.

Although we believe that much of this ignorance has been wilful and voluntary, yet we have for a long time thought that our early doctrinal writings have been too little known and read, and conceiving that this was, in some measure owing to their voluminous, and antiquated, and controversial character, we have anxiously desired to see a compilation of the most clear and explicit declarations of fundamental doctrines of the Society, which are to be found in the early writings of Friends.

This desire has been fully satisfied by the excellent work whose title is affixed to the head of this article. We can safely say that it is the most comprehensive and best digested compendium of the fundamental principles of our religious society, which we have ever seen. It contains the views of primitive Friends upon the great doctrines of the Three which bear record in heaven, the divinity, atonement, and various offices of Christ, and the divine authority and authenticity of the Holy Scriptures.

No single or isolated statement is given, but the author's patient research has extended through the ponderous volumes of most of the primitive writers extant, who have treated of these subjects, as well as a notice of all the declarations of faith made by the society at various periods in its collected capacity. The extracts we know have been taken with the utmost care and fidelity, embracing the whole scope of the opinions of the various individuals quoted, and may safely be relied upon, as authentic and complete. To those, then, to whom many, and perhaps most of the original works are inaccessible, this volume will be invaluable; the whole spirit and essence of Quakerism, as relates to the most vital doctrines of the Christian religion being thus exhibited before them, and having received the sanction of the meeting for sufferings, it possesses the character of an acknowledged and official treatise. If the great mass of evidence here submitted does not prove incontrovertibly that our ancient friends were sincere believers in the divinity and atonement of our blessed Lord, and also in the divine authority of the Scriptures, we shall never hope to witness the settlement of any question which depends on the exhibition of human testimony. The quotations are so many and various in point of time, place, and circumstance, and yet so entirely concurrent, that no sophistry can disguise their real meaning, and no ingenuity pervert their evident application.

There is but one apparent chance of escaping from their conclusive testimony; and that is one to which no person who esteems our predecessors to have been men of common honesty, would or could have recourse: I mean by accusing the whole of the various writers who are quoted of hypocrisy, and the concealment of their real sentiments; I know that some individuals of the new school have not hesitated to charge even such men as Fox, Penn, and Barclay, who, at the peril of their lives, were upholding their conscientious testimonies in the most minute particulars, with casuistry, and even open contradiction and deception, on the awful subject of the Divine Being, and the Divine Saviour; yet however unprincipled men, to further their own selfish views, would defile the character of their virtuous ancestors, even this subterfuge will not avail them, for the recorded faith of all the individuals, and of every declaration of the collected society, which are given in the volume under review, speak one and the same language.

Hoping that the editor of the Friend will, from time to time, avail himself of the copious means, which these extracts furnish, for illustrating the doctrines of the Society, we shall confine ourselves to a review of the able and lucid preface which Thomas Evans has prefixed to his compilation. In doing so, we shall ask no apology for making lengthy quotations, as they will throw much light on the early history of the Society, in many highly important particulars.

SECOND MONTH, 9, 1828.

Intimations have been frequently made to the editor and publisher, that the paper on which "The Friend" is printed, is of too friable a texture, and therefore too liable to injury from the friction to which it is necessarily exposed in transmission by the mail, &c. They are fully aware that this is the case, and think it but due to their subscribers to state, that a contract is about to be made with a paper maker, for a supply which is to be free from the defect complained of. It is expected the paper will be ready for delivery and use very early in the spring.

By late arrivals at New York, it appears that the destruction of the Turkish fleet, at Navarino, is likely to be attended with more serious results than some had anticipated. The grand divan at Constantinople, it is stated, has declared, that the three powers, Russia, France, and England, shall renounce all intervention, direct and indirect, in the affairs of Turkey and Greece, and required other terms, indicative of a lofty tone, as preliminary to an adjustment. The National Gazette expresses an opinion, that the statements concerning the spirit and purposes of the Porte, are to be doubted; later accounts, however, seem to confirm the intelligence. Time will show, but the prospect looks gloomy.

ANTIQUARIAN NOTES.

The improvements of modern times in the arts of life, are not easily appreciated by those who confine their observations to the space within the recollections of living individuals. In order to estimate them properly, we must look back for ages, and shall then come to the conclusion, that our Saxon ancestors, and even the luxurious Romans, were sadly ignorant of domestic arts. What was then the luxury of the few, is now a matter of common necessity; and the day labourer and mechanic of the present day, are better lodged, and fed, and clothed, than the nobles of Charlemagne.

Who is there in this country, that can bear with that evil which is classed with what we bachelors think the greatest of earthly vexations—a scolding wife? Yet it was not till the fourteenth century that chimneys were invented. Before that period, an opening was left in the centre of the roof, through which the smoke escaped, while a fire was made in a hole in the earthen or paved floor underneath. Not a trace of a chimney is to be found in Herculaneum, that great fossil city. The Romans knew nothing of the virtues of a fire place with a good draught of air, but left the smoke to seek its way through the apartment in circling eddies. They used portable stoves or fire pans, which were filled with burning coals, or wood was lighted in them, and when it was burned to a coal, they were carried into the apartments. The ancients were at great pains to procure wood which burnt without smoke; for which purpose it was customary to peel off the bark, and soak the wood for a long time in water, and then dry it for fuel. Another method, much employed, was to soak the wood in oil lees. It was also hardened or scorched over the fire till nearly reduced to charcoal. The business of thus preparing wood was one of the trades of ancient Rome, and was followed by the father of the emperor Pertinax. Yet, although there were no chimneys among the lordly Romans, they had their Rumfords and their Pettibones, with their flues and their air heaters. About the time of Nero, it became customary with the opulent to make a fire in a stove placed in the cellar, and to convey the heated air through pipes to the several apartments. It is an ill wind that blows good to none, and if the ancients had sore eyes and sooty ceilings, their slaves knew nothing of the miseries of the chimney sweep.

It was not till after the reign of Henry the eighth, that glass windows came into common use, nor were they much employed in domestic architecture until the fourteenth century. The windows of some of the houses of Pompeii were glazed with a thick opaque glass; but the usual material for windows was thin plates of mica. Glass windows for cathedrals were first introduced into England from France in 1180. They were long considered as moveable furniture, and so lately as the reign of Elizabeth, when the earls of Northumberland left Alnwick castle, the windows were taken out of the frames, and carefully laid by.

A frame of massive timber, resembling the inverted hull of a ship, was the skeleton of the ancient house or cabin of the English villein. The principal beams sprung up from the ground, forming a gothic arch over head, and the intervals were filled with horizontal planks. Gradually these intervals were filled up with stone, the main beams became perpendicular, and the roof was sprung at a considerable height from the ground. This mode of building continued for a long time, and is familiar to us even now in America.

Early in the fourteenth century, the art of building with brick, which had been lost in the general wreck of civilization, was revived, but it did not come into general use in England until the reign of Henry VI. The fashion of chequering the fronts of houses with glazed bricks was introduced in the reign of Henry VIII. The usual plan of gentlemen's houses consisted of an entry running through the house, with a hall and parlour on one side, with one or two chambers above, and a kitchen, pantry, and other offices on the other. Farm houses often had the stables, &c. under the same roof. A gentleman's house was uncommonly well provided when it contained three or four beds, and few had more than two. The walls were commonly bare, without wainscot or even plaster.

The English cottages had but one room and one story, and were without chimneys until the reign of Elizabeth.

Nor was the interior furniture more costly and commodious than the structure of the building. A substantial farmer, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, slept on a straw pallet, with a log of wood for his pillow. Wooden trenchers and wooden spoons, a few horn cups with a thin rim of silver, formed the equipments of the table. Pewter vessels were great luxuries, above the reach of the common citizen. An income of £10 was a competent estate for a gentleman, whose expenses of living could not have been great, when there were neither chairs, nor glasses, nor carpets, to their chambers; when there were few taxes, when beef was a halfpenny per pound, and ale a penny a gallon, and the king and his suite could be entertained at a dinner which cost but seven shillings. The poverty of the mechanics and rudeness of their tools and materials, were extreme. An estimate made about the year 1300 is extant, which rates a carpenter's stock in trade at a shilling, and enumerates it as consisting of five tools. The tanner in those days furnished not only the shoemaker and the saddler with their materials, but the tailor also. He was, therefore, a principal tradesman, and his stock amounted to ten pounds. Neither were the learned professors very liberally rewarded. In 1476, one Fylpott, learned in the law, received for his counsel-giving 3s. 8d., with four pence for his dinner.

Modern comfort first made its appearance in the free cities and among wealthy burghers. Eneas Silvius declares that the kings of Scotland would rejoice to be as well lodged as the second class of citizens in Nuremberg.

The northern nations ate out of a common dish, and pulled the meat to pieces, and helped themselves with their fingers. An Italian, Galeotus Martius, who resided at the court of Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary, in the latter part of the fifteenth century, praises the king for eating without a fork, yet conversing at the same time, and never dirtying his clothes. He relates, also, that the fingers of the Hungarians were generally much stained with saffron, at that time an universal favourite in cookery as in medicine. In the thirteenth century the common people of Italy had meat only three times a week; their dinner consisted of pot herbs boiled with meat; their supper the cold meat left at dinner. The husband and wife ate out of the same dish, and as they had no wax or tallow candles, and no candlesticks, were lighted at supper by a torch held by one of the children or a servant. Forks were first used at table by the Italians in the fifteenth century.

Honest Tom Coryate acquired the nickname of Furcifer, from being the first person who used them in England. He travelled through Italy in 1608, and gives in his "crudities" the following relation: "I observed a custome in all those Italian cities and townes through which j passed, that is not used in any other country that j saw in my travels, neither do j thinke that any other nation of Christendom doth use it but only Italy. The Italians, and also most strangers that are comorant in Italy, do alwaies at their meales use a little forke when they cut their meat. For while with their knife, which they hold in one hand, they cut the meat out of the dish, they fasten their fork, which they hold in their other hand upon the same dish. The reason of this their curiosity is because the Italians cannot, by any means, endure to have his dish touched with fingers, seeing all men's fingers are not alike clean." Forks were at first considered as a superfluous luxury, and their use forbidden in convents. To this day they are rarely seen in many parts of Spain, as well as drinking glasses and spoons.

Posterity of the twenty-fifth century may smile at the domestic arrangements of the nineteenth, as we do at those of the twelfth. When a portable steam engine shall become an indispensable part of the domestic establishment for scrubbing and ironing and cooking; when the cook shall be exalted into a chemist, and elaborate the most exquisite delicacies from clover, and pine logs, and stone coal:—when the "new fire," for the invention of which this century will be remarkable, is brought to perfection, and men carry their stoves in their pockets:—when steam chaises and air carriages supersede the use of horses:—when knives that never rust—drinking vessels as ductile as gold, and transparent as glass—lamps without oil—the concentrated and never putrefying essences of meats and vegetables, shall become articles of common use:—when cotton machinery shall perform its work without the aid of human hands, and caterpillars weave gloves and shawls—how poor and clumsy will the boasted luxury of the present day appear in the comparison!

Savages! some exquisite of that day may exclaim;—they stuffed their nostrils with black powder, and begrimed their faces for the sake of enjoying the aroma which we inhale at every breath in our perfumed apartments—they carried immense time-pieces in a pocket made for the purpose, instead of the beautiful watches which we wear on our fingers, and wind up once in the year:—they put their lives in daily jeopardy by trusting themselves in clumsy vehicles dragged by vicious beasts:—a journey from New York to Philadelphia occupied as much of their time, as a flight from London to Washington does of ours;—they knew nothing of the luxuries which are brought together upon a modern table—where kangaroos from New Holland, monkeys from Venezuela, snails from Switzerland, the venison of Lapland, and the fish of the Niger, Volga, and the Oregon, are served up along with the bread fruit of Otaheite, the birds' nests of China, and the choicest fruits of both the Indies.

BOOK WORM.

FOR THE FRIEND. MODERN GREECE.

The subjoined vivid picture of Greece as it appeared in 1807, is from the pen of the celebrated Chateaubriand. Compared with what it was in the height of its celebrity, it exhibits an impressive lesson on the mutability of human things; viewed in connexion with the struggle with which at the present time it is convulsed, affords matter of interesting speculation, as to its future destination.

"The fallen gates of Mycenæ and the tomb of Agamemnon were shown to us in the desert by a child entirely naked,—with a body attenuated by hunger—and a countenance distorted by wretchedness. It is in vain that you summon the muses to your aid in the Peloponessus, or court the illusions of fancy: you are every where haunted by the sad reality of woe and want. Huts of dried clay, fitter for wild beasts than for the habitation of man:—women and children miserably clad, flying at the approach of the stranger and of the janissary—desolation and solitude on every side,—such is the picture which is invariably presented to the eye, and which leaves no scope for the pleasures of memory. The Morea is almost a desert. Since the Russian war, the yoke of the Turks has become more galling to its inhabitants, and the Albanians have butchered a part of the population. Villages laid waste by fire and sword present themselves in every direction, and in the cities, as at Mistra for instance, entire suburbs are abandoned. We often travelled fifteen leagues in the country without encountering a single habitation. The most grinding oppression that tyranny can exercise—outrages and depredations of every description, are now consummating the ruin of agriculture, and extinguishing the race of man in the land of Leonidas. To expel a Greek peasant from his hut,—to seize upon his wife and children—to massacre them upon the slightest pretext, are but the amusements of the most insignificant aga of the smallest village. The native of the Morea, reduced to the last degree of misery, tears himself from his country, and seeks a lot somewhat less cruel in Asia; but there again his untoward destiny pursues him, and he finds cadis and pachas even among the sands of the Jordan and the deserts of Palmyra.

"The monuments of art suffer no less than the rights of man from the ferocity of the Turk. A heavy Tartar now inhabits the citadel of Athens—filled as it is with the master pieces of Ictinus and Phidias—without deigning to inquire what people it was that left those remains—without condescending to quit for a moment the habitation which he has constructed under the ruins of the monuments of Pericles. Sometimes the sluggish tyrant drags himself to the mouth of his den, and there seated cross-legged on a loathsome and tattered carpet, turns a vacant eye on the banks of Salamis and the sea of Epidaurus, while the smoke of his pipe ascends among the columns of the temple of Minerva."

"Coward sloth,
Sitting in silence, with dejected eyes
Incurious, and with folded hands."

We can scarcely describe the various emotions by which we were agitated, when in the middle of the first night that we passed at Athens, we were suddenly roused by the discordant notes of the tambourin and the Turkish pipe sounding from the ruins of the Propylæa, at the same time that a Musulman priest proclaimed in Arabic the passing hour to the Christian Greeks of the city of Minerva. It was not necessary for the dervise to announce to us thus the flight of time: his voice alone, when raised in that spot, was sufficient to remind us that ages had gone by!

"The instability of human affairs is the more striking for a traveller, as it is contrasted with the constancy of the rest of nature: even the subordinate creation, in derision as it were of our revolutions, experience no vicissitudes in their dominion, nor change in their habits. We were made to remark on the day after our arrival at Athens a flock of storks that mounted in the air, then formed themselves in a line, and directed their flight towards Africa. From the reign of Cecrops down to the present time, these birds have annually performed the same pilgrimage, and returned to the same spot. But how often have they found in tears the host whom they left happy and joyous?—How often have they sought in vain not only their host, but the roof in which they were accustomed to build their nests? The whole route from Athens to Jerusalem offers a most distressing picture to the eye of a traveller. Egypt exhibits a spectacle than which nothing can be imagined more horribly disgusting. It is there that we saw five different bands of robbers contending in arms for the possession of deserts and ruins. We saw there the Albanian levelling his piece at groups of famished children, who, as if familiarized to this terrible sport, ran to hide themselves behind the ruins of their cabins. Of one hundred and fifty villages which we counted on the banks of the Nile in ascending from Rosetta to Cairo, but one remains entire. A part of the Delta is suffered to lie fallow; a circumstance which has not perhaps before occurred since the period when Pharaoh gave this fertile land to the posterity of Jacob. Most of the Fellahs have been massacred, and the survivors have gone into Upper Egypt. The natives, who could not prevail upon themselves to abandon their fields, have desisted from the attempt to raise families. A man born in the decline of empires, and who sees in futurity no other prospect but that of disastrous revolutions, has, indeed, little reason to rejoice at the growth of children whose inheritance is to be misery. There are times when he may say with the prophet—"Happy are the dead."

ALBANY AND CAFFER-LAND.

The tenacity with which the Hollanders adhere to their national habits and peculiarities is proverbial, so that, wherever they are located, whether in distinct communities, or in settlements surrounded by a mixed population, they still preserve their identity. This is exemplified by what our author incidentally introduces respecting the boors, by which appellation he designates the Dutch farmers in the vicinity of the Cape. Pursuing their journey in the middle of the day, they out spanned,* in company with a Dutch boor and his family, who were travelling up the country. The party consisted of the old boor, his wife, two sons, and a daughter. They had two wagons, one of which was filled with turkeys, geese, ducks, fowls, &c. "A Dutchman never seems in a hurry; he carries his mutton, dried beef, and bread, with his blanket, in a large chest on which he sits to drive, and with his pipe, jogs on contentedly, now and then calling out 'Trac, Trac.' They style themselves Africaners, and distinguish all those who come from even any part of Europe, as Vanderland volk, or Fatherland people. They are distant and reserved, and at first their approach appears cold; they do not give the hearty shake of a Briton, but simply grasp each other's hands, and touch their hats universally."

Some of the party killed a guana, an animal esteemed very good eating, but disgusting on account of its hideous form. The snails are said to be immense—they found one which weighed alive in the shell four ounces. "The field mouse is large, and very prettily streaked. The secretary bird is held in very high estimation, and a penalty of five pounds enforced for destroying them; they frequent ploughed ground, and are majestic looking birds when walking; they destroy all kinds of vermin, but particularly snakes, which are numerous. The only fatally venomous, are the green snake, the night adder, which roams about in search of prey, and the calva capella; the latter is more rare."

"Before reaching Graham's town, some Hottentots passed us with a young quagga, which they had just succeeded in catching for a gentleman in the neighbourhood. The Hottentots gallop after a herd, separate the young one, which they drive into the bush, then dismount, and take hold of it round the neck, till the herd have disappeared; they then mount their horses, and the little animal follows without being fastened or led: they have not strength to be made serviceable. The quagga is a species of zebra; striped like it in the neck, but it also resembles the ass; we passed some herds of them, fifty or sixty together."

Having reached Graham's town, "a new scene opened to our view, and of a kind differing from any the preceding part of our journey had presented. We had mixed with the animal creation—we had witnessed modes of enjoyment in rude boorish life—we were now to congregate again in more refined society—to join in scenes of civilization with beings of our own fatherland; to mark the rapid progress which improvement makes under the skilful and industrious hands of an English population; to see the spot, which only a few years since bore the aspect of a rude village, containing about twenty houses, now become a considerable town, with many handsome buildings, shops, &c. and exhibiting all the marks of a busy, flourishing place. This district of the Cape, now called by the English, Albany, by the Dutch, Zareveldt, was very long a bone of contention between the Dutch and Caffers.” The author, after some account of this contest, proceeds:—“To this state of warfare and enmity between the colonists and Caffers, has succeeded a more peaceable and friendly feeling; and to promote the object as much as may be done, the governing powers have encouraged the establishment of monthly fairs, where these untutored natives are enabled to dispose of such vendible commodities as they possess, for the beads, buttons, and baubles, given in exchange by the English. By these means, and a treatment in the true spirit of justice and reciprocity, it is hoped and believed, that a good understanding will be more effectually maintained, than by all the terrors of the cannon and the bayonet.”

“Some months after the first arrival of the English, they were thrown into considerable alarm by the appearance of five thousand Caffers on the hills. Preparations were instantly made for defence, when one of their interpreters came down, and made known that they were friendly chiefs and their men, come with a pass from the commandant, with leave to procure some red ochre or chalk, which they mix with grease, and then anoint their hair and bodies with it. This friendly intercourse was for a time interrupted by some of their marauding parties; but latterly peace seems established, and the fairs will no doubt have the effect of producing a certain degree of civilization.”

“They bring in ivory, hides, gum, elephants’ tusks, mats, and baskets, to a very considerable amount. We saw two enormous tusks purchased from them, which weighed ninety-eight pounds each. The Caffers are described as a very noble looking race, tall, finely proportioned, and possessing great muscular strength. They display infinite sagacity, and evince an evident superiority over the common race of savages. The rush baskets made by the women are extremely ingenious; they are so firm and closely made, that they will hold liquids, and are always used by the Caffers as milking buckets.”

“The chiefs wore a cloak made of the leopard skin, and a necklace of copper beads wound round the head, with two, three, or four armlets of the elephant’s tusk, according to their age, valour, &c. &c.: the cloak is gracefully thrown over the shoulders. The dress of the women was becoming: the head dress full, and covered with a thousand beads; the outward robe loose, made of the antelope skin, which has a very fine gloss, with three rows of buttons beaded, from top to bottom; they walk with a confident

“A singular circumstance occurred in the year 1823, at a period when the colony was much disturbed by the Caffers. A boor, walking on his farm, in the district of Graaff Reynet, thought he saw four Caffers, and immediately fired; one of them fell dead, the others stood around him, and made no attempt to escape; the boor advanced, but with caution: it was, however, needless, as the poor creatures were motionless with the noise of the gun, and, to them, the unaccountable fall of their companion; the boor soon discovered by their features that they were not Caffers; they were armed with assagais different from the Caffer make.” The author details some further particulars relative to these interesting strangers, who were sometime detained; and endeavours were used to discover their country, and every thing relating to them, but the most that could be ascertained is, “that they belonged to the Ceuta tribe, a very formidable, but very distant nation.” Their dress was

“The Caffers were unknown to Europeans; they never saw a white man before, but they must have had intercourse with other tribes, who live near the coast, and who may probably trade with the Portuguese about Mozambique.”

“A kind of badge, composed of hides, made as pliant, by rubbing, as cloth; it covered them entirely, with the exception of the shoulders and legs, and was tastefully mounted around them. Their heads were ornamented with a profusion of red and white beads and bands, and on the top, a small tuft of the tail, apparently of the jackal. One of them, an old man, had, in addition, several cowrie shells attached to the beads, and two pair of copper ear rings, one set round the other, with long points; his countenance was mild but grave, with a smile peculiarly sweet, and he exhibited a very striking contrast to the lively laughing younger ones, whose hearts seemed overflowing with delight at every notice or present made to them:—their eyes were full and lively, the nose rather flat, and the lips thick, altogether different from the Caffers.”

Excepting when the wind blows from the north, which, sweeping over the interior sandy deserts, comes scorchingly hot, the climate is described in terms of great commendation, the glass seldom rising to eighty-four. The dews are never prejudicial to health, sleeping out in the open air without any additional covering being a very common occurrence, from which no bad consequences result. The travellers extend their route through Albany, and rendezvous at the junction of the Kap and Great Fish rivers. The author finds room to indulge his love for the picturesque in the scenery about the mouth of the latter, and in an excursion up the former. No shrubberies, he remarks, can be formed with greater art than those on the banks of this delightful little river, on which are to be seen a profusion of flowers and berries of the brightest and most varied colours. The gaudy and singular strelitzia regina grows here in great luxuriance, and in the craggy hills, the chandelier aloe expands its radiant branches. “A few hundred yards up the river, we were locked in on either side by overhanging rocks, and trees of the richest foliage. Our boat disturbed many of the das or coney that ran along the rocks. This little creature is of a dark colour like a rat, and seems to be of a species between the rabbit and the Guinea pig, with paws resembling those of a cat.”

It appears that the bees construct their combs among the rocks, and the singular mode which the natives pursue in obtaining the honey is thus described. “The Hottentot went to a place that he thought likely to contain the hives, and immediately whistled with a sort of call that the honey bird or indicator is accustomed to, when the little feathered attendant made its appearance, chirping loudly and hovering about them; it then flew forward, still chirping, and watching to see if they followed. It tried twice to lead them across a kloof, flying back and again forward, to entice them to follow; they, however, not liking to go that way, and the Hottentot continuing to whistle the call, the bird at length flew back, and led another way, still watching and chirping to them to follow him, which they now did, and very soon it hovered over a place in the rock, where, on searching, they found a hive full of honey; the bird immediately perched in a bush over them, and waited patiently till they had taken the honey, when it flew down, and took possession of the rest, and eat what was left for it.”

“The honey bird is rather larger than a sparrow, with brown feathers. The quantity of honey taken every year is immense, and its flavour is very delicious. The Hottentot is very particular in his manner of leaving the honey for the bird, as he says that it will then remember him, and lead him another time, in preference to any other person. When the bird has eaten the honey, the young bees are carefully closed up with stones, to prevent the ratel from taking them out, and as there are always a quantity of flowers, the bees never want nourishment.”

ON PRAYER.

Prayer is the soul’s sincere desire,
Unuttered or expressed;
The motion of a hidden fire,
That trembles in the breast.

Prayer is the burden of a sigh,
The falling of a tear;
The upward glancing of an eye,
When none but God is near.

Prayer is the simplest form of speech,
That infant lips can try;
Prayer the sublimest strains that reach
The Majesty on high.

Prayer is the Christian’s vital breath,
The Christian’s native air;
His watchword at the gates of death,
He enters heaven with prayer.

Prayer is the contrite sinner’s voice,
Returning from his ways;
While angels in their song rejoice,
And cry, “behold he prays.”

In prayer on earth, the saints are one
In word, in deed, in mind;
When with the Father and the Son
Sweet fellowship they find.

Nor prayer is made on earth alone;
The Holy Spirit pleads;
And Jesus, on the eternal throne,
For sinners intercedes.

O! Thou, by whom we come to God,
The Life, the Truth, the Way!
The path of prayer thyself hast trod—
Lord, teach us how to pray!

MONTGOMERY.

THE ENGLISH CLASSIC, No. 6.

It is stated by Dr. Alexander Chalmers in his Historical and Biographical preface to the Rambler, by Samuel Johnson, L.L.D., “That the commencement of the Rambler was a matter of great importance with the author, as if he had foreseen that this work was hereafter to constitute his principal fame; and as he had wisely determined that his fame should rest as much on the good he had done, as on the pleasure he might afford, with his accustomed piety, he composed and offered up the following prayer, entitled ‘Prayer on the Rambler.’”

“Almighty God, the giver of all good things, without whose help all labour is ineffectual, and without whose grace all wisdom is folly; grant, I beseech thee, that in this my undertaking, thy Holy Spirit may not be withheld from me, but that I may promote thy glory, and the salvation both of myself and others: grant this, O Lord, for the sake of Jesus Christ. Amen.”

“The first paper was published on Tuesday, March 20, 1749–50, and the work continued without the least interruption, every Monday and Saturday, until Saturday, March 14, 1750, which day it closed. Each number was printed on a sheet and a half of fine paper, at the price of two-pence, and with great typographical accuracy, not above a dozen errors occurring in the whole work: a circumstance the more remarkable, because the copy was written in haste, as the time urged, and sent to press without being revised by the author. When we consider, that, in the whole progress of the work, the sum of assistance he received scarcely amounted to five papers, we must wonder at the fertility of a mind engaged during the same period in that stupendous labour the English Dictionary, and frequently distracted by disease and anguish. There is not in the annals of literature an instance which can be brought as a parallel to this, if we take every circumstance into the account. Other essayists have had the choice of their days, and their happy hours for composition: but Dr. Johnson knew no remission, although he very probably would have been glad of it, and yet continued to write with unabated vigour, although even this disappointment might be supposed to have often rendered him uneasy, and his natural indolence (not the indolence of his will, but of constitution) would, in other men, have palsied every effort. Towards the conclusion there is so little of that 'falling off' visible in some works of the same kind, that it might probably have been extended much further, had the encouragement of the public borne any proportion to its merits.

"One of the contributors was Mrs. Elizabeth Carter, who wrote Nos. 44, and 100; and who, at the distance of half a century, enjoyed in full possession, that liberal and enlightened mind, which had engaged the esteem and admiration of successive generations of wits and scholars. Of this excellent lady Dr. Johnson used to say, that her learning did not interfere with her domestic duties. 'She could make a pudding as well as translate Epictetus from the Greek; and work a handkerchief, as well as compose a poem.' He once composed a Greek epigram to Eliza Carter; and declared that she ought to be celebrated in as many different languages as Lewis the Great. Mrs. Carter died Feb. 19, 1806."

—Dreams descended from Jove.—Pope.

To the Rambler.

SIR—I had lately a very remarkable dream, which made so strong an impression on me, that I remember it every word; and if you are not better employed, you may read the relation of it as follows:

Methought I was in the midst of a very entertaining set of company, and extremely delighted in attending to a lively conversation, when on a sudden I perceived one of the most shocking figures imagination can frame, advancing towards me. She was dressed in black, her skin was contracted into a thousand wrinkles, her eyes sunk deep in her head, and her complexion pale and livid as the countenance of death. Her looks were filled with terror and unrelenting severity, and her hands armed with whips and scorpions. As soon as she came near, with a horrid frown, and a voice that chilled my very blood, she bid me follow her. I obeyed, and she led me through rugged paths beset with briars and thorns, into a deep solitary valley. Wherever she passed, the fading verdure withered beneath her steps; her pestilential breath infected the air with malignant vapours, obscured the lustre of the sun, and involved the fair face of heaven in universal gloom. Dismal howlings resounded through the forest, from every baleful tree the night raven uttered his dreadful note, and the prospect was filled with desolation and horror. In the midst of this tremendous scene, my execrable guide addressed me in the following manner:

"Retire with me, O rash unthinking mortal, from the vain allurements of a deceitful world, and learn that pleasure was not designed the portion of human life. Man was born to mourn and to be wretched; this is the condition of all below the stars, and who ever endeavours to oppose it, acts in contradiction to the will of heaven. Fly then from the fatal enchantments of youth and social delight, and here consecrate the solitary hours to lamentation and woe. Misery is the duty of all sublunary beings, and every enjoyment is an offence to the Deity, who is to be worshipped only by the mortification of every sense of pleasure, and the everlasting exercise of sighs and tears."

This melancholy picture of life quite sunk my spirits, and seemed to annihilate every principle of joy within me. I threw myself beneath a blasted yew, where the winds blew cold and dismal round my head, and dreadful apprehensions chilled my heart. Here I resolved to lie till the hand of death, which I impatiently invoked, should put an end to the miseries of a life so deplorably wretched. In this sad situation, I espied on one hand of me a deep muddy river, whose heavy waves rolled on in slow and sullen murmurs. Here I determined to plunge, and was just upon the brink, when I found myself suddenly drawn back. I turned about, and was surprised by the sight of the loveliest object I had ever beheld. The most engaging charms of youth and beauty appeared in all her form; effulgent glories sparkled in her eyes, and their awful splendours were softened by the gentlest looks of compassion and peace. At her approach the frightful spectre who had before tormented me, vanished away, and with her all the horrors she had caused. The gloomy clouds brightened into cheerful sunshine, the groves recovered their verdure, and the whole region looked gay and blooming as the garden of Eden. I was quite transported at this unexpected change, and reviving pleasure began to glad my thoughts, when, with a look of inexpressible sweetness, my beautiful deliverer thus uttered her divine instructions:

"My name is Religion. I am the offspring of Truth and Love, and the parent of Benevolence, Hope, and Joy. That monster from whose power I have freed you is called Superstition, she is the child of Discontent, and her followers are Fear and Sorrow. Thus different as we are, she has often the insolence to assume my name and character, and seduces unhappy mortals to think us the same, till she, at length, drives them to the borders of Despair, that dreadful abyss into which you were just going to sink.

"Look round and survey the various beauties of the globe, which Heaven has destined for the seat of the human race, and consider whether a world thus exquisitely framed, could be meant for the abode of misery and pain. For what end has the lavish hand of Providence diffused such innumerable objects of delight, but that all might rejoice in the privilege of existence, and be filled with gratitude to the beneficent Author of it? Thus, to enjoy the blessings he has sent, is virtue and obedience; and to reject them merely as means of pleasure, is pitiable ignorance or absurd perverseness. Infinite goodness is the source of created existence: the proper tendency of every rational being, from the highest order of raptured seraphs, to the meanest rank of men, is to rise incessantly from lower degrees of happiness to higher. They have each faculties assigned them for various orders of delights."

"What," cried I, "is this the language of Religion? Does she lead her votaries through flowery paths, and bid them pass an unlabouring life? Where are the painful toils of virtue, the mortifications of penitence, the self-denying exercises of saints and heroes?"

"The true enjoyments of a reasonable being," answered she mildly, "do not consist in unbounded indulgence, or luxurious ease, in the tumult of passions, the languor of indolence, or the flutter of light amusements. Yielding to immoral pleasure corrupts the mind, living to animal trifling ones debases it; both in their degree disqualify it for its genuine good, and consign it over to wretchedness. Whoever would be really happy, must make the diligent and regular exercise of his superior powers his chief attention, adoring the perfections of his Maker, expressing good will to his fellow creatures, cultivating inward rectitude. To his lower faculties he must allow such gratification as will, by refreshing him, invigorate his nobler pursuits. In the regions inhabited by angelic natures, unmingled felicity for ever blooms, joy flows there with a perpetual and abundant stream, nor needs there any mound to check its course. Beings conscious of a frame of mind originally diseased, as all the human race has cause to be, must use the regimen of a stricter self-government. Whoever has been guilty of voluntary excesses, must patiently submit both to the painful workings of nature, and needful severities of medicine, in order to his cure. Still he is entitled to a moderate share of whatever alleviating accommodations this fair mansion of his merciful parent affords, consistent with his recovery. And in proportion as this recovery advances, the liveliest joy will spring from his secret sense of an amended and improved heart. So far from the horrors of despair is the condition even of the guilty. Shudder, poor mortal, at the thought of the gulf into which thou wast but now going to plunge.

"While the most faulty have ever encouragement to amend, the more innocent soul will be supported with still sweeter consolations under all its experience of human infirmities; supported by the gladdening assurances that every sincere endeavour to outgrow them shall be assisted, accepted, and rewarded. To such a one the lowliest self-abasement is but a deep laid foundation for the most elevated hopes; since they who faithfully examine and acknowledge what they are, shall be enabled under my conduct to become what they desire. The Christian and the hero are inseparable: and to aspirings of unassuming trust, and filial confidence, are set no bounds. To him who is animated with a view of obtaining approbation from the Sovereign of the universe, no difficulty is insurmountable. Secure in this pursuit of every needful aid, his conflict with the severest pains and trials, is little more than the vigorous exercises of a mind in health. His patient dependence on that Providence which looks through all eternity; his silent resignation, his ready accommodation of his thoughts and behaviour to its inscrutable ways, is at once the most excellent sort of self-denial, and a source of the most exalted transports. Society is the true sphere of human virtue. In social, active life, difficulties will perpetually be met with; restraints of many kinds will be necessary; and studying to behave right in respect of these is a discipline of the human heart, useful to others, and improving to itself. Suffering is no duty, but where it is necessary to avoid guilt, or to do good; nor pleasure a crime, but where it strengthens the influence of bad inclinations, or lessens the generous activity of virtue. The happiness allotted to man in his present state, is indeed faint and low, compared with his immortal prospects, and noble capacities; but yet whatever portion of it the distributing hand of heaven offers to each individual, is a needful support and refreshment for the present moment, so far as it may not hinder the attaining of final destination.

"Return then with me from continual misery to moderate enjoyment and grateful alacrity. Return from the contracted views of solitude to the proper duties of a relative and dependent being. Religion is not confined to cells and closets, nor restrained to sullen retirement. These are the gloomy doctrines of Superstition, by which she endeavours to break those chains of benevolence and social affection, that link the welfare of every particular with that of the whole. Remember that the greatest honour you can pay to the author of your being is by such a cheerful behaviour as discovers a mind satisfied with his dispensations."

Here my preceptress paused, and I was going to express my acknowledgments for her discourse, when a ring of bells from the neighbouring village, and a new risen sun darting his beams through my windows, awaked me.

I am yours, &c.

A BRIEF MEMOIR OF SOLOMON UNDERHILL.

About twelve months before his demise, and while his case was before the monthly meeting, being often brought under great concern and sorrow on account of the state of things in the society of which he was a member, and feeling an ardent and affectionate desire for the eternal welfare of his friends, and for their preservation from the delusive snares of an unwearied and crafty adversary, who was busily endeavouring to draw them into unbelief, he wrote an address to the members of the quarterly meeting of Westbury, dated at Jerusalem, First month, 22d, 1826. But yielding to some discouragements arising from his peculiar and very trying situation, he omitted to circulate it at that time, saying, "I think I now feel easy to leave it with my children, to do with as they may judge proper, when I am no more." A short time previous to his death, he expressed a desire that it might not be lost, and it being brought to him for examination, he made some small additions to it, and remarked, "It now stands as I wish it; believing that I shall shortly put off this my tabernacle, I leave it with my children, as a proof that I do not consider these things, as some would persuade us, immaterial matters, but subjects of the greatest importance. I feel an evidence to attend my mind that I have not followed cunningly devised fables, but substantial truth." He then wrote his name for the last time. Believing that the publication of this affectionate address, is due to the weighty exercise and concern of our dear friend, and in the hope that it may prove useful to some minds, it is thought proper to insert it as follows, viz.

AN ADDRESS, &c.

Dear Friends,—Seeing that I am deprived of the privilege of offering, by way of public testimony, some impressions that I believe it would have been right for me to communicate, I take this way to relieve my mind; which has often of late, when sitting with my friends in our meetings, been so clothed with heaviness, that I thought I might say with the apostle, I despaired of life. During my silent sitting in one of these meetings, under great exercise, while labouring for resignation, though desirous, if possible, to find out the cause why our assemblies were so covered with a gloom, this language of lamentation was presented; "The tongue of the suckling child cleaveth to the roof of his mouth for thirst; the young children ask for bread, and no man breaketh it unto them;" I thought it might be said, "The ways of Zion do mourn;" and she is in bitterness;" and the circumstance of the separate altar set up by Jeroboam was revived in my remembrance. A prophet was sent to cry against it, in the name of the Lord, and the king put forth his hand, saying, "lay hold of him;" but finding he could not put him in fear with all his threats, his speech was turned to smooth words, saying, "Come home with me and refresh thyself, and I will give thee a reward."

He had set up his golden calves, in order to furnish the people with a mode of worship more easy to the flesh; notwithstanding the law of Moses expressly says, "Thou shalt not make unto thyself any graven image, or the likeness of any thing that is either in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, thou shalt not bow down, nor worship them." Although so contrary to this known command, it is strange to see how soon the house of Israel fell in therewith, and was turned aside by the wicked insinuations of the king, "Behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt." Thus they changed the glory of the inscrutable God "into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass;" and however this may appear to many, is it not equally strange, that a people professing, as we do, to be the followers of our worthy predecessors, those bright sons of the morning, who counted not their lives dear in support of their testimonies; who fully believed in the doctrines of the apostles, and, as their writings abundantly testify, stood firm in the faith once delivered to the saints, even a belief in Jesus Christ, that he was born of the virgin Mary, and suffered the ignominious death of the cross for our sins, and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world; a belief, in which the twelve apostles appear to have been united, as also the four evangelists, who lived about that time, and no doubt were better informed of the truth of those things than we can be; and for aught that appears, their writings were never called in question by the gathered church, but firmly believed in from the time they were written down to the present day—is it not marvellous, I say, that any amongst us can so far turn aside, as to make no hesitation in acknowledging they do not believe him to be the eternal Word or Son of God? Saying, not only in conduct, but in language, "We will not have this man to rule over us." On what, my friends, can their hope of salvation be founded, "seeing there is none other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved," but by the name of Jesus? And did not Christ tell the Jews, "If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins;" and if you die in your sins, "whither I go ye cannot come?"

It is indeed a time of much speculation and controversy, not only amongst us as a people, but others also; and there are those up and down, who openly acknowledge, that they do not believe in the miraculous conception of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, which the Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testaments, do so fully and clearly hold forth. The prophet Isaiah saith, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel." "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder, and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." And although the babe immortal is revealed in every true believer; yet if a spiritual birth was all that the prophet had reference to, why was the virgin Mary so particularly pointed out? Do we not see that as, by the deceitfulness of the devil, sin entered, and death followed, the woman being first in the offence, so a woman was made use of in the restoration. It was promised, that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, which I have ever believed was confirmed by the angel who appeared to the virgin Mary, and spake of her divine conception of the Holy Ghost, viz. "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of the increase of his government there shall be no end." Many other Scripture passages of like import may be found, but notwithstanding all these, it appears there are some, and I fear not a few, who retain a spirit of unbelief. May such seriously consider what must be the consequences resulting therefrom! Doth it not render the virgin Mary wicked, deceitful, and presumptuous beyond any thing ever known since the creation of the world? We read of the presumptuous sin of Ananias and Sapphira, who sold their possessions, and pretended to have laid all at the Apostles' feet, but secretly kept back a part—this was revealed to the apostle Peter, and they were taxed with it; but denying the fact, were instantly struck dead. Now, I would ask, what proportion do the sins of these two last mentioned, bear to the deception and falsehood of which the virgin Mary and her (afterwards) husband are accused by the unbeliever? I think but a small proportion. And can we suppose the Great Head of the Church would suffer such gross wickedness and deceit to be kept hidden eighteen centuries and upwards?

Concerning the offering of that body of our Lord Jesus Christ upon the cross, there are those who openly testify that they do not believe he made any atonement for the sins of mankind thereby; of consequence, those who lived under the Mosaic dispensation were much more favoured than we are—they had a high priest, who was permitted to enter into the most holy place once a year, and make atonement for the sins of the people. But if Jesus made no atonement, to what does the prophet allude when he says, "He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed. All we, like sheep, have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all!" The angel who appeared to Joseph said, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins." And what saith the apostle, "Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, he entered once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us; for if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?" And again, citing the psalmist, he says, "Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared me;" and soon after, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first that he may establish the second. By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all."

May those who have been tempted to deny their Lord and Master, and to count the blood of the covenant an unholy thing, be enabled to see that it is a delusion of the enemy, and to discover the workings of that seducing spirit, however specious its reasonings may appear; remembering, as a caution, the language to some in former days, "Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you, than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." This was the language twice repeated by that eminent apostle of the Gentiles, to a people who had embraced the doctrine preached by him, and run well for a time; but through unwatchfulness, and giving heed to an unsanctified ministry, had lost their good estate.

The same apostle also addressing himself to the elders of the church of Ephesus, gives this charge:—"Take heed, therefore, unto yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God which he hath purchased with his own blood. For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them. Therefore watch, and remember, that by the space of three years, I ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears."

Oh! saith my soul, that such of us as have known the operation of redeeming love, may stand firm in the power of it—let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering, that neither the threats, the frowns, nor the fair speeches of the deluded sons of Nebat, may be able to warp any of us from the sure foundation. It is the righteous who shall hold on his way, and those of clean hands who grow stronger and stronger—and I trust and believe, that notwithstanding the sincere hearted have to mourn on account of the great declension from the purity of our faith, there are yet those preserved, to whom the language of the blessed Master, through his servant John, may be applicable; viz. "Thou hast a few names, even in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments; and they shall walk with me in white, for they are worthy."

REVIEW OF T. EVANS' "EXPOSITION."

After adverting to the divisions at present existing respecting the real doctrines of the early Quakers, and stating his conviction that there arise, not from the absence, but rather from the comparative inaccessibility of evidence, owing to causes we have mentioned in this review, our author very justly remarks:

"It is certainly much to be regretted, that there should be any want of information on subjects of such great importance, so intimately connected with the welfare, and even the existence, of our religious society; and in which every rightly exercised member must feel a deep and earnest interest. It surely becomes those who have the charge of educating children, seriously to consider, whether the acquisition of this knowledge ought not to form a prominent feature in every system of religious instruction, and whether the neglect to impart it is not a breach of that duty which they owe to the tender objects of their care, for which an awful responsibility must devolve upon them."

We shall next make a considerable extract, explaining in a satisfactory manner the peculiar circumstances in which the society was placed at its first institution.

"The peculiar views which the society entertained of the spiritual nature of the gospel dispensation rendered its members obnoxious to much opposition from high professors, who were little acquainted with the practical and renovating influence of true religion. Many and serious were the accusations which their enemies arrayed against them. They were charged with denying the Scripture doctrine of the Holy Three that bear record in heaven, Father, Word, and Spirit, one God, blessed for ever; because they confined themselves strictly to Scripture language, and rejected the word trinity, as one of human invention; yet, at the same time, they readily acknowledged their full and unqualified assent to all that the sacred penmen had recorded relative to this solemn and mysterious subject.

"Considering the title of the Word of God as exclusively belonging to Jesus Christ our Lord, they viewed the application of it to the inspired writings as erroneous and unauthorized by the Scriptures themselves. They believe the sensible influence of the Holy Spirit to be the primary rule of faith and life, and therefore could not conscientiously accord this epithet to the Scriptures, however excellent in themselves. From these circumstances, their opposers took occasion to misrepresent them, as denying the authenticity and divine authority of those sacred records, though Friends constantly admitted, and indeed always declared, they were the words of God, spoken by the Holy Ghost through holy men of old, a secondary rule subordinate to the Spirit; the best and only outward standard and test for determining the soundness of doctrines, and to which they constantly appealed, as the authority for the truths they promulgated.

"A primary and fundamental article of their faith, was a belief in the immediate and effectual operation of the Holy Spirit, or grace of God, freely shed abroad in the hearts of all mankind, through the coming and sufferings of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. When George Fox and his contemporary labourers were called forth to preach the gospel of life and salvation, this blessed Holy Scripture doctrine was too little known or believed in by the generality of Christian professors. The practical, heart-changing effects of pure and undefiled religion were in many instances superseded by a routine of ceremonial duties, the performance of which was marked with cold indifference or obvious dislike, and which, though they might amuse the head with the show of religion, left the heart unregenerated, the will unsubdued, and the appetite unmortified.

"Being brought, through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, to see their corrupt and undone condition by nature; having not only felt the necessity, but realized the blessedness of being born again, created anew in Christ Jesus unto good works, our worthy predecessors were led mainly to insist upon the importance of the new birth, and to inculcate the doctrine of the universality and efficacy of the grace of God, as essentially requisite to be believed in and obeyed by all those who expected to be made partakers of that life and immortality, which are brought to light in the gospel of the dear Son of God. They not only believed in, and preached him as 'God manifest in the flesh' of that prepared body in which he appeared at Jerusalem, and sojourned amongst men; 'justified in the spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the gentiles, believed on in the world, and received up into glory,' but also as the Light of men,—as the glorious Luminary of the intellectual world; as the eternal Sun of righteousness, a ray of whose ineffable brightness shines into every human soul, 'to give it the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.'"

"The divinely inspired record of his coming in the flesh, his miraculous conception and birth of the virgin Mary, his holy life, mighty miracles, meritorious sufferings, and propitiatory death, his glorious resurrection, ascension into heaven, mediation, and intercession with the Father, they also held as necessary to be sincerely believed by all those, who, through the good providence of God, were brought to the knowledge of these sacred records. But these important truths being fully accredited by the great body of Christian professors, there was less occasion frequently to hold them up to view. Friends were apprehensive, also, that too many were resting their hopes of salvation upon the mere assent of the understanding to these essential doctrines, without permitting them to have a practical influence upon their lives and conversation. Hence those faithful ministers of the gospel believed it their duty to turn the minds of the people inward to the spirit and power of Christ Jesus revealed there, that through obedience thereto, they might really experience him to be their Redeemer and Saviour. But this was not done in opposition to Christ without, for they solemnly declared, that they never meant thereby, in the least degree, to invalidate or alight those blessed advantages, which, in infinite mercy and wisdom inscrutable, are offered to mankind through the outward manifestation, the sufferings and death of the adorable Son of God.

"Notwithstanding these repeated declarations of the soundness of their faith, the enemies of the Society greatly misrepresented and perverted the doctrine of the light of Christ in the soul of man. They pretended to infer from it, that the Quakers denied Jesus Christ as he appeared at Jerusalem, to be the Saviour of men—that they believed the Godhead, or whole Christ, to be in them, thereby equaling themselves with him, and rejecting all belief in Jesus Christ, except as the Spirit in man. They likewise charged Friends with allegorizing away the sufferings and blood of Jesus, by making them only typical of the inward operations of the light, and with holding the erroneous notion, that he was nothing more than a great prophet, supereminently endowed with the Spirit of God, which dwelt in him no otherwise than in us.

"These unfounded charges were met, on the part of the Society, with the most solemn and unequivocal denial. Nor did Friends rest satisfied with a mere negative assertion of what they did not believe. In a subject of such high concernment, they deemed it an incumbent duty to declare in the most explicit and positive manner, what they did believe, in order that the world might know they really were what they professed to be—sincere and humble believers in all the doctrines of the Christian religion. To satisfy every doubt, and silence every cavil, they published repeated declarations of their faith, drawn up in language that can neither be misunderstood nor equivocated; and though these are not called creeds, nor presented for subscription to those who apply for membership amongst them, yet they are essentially and properly the articles of faith, and the outward bond of union of the religious Society of Friends.

"Some of these it will be proper to notice, in order to refute the false and foolish objection which is sometimes raised against modern treatises on doctrinal subjects; that Friends have no settled code of doctrines, nor any written declarations of their belief."

The preceding extended quotation will show the grounds of doctrinal controversy between our ancient Friends and their opposers; and the charges preferred against the latter being exactly the same as are now made against the Society by the followers of Elias Hicks, one and the same answer will be precisely applicable to ancient enemies and modern separatists. The remainder of our review of this work must form the subject of a future number. Z.

Discipline.—If thou wouldst be happy and easy in thy family, above all things, observe discipline. Every one in it should know their duty, and there should be a time and place for every thing; and whatever else is done or omitted, be sure to begin and end with God.—Penn's Fruits of Solitude.

FOR THE FRIEND.

Explanatory Note to the case referred to in the Memoir of Solomon Underhill.—See p. 135.

The individual alluded to is Elias Hicks; his discourse on the occasion was particularly objectionable. The sentiments which he advanced not only amounted to a rejection of the miraculous conception of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; of his divinity, and the propitiatory sacrifice, which he offered at Jerusalem for the sins of the world; but the terms in which he spake of him, evinced disrespect, and even contempt of his sacred character. So open was his denial of these fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion, that the sound Friends present believed it proper the audience should be informed that the religious Society of Friends never held such opinions, nor were they accountable for the promulgation of them by persons who assumed their name.

The elder of Westbury quarterly meeting was Gideon Seaman, a man whose character stands deservedly high for integrity and religious worth; whose long life of genuine piety, whose mild, amiable, and affectionate manners have secured him the love and respect of all who know him, and are capable of appreciating the virtues which adorn his character. He rose with much solemnity, and made the following observations:

"I should be unwilling to hurt the solemnity of the meeting, but I think I shall be most easy to say, that there have been many good things expressed, which I wish may be properly attended to; but the definition given of Jesus Christ our Saviour, both with respect to his conception and constitution, is different from what I have ever understood to be the sense, and judgment, and doctrine of our society; which has been a trouble to my mind."

What the exact words used by Solomon Underhill were, I am at present unable to say; but the purport of them was similar to those of Gideon Seaman. It would be difficult to convey an adequate idea of the excitement produced amongst the followers of E. H. by this calm and becoming expression of the sentiments of two aged and worthy members of the Society. To call in question the doctrines of their champion was an unpardonable offence; they raised considerable confusion in the meeting house, in which several of them made very unhandsome reflections, and even E. H. himself, with all the self-command of which he is said to be master, betrayed his want of self-government by some very invective remarks. It was to be expected, after the repeated declarations which he and his friends had made in favour of religious liberty, and the right of every member of Society to express his opinions "unshackled by human authority," that they would have shown so much consistency as to permit these two friends to enjoy their own opinions without censure. But this was far from being the case. Gideon Seaman and Solomon Underhill were called upon again and again, by the devoted friends of Elias Hicks, and urged to retract what they had said, and to make a suitable apology. This they could not conscientiously do, for reasons which are sufficiently explained in the Memoir. Finding that neither threats nor persuasion could induce them to renounce their testimony to the doctrines of the Christian religion, or yield to the authority of Elias Hicks, he and his party resolved to make them feel the force of ecclesiastical power, and, accordingly, they arraigned them before their respective meetings as offenders. In this unchristian treatment, Elias Hicks took a principal and conspicuous part, and those aged and venerable men were pursued with a degree of severity, from which their exemplary lives and their honourable gray hairs ought to have been a sufficient protection. The charge against Gideon Seaman was, in substance, that "he had, in a public meeting, conducted in a disorderly manner; even to the opposing of the doctrine of a minister, to the injury of his reputation as such." I have not seen the charge against S. Underhill, but it was the same in substance with the foregoing. This charge is obviously incorrect; the disorder was made by Elias Hicks and his friends; the observations of Gideon Seaman being entirely proper and necessary to clear the religious society from the odium and reproach of anti-christian doctrines preached in their name, and which they never owned nor held. The remarks, moreover, were made in a manner becoming the importance of the subject, and the solemnity of the occasion about which they had met; and I fully believe, that, so far from violating the discipline, consistently with the duty enjoined upon him by its regulations, as a faithful elder of the Society, he could not have done otherwise than he did; for it is notorious, that Elias Hicks had previously been abundantly laboured with in private, according to gospel order, both at home and abroad; and by G. Seaman in particular, without any favourable result.

It is worthy of remark, that the terms of the charge represent the disorder as aggravated by the circumstance of his opposing the doctrines of Elias Hicks; "even to the opposing the doctrine of a minister." It may be worthy of a moment's inquiry, whether ministers are considered by the new sect as a privileged order, elevated above the rest of their brethren, subject to no authority or control in the church, and whether "to advise and admonish, or, if occasion requires, to rebuke them," is to be considered as conducting in a disorderly manner. If so, I am inclined to think, that while pleasing themselves with the motto of "liberty and equality," they are in danger of becoming a priest-ridden people.

Elias Hicks himself openly announced the position that "God makes ministers, but man makes elders." And the "Epistle" issued by his followers from their General Meeting at Green Street, in the Sixth month last, enumerates, amongst "the blessings" which they anticipate from their new association, "a gospel ministry unshackled by human authority." If it be said, that the charge against Gideon Seaman was for opposing the doctrine, and not the individual, how shall we reconcile this with the frequent assertions of the followers of E. H., that "doctrines are nothing;" "doctrines are of no importance," &c. &c. for if these be true, certainly to oppose doctrines would be opposing nothing, and of course the opposition could be of no importance, and therefore no offence. But, if they assume the construction, I am not unprepared to meet them, even on this ground. They claim, with earnestness, the liberty of thought and expression; they must, therefore, allow it to others. Every man, say they, is to be sole judge of his own belief, and in a society of which he is a member, he has an undoubted right to express that belief. Now to apply their own principles to the cases in question: Elias Hicks had occupied a large portion of the meeting, in the undisturbed expression of his belief; he had had an opportunity of explaining it at full length, and it was surely reasonable that Gideon Seaman and Solomon Underhill should be permitted to have a few moments to express their opinions, without being interrupted in the meeting, or subsequently disfranchised of their rights of membership. Their claim to this privilege of speaking, and of being heard, was equally as valid and well founded as that of Elias Hicks; for, however his adherents may venerate his character, he possesses no peculiar or exclusive privilege.

Moreover, it should be remembered, what the doctrine was which those worthy men opposed. It was not the doctrine of Christianity, the principles of the religious Society of Friends. Far from it. The preacher had openly avowed opinions subversive of these; sentiments calculated to overturn the faith of his audience in the highest and holiest articles of the Christian's belief; and sad indeed must be the predominance of infidelity, if to oppose such doctrines as those preached by Elias Hicks, must be esteemed disorderly, and construed into an offence against the church!

In arraigning these two honourable men, Elias Hicks and his followers missed the mark. They could not have selected two persons of more unexceptionable character, and long tried integrity, or whose place in the affectionate esteem of their brethren were better calculated to render the measure unpopular. Such they soon found it to be; and this cause, rather than any respect toward the parties, induced them to abandon the case, after harassing them for almost a whole year. Their attempts at entreaty and coercion were alike fruitless; the unyielding firmness of the christian in support of his Master's cause could not be shaken, and as the course pursued became every day more unpopular, they found it safest to dismiss both the cases, without the slightest concession being made in either.

FOR THE FRIEND.

"We feel an ardent desire, that in all our proceedings tending to this end, our conduct towards all our brethren may, on every occasion, be marked with love and forbearance."—Green street Address, 4th mo. 21st, 1827.

In the course of the examination which we have instituted into some of the conduct publicly exhibited by the followers of Elias Hicks, in violently taking possession of the meeting houses of Friends, to the exclusion of the rightful owners, we have had occasion to state many undeniable facts, which show a striking inconsistency, and even contradiction, between their professions and their practice. Unpleasant and painful as this department of our labours has been, we are convinced that good has arisen from it; inasmuch as these exposures have prevented some persons, at least, from being imposed upon by the specious declarations of love and forbearance, which have been so lavishly made by the new sect, both orally and in writing. We are aware, that many of the transactions, which we have recorded, are disgraceful in their character, and exhibit instances of oppression and abuse, which we could scarcely believe even the violence of party spirit could have sanctioned.

To give publicity to these has been by no means pleasant to our feelings; inclination would have prompted us, for the sake of those with whom we have lived in the interchange of many kindnesses, entirely to withhold them. But we have a duty to perform; and our apprehensions of its obligations induce us to believe, that we are not at liberty to consult our own pleasure in the case.

We believe that no sect has ever arisen, claiming such high attainments in the Christian virtues, or so great advancement towards perfection, as do the followers of Elias Hicks. Certainly none ever made a more goodly profession, on paper, of meekness, gentleness, and good will; and yet, we regret to be obliged to add, that few have fallen so far short of their pretensions.

It is a favourite maxim amongst the new sect, that "the tree is known by its fruits," and in order to enable our distant brethren to judge of the professions of the new sect, by their own criterion, it is necessary they should be told what the fruits are; for without this, the maxim, excellent as it is, would be useless.

The facts which we have stated are such as no sophistry can elude, no professions disguise, no palliation can justify; and, after plainly narrating them, we leave our friends to judge how far they ought to be influenced by the persuasions of those who are calling upon them to desert the doctrines and the discipline, under which the Society of Friends has so long peacefully existed, and to join a new association, whose members either actively, or passively, sanction the acts to which we allude. As regards the general accuracy of the accounts we have given, we think it necessary only to remark, that they may be fully relied upon. They have been drawn up with a scrupulous regard to truth; and so far from exaggerating, we have omitted some well attested occurrences, which would have aggravated the violence and disorder of those disgraceful scenes. Were it necessary, we could refer to numerous persons of the highest respectability, in civil and religious society, who were eye-witnesses of the facts, and who can testify to the truth of our narratives. But they are too notorious to require proof.

In the present essay, we propose to detail some of the circumstances which took place at Green street monthly meeting, held the 26th of the 4th month last; only five days after the adoption of the address, from which the pacific declaration placed at the head of this article is taken; in the very house whence the document was issued, and amongst a part of those persons who, so short a time before, had been engaged in deliberating upon its contents.

At the opening of the monthly meeting, the clerk rose, and stated, in substance, that a number of their members had held a meeting to consider their present situation in relation to Philadelphia quarter; and that he had prepared a minute in conformity with what he understood to be the conclusion then come to. It will be observed, that a caucus meeting had been held to which such of the members only as they chose to call into counsel, were invited, and conclusions were there come to, on subjects affecting the general interests of the whole meeting; minutes were also made of the proceedings of a monthly meeting which had not yet been held.

The clerk proceeded to read the minute prepared before meeting; which declared, after some preliminary observations, that after a time of deliberation thereon, the connection of Green street monthly meeting with Philadelphia quarterly meeting was dissolved. The "time of deliberation," must, of course, have been before meeting, and in the private caucus, where a considerable part of the members were not present. He then read another minute, which had also been prepared in the same irregular manner, appointing a committee to make application to Abington quarter, to receive them into its connection. To these unprecedented acts, contrary both to the spirit and letter of our excellent code of discipline, a number of Friends, who did not approve of the separation, and who had not been invited to the caucus, strongly objected—declaring that the separatists were exercising a control over the monthly meeting, which no individuals had a right to do; that in this disorderly mode of procedure, a few individuals with the clerk, might form certain conclusions out of doors, arrange their plan of action, and then come into meeting, and force their measures through, and record them as the conclusions of the meeting. It was obvious, too, that the monthly meeting had no power to withdraw from its quarterly meeting, without the consent of the latter; or by the judgment of a superior meeting; that the monthly meeting could not be the judge of the conduct of the quarter, for this would be making the monthly meeting superior to the quarterly meeting, whereas the discipline declares expressly, that it shall be subordinate and accountable: and if the monthly meeting believed itself aggrieved, it had its regular mode of redress, by an appeal to the yearly meeting. But all the objections adduced were disregarded; one of the followers of Elias Hicks said, “he hoped no notice would be taken of what those friends said, who were opposed to the minutes;” and another, who was in the station of an overseer, severely reprimanded one of the members, merely because he attempted to show the consequences which would result from the awkward situation in which they had placed themselves, by these unconstitutional acts.

Through the course of the meeting, they conducted themselves with much indecorum, and manifested a degree of excitement incompatible with the spirit of the gospel, and the solemnity of the occasion.

One of their ministers congratulated them upon their independence; which he hoped they would ever maintain, while he made unfounded and uncharitable reflections upon those who differed from him in sentiment. We could repeat many of these unsavoury expressions, the faithful record of which is before us; but we forbear.

Those members, whose reasonable and unanswerable objections to the conduct of the party had been thus disregarded, believed it right for them to remain together, after the others had withdrawn, to consider what it would be proper for them to do, in the painful situation, which the extraordinary and unchristian conduct of the majority had placed them. Accordingly, at the close of the meeting, they, together with several other Friends who attended, remained in the meeting house for that purpose.

The followers of E. H. had generally gone out, but in a few minutes they rushed into the house again, in a very rude manner; standing up, some on the benches, and others on the floor, and laughing and talking aloud, in derision of the Friends who were quietly sitting there; and when these attempted to speak, they rudely interrupted them, and in some instances told them they lied. Of this unkind treatment little or no notice was taken, which seemed to increase their passion; some abused Friends by name, and pointed them out, as objects of scorn and ridicule; some ordered Friends to leave the house, and threatened to call in the trustees: and one of them called out, in a loud and angry tone, “I’d take down the names of every one of them, and complain against them for a riot.” Their clamour and confusion increased the longer Friends sat. One of them stepped up into the gallery, to two Friends who were sitting quietly there, and throwing out his arm towards them, exclaimed twice, “Here’s ranterism for you!”

Meanwhile they commenced closing the window shutters and doors, in order to darken the house; in which employment a minister among them was actively engaged. In a few minutes they were all shut up, except one door, which was left open for Friends to go out at, and around this the followers of E. H. assembled in a crowd, some talking with great vehemence, others laughing and deriding Friends; some saying one thing, and some another, so as to create great confusion and uproar.

Friends now rose to withdraw, and as they left the house, the crowd at the door opened a passage for them, saluting almost every one with some epithet of derision or insult, as he passed through their ranks. Even the elderly Friends, overseers and elders, stood by, and participated in, or countenanced, this disgraceful conduct. One of the former accosted a ministering Friend, by declaring, with great vehemence, “There has got no principle in thee.”

The men’s apartment being cleared, a number of the adherents of E. Hicks rudely entered the women’s room, and seated themselves. A considerable number of women Friends had remained in the house to take such measures as the exigency of the case seemed to require, and they were engaged in transacting their business when the men entered.

As soon as they had got through, the followers of E. H. walked up towards the galleries, where the women were sitting, and in an angry tone charged them with “holding a seditious meeting.” A minister had prepared them for committing these outrages, by remarking, during the previous meeting, that “the women’s meeting was nothing,” “they were of no consequence,” &c. and they now seemed resolved to treat them as if they were of no consequence. One man, a conspicuous character amongst the new sect, accosted a respectable woman by asking her “who she was, where she came from, and what business she had there, and whether she knew that she had been at a seditious meeting,” &c. and others were treated with equal harshness.

While this scene was acting within doors, the minister and another party were actively engaged without. They shut the window shutters with violence, while the clerk was transacting the business, and although three times requested to desist, persisted in closing all but one. The minister threw open the front door, while the clerk was reading, and cried out, to “take notice that there was but one Green street monthly meeting, and that had finished its business and concluded, and that their sitting there was a seditious meeting.”

When the women withdrew from the house several men followed them out, and behaved in a very uncivil manner. These scenes, it will be recollected, were acted within five days after the mild and conciliatory language placed at the head of this article, was adopted; and presents us with the first practical comment upon the professions contained in the address. We leave every reader to draw his own inferences.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH, 16, 1828.

The rapid increase in the number of our subscribers, has so far exceeded our most sanguine anticipations, that we have, for some time past, found it out of our power to supply a regular file of our papers from the commencement. This result, considering that it is but little more than four months since the issuing of our first number, at which period we had not a single subscriber, must certainly be deemed an extraordinary degree of success; and the more so, as it may be said to be spontaneous; or, in other words, nearly, if not altogether, independent of the usual means resorted to in similar enterprises, the employment of persons to collect subscriptions, the appointment of agents, &c. &c. We do not write thus boastingly, but in gratitude towards our friends for the promptitude of their liberality. Nevertheless, we might reasonably infer, that the general character of the paper is well approved, and that it is rising in reputation. We do not think it would be very wide of the mark, even should it be added, that it is deserving of encouragement, and that, provided its claims to commendation continue to be sustained, it ought to be an object of interest, throughout our religious society, in this country at least. Nor could it justly subject us to the imputation of vanity, conscious that ours is but a humble part; and that whatever the paper possesses of merit, is principally attributable to the support which it receives from our able coadjutors. A well conducted journal, on a plan congenial with the views and principles of society, even without reference to particular existing circumstances, is, unquestionably a matter of importance, as being capable of exerting a valuable, extensive, and permanent influence. The press has become a permanent powerful engine, in its operation upon society at large; other religious denominations avail themselves of it, in various ways, as a means of diffusing their particular views; publications are multiplied on every hand, on every topic, and of every description; people will read, and it would be difficult to assign any good reason, why our own society should not come in for a share in the advantage, at least so far as may be practicable, in directing the disposition for inquiry and reading into a right channel, and for salutary ends. To the full extent of our moderate abilities, we are disposed as heretofore, to conduct “The Friend” in subservience to this object, and we have the best reason to confide in the unabated co-operation of the band of literary contributors.

But we have another object in announcing the fact above stated, which is, that as, almost invariably, subscribers have evinced a choice to have all the numbers from the commencement, we have reason to infer that this will continue to be the case, for some time at least, with respect to those who may come forward in future; we would therefore request that all such, in transmitting their names, would explicitly state, whether they would wish to have all the numbers from the first or otherwise; it being our intention to re-print the deficient numbers as soon as a competent number to defray the actual expenses are called for. In the mean time, our friends may be informed, that they can yet be supplied with all the numbers from No. 7, inclusive.

Whom call we gay? That honour has been long
The boast of mere pretenders to the name.
The innocent are gay—the lark is gay,
That dries his feathers, saturate with dew,
Beneath the rosy cloud, while yet the beams
Of dayspring overshoot his humble nest.
The peasant too, a witness of his song,
Himself a songster, is as gay as he.
But save me from the gayety of those Whose headaches nail them to a noon-day bed;
And save me, too, from theirs, whose haggard eyes
Flash desperation, and betray their pangs
For property stripp’d off by cruel chance;
From gayety that fills the bones with pain,
The mouth with blasphemy, the heart with wo.

FOR THE FRIEND.

JERUSALEM.

In the same work by Chateaubriand, from which was taken the picture of "Modern Greece," inserted in our last number, is to be found the following sombre sketch of Jerusalem, as it existed at the period he visited it (1807.) Its miserable, squalid aspect, and the wretched condition of its inhabitants, (particularly the abject remnant of the favoured nation,) under the dark and iron sway of mahomedan despotism, compared with what it was when "the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole earth," exhibit an awful memento of retributive justice, and of the unerring truth of prophecy:—

"Because they forsook the Lord God of their fathers which brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, and laid hold on other gods and worshipped them; therefore hath he brought all this upon them."

"We have now in our hands a drawing of the holy city, which, though well executed, is far from giving a faithful representation of its peculiar aspect, and of its commanding position. Jerusalem, seen from Mount Olivet, presents an inclined plane descending from west to east. A lofty wall, fortified with towers and a gothic castle, encloses the whole city, but excludes a part of Mount Sion which it formerly embraced. Towards the west, and in the centre of the city, the houses are numerous and closely built; but in the direction of the east, and along the valley of cedars, large vacancies are observed; among others the area of the mosque which is erected near the ruins of the temple, and the former site of the second palace of Herod.

"The houses of Jerusalem are heavy square masses, built low, without chimneys or windows: flat terraces, and sometimes domes form the roof. Altogether they appear like prisons or sepulchres. The whole city resembles a cemetery in the midst of a desert.

"If you enter, you find nothing to compensate you for the gloom of the exterior. You lose yourselves in narrow, crooked streets, without pavement, and full of abrupt declivities. You tread upon loose stones, and are enveloped in clouds of dust:—pieces of linen spread from the top of one house to another, increase the darkness of this labyrinth;—which is rendered still more dismal and disgusting by covered markets exhaling a most pestilential odour. A few mean shops only serve to indicate the poverty of the inhabitants,—and these are often shut, from an apprehension that the Cadi may pass by: not an individual is to be seen in the streets, or at the gates of the city: now and then a peasant is discovered stealing through this twilight, and carefully concealing the fruits of his industry under his clothes, lest he should be plundered and maltreated by the soldiery: apart, in a corner, you may observe an Arabian butcher killing some animal suspended by the hind feet from a mouldering wall:—from the bloody arms, and the haggard ferocious countenance of the man, you would be led to suppose that he had been engaged, not in the business of his trade, but in the perpetration of murder. The only sound heard in this deside city, and that merely at distant intervals, is the galloping of the Arabian horse, of which the rider is a janissary, either bringing the head of a bedouin to his master, or setting out to pillage the Fellah.

"In the midst of this extraordinary scene of desolation, your attention is arrested by something still more extraordinary. Among the ruins of Jerusalem there are two distinct and independent classes of people, who find in their religious faith resources which enable them to triumph over this array of horror and misery. You have before you, on one side, a body of Christian monks, whom neither the menaces of death, nor indignities, nor robberies of every description, can drive from the tomb of the Saviour. Their canticles resound night and day about the holy sepulchre. Although plundered in the morning by a Turkish governor, they are still found in the evening at the foot of Mount Calvary, praying on the spot where Jesus Christ suffered for the salvation of man. They welcome a stranger with a serene countenance and a cheerful heart. Without arms or troops, they are still able to protect whole villages against lawless power. Women and children, driven like herds of cattle at the point of the sabre, take refuge in the cloisters of these ascetics. Their charity rescues the trembling victims from the blows of the merciless janissary. In order to ransom their suppliants, they surrender to their pursuers even the common necessities of life;—what is almost indispensable for their own subsistence. Turks, Arabians, Greeks, Christians,—all seek protection from the unarmed and defenceless ministers of the true religion. It is here that we can say with Bossuet, 'that hands uplifted to heaven vanquish more battalions, than those which wield the javelin and the scimitar.'

"While the new Jerusalem is seen 'shining in the midst of the desert,' you may observe between Mount Sion and the temple, another spectacle of almost equal interest. It is that of the remnant of another people, distinct from the rest of the inhabitants:—a people, individually the objects of universal contempt;—who suffer the most wanton outrages without a murmur;—who endure blows and wounds without a sigh;—who, when the sacrifice of their life is demanded, unhesitatingly stretch forth their necks to the sabre. If a member of this community thus cruelly proscribed and abused happens to die, his companion buries him clandestinely during the night, in the valley of Josaphat, within the purlieus of the temple of Solomon. Enter their habitation, and you find them in the most abject, squalid misery; and for the most part occupied in reading a mysterious book to their children, with whom again it becomes a manual for the instruction of the succeeding generation. What these wretched outlaws from the justice and the compassion of the rest of mankind did five thousand years ago, they do still. Six times have they witnessed the destruction of Jerusalem, and are not as yet discouraged: nothing can operate to divert their looks from Sion. We are surprised, no doubt, when we observe the Jews scattered over the face of the earth;—but to experience an astonishment much more lively, we have but to seek them in Jerusalem. The legitimate masters of Judea should be seen as they are in their own land—slaves and strangers; they should be seen awaiting, under the most cruel and oppressive of all despotisms, a king who is to work their deliverance. Near the temple—of which there does not remain 'one stone upon another,' they still continue to dwell; and with the cross as it were planted upon their heads, and bending them to the earth, still cling to their errors, and labour under the same deplorable infatuation. The Persians, the Greeks, and the Romans have disappeared from the face of the earth; and a small people, whose origin is anterior to that of these mighty nations, still survives amid the ruins of their country, with no alteration of manners, and no mixture of foreign blood. If there be any thing among mankind which bears the stamp of a miracle, it is to be found here most certainly. What can be more marvellous or prodigious, even to the eye of a philosopher, than this approximation at the foot of Mount Calvary of the old and the new Jerusalem,—the one deriving consolation from the aspect of that tomb from which all the miseries of the other appear to spring?

"Next to the state of the Jews there is certainly no species of martyrdom worse than that which is daily experienced by the monks of the holy land. Their situation can only be compared to that of the inhabitants of France during the reign of terror. They labour under a constant apprehension of robbery or death, and enjoy not one moment of security. This will be more intelligible after we have drawn an outline of the government of Jerusalem.

"The holy city is attached to the pachaship of Damascus; and we can find no reason for this but in that system of oppression which the Turks pursue, as it were, instinctively. It is separated from Damascus by mountains; and the intercourse between them is still further impeded by the Arabs who infest the deserts. Consequently, when the magistrates or governors of Jerusalem act tyrannically, it is almost impossible to transmit a complaint to the pacha. It would have been much more easy and simple to annex Jerusalem to the government of Acre, which is in the neighbourhood. The Latin fathers and the Franks could then claim protection from the consuls who reside in the ports of Syria;—the Greeks and the Turks might make themselves heard. But this is exactly what their rulers wish to preclude: they want no impertinent murmurers: it is their object to have dumb slaves.

"Jerusalem is, therefore, consigned over to a governor, who is almost entirely independent. He can commit, with impunity, the most enormous excesses, and has only to adjust his accounts with the pacha afterwards. Every magistrate in Turkey has a right to delegate his entire authority to a surrogate, and that authority, as is well known, extends over property and life. For a few purses of gold, a janissary can become an aga, and such an aga may, when he thinks fit, either deprive you of life, or exact a ransom for it. These executioners are thus multiplied in every village of Judea. The only thing heard in that country—the only species of justice administered, is this—'Let him pay ten,—twenty,—thirty purses; give him five hundred strokes of the bastinado;—cut off his head.' One outrage never fails to produce another still greater. If a peasant be robbed, it becomes necessary to plunder his neighbour: for in order to escape the political justice of the pacha, the robber must obtain the means of paying for the first by the commission of a second crime. The pacha, when he condescends to visit his district, instead of remedying and avenging the wrongs of the inhabitants, is himself, in fact, their most terrible scourge. His arrival at Jerusalem is dreaded more than the incursion of the most ferocious enemy: the shops are shut;—the tenants of the mansion hide themselves in the subterraneous passages of the city; some stretch themselves on their pallets and feign death;

others fly to the mountains. As we were at Jerusalem at the time of the pacha's arrival, we can attest the truth of this statement. The individual whom we saw, was, like most of the muselmans of this quarter, a slave to the most sordid avarice. In his quality of chief of the caravan of Mecca, he thought himself authorized to multiply his exactions, and there was no expedient of rapine which he did not practise under pretext of collecting means for the protection of the pilgrims. One of his most usual devices was that of fixing a very low maximum for the price of provisions. With this the populace was delighted,—but the tradesmen shut their shops. The consequence was—a scarcity: the pacha then made a secret compromise with the shopkeepers,—for a certain number of purses, he gave them permission to sell at any rate they pleased. They naturally sought to indemnify themselves for the sums they had paid to him, by putting a most extravagant price upon their commodities, and thus the populace, perishing a second time with hunger, was compelled to sacrifice almost every article of clothing in order to procure food. We saw him practise at Jerusalem a still more ingenious scheme of vexation. He sent his cavalry to pillage some Arabian farmers on the other side of the Jordan. These good folks who had paid the miri or tax, and who did not think that they were in a state of war, were surprised in the midst of their tents and flocks, and robbed of about two thousand five hundred goats and sheep;—an hundred calves; a thousand asses, and six mares of the best breed. The camels alone escaped. A Shiek called them from a distance, and drew them into the mountains, where their milk constituted the sole resource of their unfortunate owners.

"An European would not readily imagine what the pacha did with this booty. He affixed to each of these animals a price of about treble its value. He then sent the whole of them so estimated to the butchers, to various individuals of Jerusalem, and to the chiefs of the adjacent villages. The alternative for the persons thus favoured, was to pay—or to suffer death. We confess that if we had not been ourselves eye witnesses of this accumulation of iniquity, we would not have believed it possible.

"The pacha retires at length—after having completely drained Jerusalem. But in order to avoid paying the guards, and under the pretence of providing an escort for the caravan, he generally takes with him all the troops to be found. The governor is then left with a handful of assistants who are insufficient for the purposes of the domestic police of the city, and altogether unequal to the task of preserving order throughout the country. The year preceding our visit, he was obliged to conceal himself in his house, in order to elude the search of a band of robbers who had leaped over the walls, and attempted to plunder the city.

"After the departure of the pacha, another evil, the consequence of his oppressions, usually displays itself. The oppressed villages rise in arms, and make war upon each other for the purpose of gratifying hereditary feuds. All communication is then cut off. Agriculture languishes in every direction. The peasant, during the night, lays waste the vineyard, and destroys the olive of his enemy. The pacha returns the following year, and exacts the same tribute from a diminished population. There must be then an aggravation of tyranny: and whole settlements are exterminated, in order to satisfy his thirst of rapine and of blood. The scene of desolation widens by degrees: the only objects which remain for the eye are houses, at distant intervals, crumbling to ruins, and near them burial places constantly augmenting in size. Every year a hut perishes—a family disappears; and, at length, nothing but the cemetery remains to point out the spot upon which the village once stood."

Frugality is good, if liberality be joined with it. The first, is leaving off superfluous expenses; the last, bestowing them to the benefit of others that need. The first without the last, begins covetousness; the last without the first, begins prodigality; both together make an excellent temper.

ALBANY AND CAFFER-I-AND.

"We kept along shore, and, in a little nook where a stream of water ran down, to our great joy, a hippopotamus suddenly lifted up its head close to us, and soon after a young one, and then a still younger. We lay upon our oars enjoying the sight for near half an hour; they cannot remain long under water, or rather did not then: we were near enough to distinguish every part of their heads; they have the power of closing their nostrils, and when they come up for air, they make a hissing noise in distending them, and shake their ears. As this element does not furnish the animal with food of any kind, there seems no apparent cause for its going into the water but for rest, and refreshment. When this family party had retired, we returned to our encampment, where another agreeable evening terminated the day's amusement."

"We resolved the following morning to pay another visit to the Fish river mouth, and on our road saw certain indications of an elephant being in the neighbourhood. A large tree, a euphorbia, at least thirty feet high, had been just torn up by the roots, and lay across the path; we, therefore kept close to the banks of the river, and avoided as much as possible the bush. The elephant crosses the deepest rivers if not too broad; he walks on until out of his depth, then plunges, and with his hind feet strikes the bottom and springs forward, then plunges again, until he gets across."

"One of our party had just returned from a visit to a friend residing between the Bushman and Sunday rivers, and he gave me a very interesting detail of his excursion. The day he arrived there, one of the Hottentots belonging to the farm had killed, single handed, two elephants and a buffalo. The following morning two Hottentot women called, and begged permission to accompany their husbands in the wagon to bring home the flesh of the buffalo: this suggested to the gentlemen the idea of going also, and they set off, walking unarmed, by the side of the wagon. When they got to the bush the wagoner gave notice that he would tie up the oxen, and then go in and cut away a path to draw the animal out."

"All the party went into the bush, the Hottentots first with their large guns, then their wives, and the gentlemen following. The first Hottentot frequently spoke to his companions in a low voice, and was heard to say 'look, look;' on inquiring the cause, he pointed out to them the fresh track of an elephant. The bush became thicker, and the sun had no power to shine through the thick foliage; they passed the spot which the Hottentot marked out as the place where he had wounded the first elephant, and soon afterwards they saw the dead buffalo. The party went on resolving to see the dead elephant, and winding along through the bush till they came to a sand-hill, the Hottentots pointed out one of the carcasses at a distance, lying on another sand hill, but on looking at it for a second, it appeared to move, and the Hottentot discovered that it was a young calf by the side of the cow. The whole party immediately went on, and when within musket shot, they found that there were two calves lying by their dead mother—a piteous and interesting sight! The young ones rose, and some dogs that the Hottentots had incautiously taken into the bush, barked violently. At this moment the bushes moved, and the stupendous father stalked in; he looked around him quietly and even sorrowfully, and after viewing the party for a second, he walked on, and was soon hid behind some trees."

"The situation they had placed themselves in had now become extremely critical; the bush was continuous for miles in extent, and where to fly in case of an attack was very difficult to determine. They were all warned not to run against the wind; and the direction of the house was pointed out as well as circumstances would allow; but while they were debating the matter, the dogs ran in among the young elephants; they set up a deafening yell, and made directly towards the party, some of whom lay down by the path, with the hope of seizing the smallest calf, but they were glad to make their escape, as they discovered it to be larger than they expected. The bull elephant, called back by the cry of his young, again appeared, but totally different in aspect and even in form. His walk was quicker, his eye fierce, his trunk elevated, and his head appeared three times the size. My friend called to the Hottentot to look; and he immediately replied in broken English, 'Yes, mynheer, dat side elephant will make mens dead!' The alarm was extreme; but while the animal stood hesitating, the cry of the young sounded from a distant quarter, and the enraged father took the shortest cut towards them, crushing the branches as he stalked along, and the party thus most providentially escaped. They went up to the dead elephant, merely to examine it; for the Hottentots leave the tusks till the flesh becomes softened, as it would take too much time to separate them. The other elephant also proved to be a female. She had been fatally wounded by the first shot, and had fallen against a tree, which supported her almost as erect as if alive. The Hottentots are wonderfully bold marksmen: they steal along naked, and never fire till they almost touch the animal, as they pride themselves upon knowing the vulnerable parts. They finally reached the buffalo, cut down some intervening bush, took the oxen in, and dragged it out."

In a subsequent part of the work is the following narrative. "A party having pursued and fired several times at an enormous male elephant, the animal became enraged with the wounds inflicted on him, and made a furious attack. He fixed his eye on a poor fellow who stood at a little distance, whilst the rest of the party ran up a hill. The elephant, unable to pursue that track, chased the unfortunate man, and, in making a short turn round the bush, broke his own leg. This accident, however, did not stop his pursuit. Instead of running, the elephant now made enormous strides. The party on the hill saw the utter impossibility of the man's escape. His utmost speed seemed as nothing compared with the enemy's gigantic movements. In a few seconds he overtook the object of his pursuit, twisted him in his trunk, and trampled him to death! then raising the body from the ground threw it into a tree. The elephant now returned towards the bush, apparently suffering much from the wounds he had received. The female came out to meet him, and endeavoured, by placing her shoulder under him, to enable him to walk off. Another shot, however, brought him down, and his mate left him. One of the party then fired at her, but only with small shot, which made no impression. It had the effect, however, of increasing her rage, and she pursued the officer who fired. He fled, believing death inevitable, and fell at the moment the elephant reached him. As he lay flat on the ground the animal did not use her trunk, but darted at him with her tusk, (fortunately she had but one,) she missed her aim, and tore up the ground within an inch of his shoulder. At the instant she was about to trample on him, an intrepid young highlander advanced within a few paces, fired, and mortally wounded the elephant, who quitted her prey, rushed into the bushes, and died. The stupendous male elephant measured eighteen feet in height."

"The very hairs of your head are all numbered."
Matt. x. 30.

The insect that with puny wing
Just shoots along one summer ray;
The flow'et, which the breath of spring
Wakes into life for half a day;
The smallest note, the slenderest hair—
All feel our common Father's care.

Even from the glories of his throne
He bends, to view this wandering ball;
Sees all, as if that all were one;
Loves one, as if that one were all;
Rolls the swift planets in their spheres,
And counts the sinner's lonely tears.

FOR THE FRIEND.

The effect of genuine religion, is to produce in the heart, an enlarged, comprehensive, yet discriminating charity; while it is not blind to the blemishes and imperfections, it is prompt to perceive, and ever disposed duly to estimate, what is good or excellent under every diversity of form and profession. And notwithstanding the many excrescences with which christianity, at different periods, has been encumbered, it perhaps may be said, that under all its modifications, its benign and renovating spirit has not failed to diffuse itself, to infix its divine impress, and to leave indelible traces of its influence upon the habits, the institutions, and the dispositions of men. Though it be said, "the light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not," may we not nevertheless conclude, that all were not equally enveloped in the darkness, even in times of the greatest declension, and that in spite of the tares of the enemy—the weeds of superstition—the briars and thorns of scholastic divinity, there were yet some spots, wherein the 'good seed' could take root, spring up and endure? Among many other circumstances which might be deduced from history, to confirm the propriety of these reflections, is the following interesting account of a most singular fraternity, which having its origin in the midst of monkish blindness, has continued from century to century to dispense its benefactions.

From the New Monthly Magazine.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF MERCY.

Two or three days after my arrival in Pisa, I was talking in the street with an Italian gentleman, when about thirty fellows came round the corner, walking two and two, not soberly as pious folks move in procession, but with stout manly strides, and wearing a very uncouth disguise. They were clothed in black sackcloth from top to toe, girded round the waist; and the hood not only came over the head, but fell before the face down to the breast, with two small peep-holes for the eyes. Each carried a rosary in his hand, and each at his shoulders bore a black broad-brimmed hat. To my inquiries of who they were, my companion answered, "La Misericordia." Whether, owing to the word misericordia, or to their sackcloth and rosaries, or both, or what I know not, but without further question I set them down in my mind as penitents on their way to some sort of devotion; and very sorry I was they could not be agitated at their own consciences without wearing so frightful an appearance.

It happened within a week that a house under repair, on the Lung-Arno, fell down, with the exception of the front wall, on the workmen, who had incautiously disturbed the foundation. I was on the opposite side of the river, ignorant of what had occasioned the noise and the dense cloud of dust, till the wind slowly wafted it away, and the mischief was clear before me. Four were buried in the ruins, and a fifth clung to the wall, with his feet upon the window-sill at the second story, whither he had leaped from the room at the moment of the crash. As soon as the panic would allow any one to act, a long ladder, lying before the house, was raised, and the poor fellow slowly moved from his dangerous situation. As he reached the ground in safety, a loud bell in the city tolled once, then stopped, and tolled again, and I heard the crowd about me say, "Hark! there is the bell of the Misericordia! they will soon be here!" Those in the neighbourhood brought ladders of various sizes, and spades, and pick-axes, to be in readiness. Presently across the bridge came those black penitents, as I had imagined them, hastening almost at a run, and bearing a litter on their shoulders. The crowd made way for them, and they climbed into the ruins at the back of the house, with the spades and pick-axes. From the moment they came, not a word was spoken; all was hushed, even the sorrowful cries of the relations, waiting for the event. In a short while the Brothers brought out one of the sufferers, insensible and grievously bruised; they placed him in the litter, and bore him to the hospital. By that time a party of soldiers arrived, who kept the crowd back from the front wall, lest that also should fall; while the Brothers, regardless of the danger, still worked on, and indefatigably. I saw three of the buried workmen brought from the ruin and carried to the hospital; the fourth was killed, and they bore away his body on a bier.

After having witnessed this dauntless and persevering conduct on the part of the Brotherhood of Mercy, I was continually making inquiries about them. I was told it was a very ancient institution, first established in Florence; that the Brothers were very numerous in all the Tuscan cities, and that their duty was to be always ready to succour any person in distress. "Are they priests?" "No; only a certain number of priests are permitted to join them." "Then it is not a religious establishment?" "Not at all; and their charity is so general, that they would render the same assistance to you, a foreigner and a heretic, as to one of their Catholic citizens. They never inquire into creeds; it is enough that a fellow being stands in need of their exertions."

The next time their bell tolled, I hurried from my lodgings to attend them on their errand. They walked very fast, and not a word was spoken. At a sign from their chief, the litter from time to time was changed to different shoulders. I followed them to the further end of the city, on the south side of the Arno; and they stopped before a little chapel, where a poor old woman lay on the steps with her leg broken. The litter, a covered one, was placed on the ground by her side; then, without a word, but with the utmost attention and gentleness, they placed her within it, and immediately it was raised again on their shoulders. One of the Brothers asked her some questions in a whisper, and she replied that she felt no pain, but was very faint; upon which the covering of the litter was pulled higher, and as they bore her to the hospital, they stopped two or three times at the turnings of the streets, in order to dispose the covering so as to afford her as much air as possible, and at the same time to shelter her from the sun. Such quiet and unaffected benevolence, such a tender regard for the ease and comfort of this poor woman, showed the Brothers to me in another light, and I was rejoiced to see that their kindness was equal to their heroism. They no longer appeared to me so uncouth; and, as I continued to walk near them, it struck me there was a very benignant expression in a pair of eyes seen through their sackcloth masks. I also observed, below their habits, that two of them wore black silk stockings. This rather surprised me; but I learnt that all ranks of persons are enrolled in the Misericordia—tradesmen, gentlemen, nobles, and the Grand Duke himself.

Not to detain the reader by particularizing a variety of circumstances under which, both in Pisa and Florence, I have watched the prompt attendance of the Brothers, I proceed to give you a short historical account of the institution. 'This has been done, and in the highest terms of praise, by the late Professor Pictet, in the "Bibliothèque Universale" for 1822; and it appears he was the first traveller who considered them worthy of such notice. Upon reference to several Italian works, especially to that of Placido Landini, I am sorry to observe many inaccuracies in the professor's account. I shall therefore follow those writers who have derived their information directly from the archives of the establishment; adding to them what I have learnt through the kindness of several gentlemen, "Capi di Guardia" to the company.

Those who contend we excel our forefathers in humanity and charity, will be surprised to hear that the Campagna della Misericordia, the most conspicuous, even in the present day, for those virtues, has existed for nearly six hundred years within the walls of Florence. It was established in 1240; and its origin was extremely curious. At that period of the Republic, when the citizens were acquiring immense profits from the manufacture of woollen cloth, the city-porters were numerous, and usually took their stand round the church of the Baptistery, near the Cathedral. In fact, for the most part, they lived there; and during the intervals of work, they ate their meals and drank their wine, or played at various games, either on the Piazza, or in the sheds erected for their accommodation. One among them, Piero di Luca Booris, an old and devout man, was highly scandalized at the cursing and swearing of his companions. Therefore, as their elder, he proposed that he who should hereafter take God's or the Virgin's name in vain, should be mulcted to the amount of a crazia (three farthings;) and that the said crazia should be dropped through a small hole into a certain box, so that an end might be put to such a vain and sinful conversation. To this the porters agreed, and the difficulty of conquering a bad habit caused the box to be well nigh filled. Piero then reminded them that, for the benefit of their souls, the contents of the box ought to be employed in acts of charity, and made the following proposal: "Let us," said he, "purchase with part of this money six litters, to serve for the six divisions of the city, and let us in turns attend with them. Thus we shall be in readiness to carry to their houses, or to the hospital, all those who may be taken with sudden illness, or who fall from a scaffolding or otherwise be grievously injured in our streets, and stand in need of their fellow creatures' assistance; and we will also carry to the churches the bodies of such as may fall down dead, or be slain, or be drowned; and let us agree that for each several journey of this sort, the porters shall receive a giulio (sixpence) from the box." This not only met with approbation, but each individual took an oath to observe it. Their labours began, and they pursued them with so much diligence and charity (says their chronicler) that every man in the city greatly applauded these porters, sometimes offering them three giuli, as a present, for a single journey; but this the old man, Piero, would not allow, bidding them perform their duty cheerfully and without bribe, and to wait for their farther reward in eternity.

[To be concluded in our next.]

FOR THE FRIEND.

I have always thought the Eulogium on Rum one of the happiest effusions of its gifted author. The following jeu d'esprit, which is taken from the New York Enquirer, has brought the eulogium so forcibly to my mind, that I thought they would make together a sprightly and not uninteresting article for the Friend. To take up and pursue the very pleasant allegory of the New York paper, I may add that I entirely dissent from the respectful notice he takes of "Monsieur Brandy," for I have often looked at "his ruddy and high coloured cheeks," and confess myself unable to see any beauty in their mahogany tint. As to his smartness and piquancy, I see nothing like them about him. His eyes are blood shot and fiery—without any of the clear sparklings of intellect. He is essentially a low fellow—addicted to tobacco and swearing, and like all the fraternity, a notorious gambler.

There is another gentleman, of the same trade, one Cordial, of more insinuating address than any of the others—a smooth faced and perfumed dandy, whose great ambition is to be admitted at the morning calls and evening parties of the fair sex. So winning are his ways, that if once he gains entrance he is very apt to become a constant visitor, and even to win access to the nursery and the dressing room. Brandy and Whiskey are bosom friends of this Cordial, who take every opportunity to introduce them to his acquaintance, and is always ready, and seldom fails to give place to them in the end. I have known him to dress himself up as a physician, and pretend to be knowing in diseases of the stomach; such as dyspepsia and colic, when he could gain admittance into a family in no other way. To tell the truth, he generally succeeds in his first attempts in relieving pain, but then in all the cases I have examined, he has saddled himself on the family at a heavy expense to them, so that they have found the physician a greater evil than the distemper. I have more fear of this fellow, Cordial, than of any other of this gang of swindlers, and for this reason, that he makes it his business to please and cajole the ladies, and is admitted into society where neither of his accomplices dare show their faces.

It is mortifying to be obliged to expose one's professional brethren, and to proclaim to the world their foibles and want of principle; but I should leave my readers imperfectly acquainted with the danger they are in, if I did not also caution them against Dr. Opium. This celebrated physician, it is well known, is a grave and learned Turk; and while he keeps to the proper business of his profession, has always been eminently useful to the world. How he first became acquainted with Whiskey and Brandy I have never heard, but as the latter have been outlawed in Turkey for their many crimes, I presume they first met in France or Ireland. Notwithstanding his high reputation, these fellows have gained such influence over him, that he has actually introduced them to his patients as their best friends. I have known him to continue his visits in a family, on the footing of a private and confidential friend, long after he has cured the patient; and however degrading and mortifying it is to acknowledge, that so learned a man can be a thorough scoundrel, it is notorious, that this intimacy has always ended in introducing Brandy and Whiskey upon the same intimate terms as himself. The only safe course that can be pursued with him, is to pay him his fee, and turn him out of doors the moment he has cured the patient.

A WATER DRINKER.

⚠ Caution.—A southern paper admonishes the public to be on their guard against two suspicious persons named Brandy and Whiskey, who are now prowling about the country maltreating and destroying a great number of people. It is said that they mean to reside for some time in this city. They have been pointed out to us in company with a third ruffian who calls himself Rum. Whiskey is a foreigner. He has lived several years in Scotland, and is well known in Ireland, where he passed himself off under the assumed names of Farintosh and Potyeen. Since his emigration to this country, he resided a long while at Monongahela. He is now a regularly naturalized citizen, and may be met with at all hours of the day or night in the hotels and streets of New York. He is a mean looking, yellow-faced fellow, who generally mixes himself up with persons of very opposite characters. We have seen him arm-and-arm with Messrs. Sugar and Lemon. When so supported he always gets into hot water, and is very quarrelsome. All three of them go into the streets punching every body they meet, staggering some and knocking down others. No better evidence can be given of the effects of "evil communication" than this, for Sugar and Lemon, when out of Whiskey's influence, are very respectable and harmless people.

Sugar is particularly sweet tempered, but when Whiskey gets hold of him all his sweetness melts away. The habits of Whiskey are all low, and though some of them keep up a secret intercourse with him, yet he is not publicly recognised by the members of "Good Society." Monsieur Brandy, on the other hand, is more genteel, and may occasionally be encountered at the tables of persons of condition. He sat opposite to us yesterday, and behaved very becomingly, probably because the company took scarcely any notice of him. His complexion is ruddy and high coloured, and his general manner spirited and agreeable. In matters of taste he is remarkable for smartness and piquancy. Brandy is a Frenchman by birth, and belongs to the ancient family of De Cognac. It is to be lamented that a person with such gentlemanly capacities should ever mingle with people of such bad odour as Whiskey and Rum. This Rum is a decided ruffian. His very looks condemn him. His face is of a dark sallow hue, and from the unpleasant effluvia which proceed from him, we suspect he is sadly unclean in his habits, and has an antipathy to water, and yet he is a monstrous coxcomb, and is always admiring his own appearance in a glass. Fortunately he seldom intrudes into the company of gens comme il faut. He delights to linger about pot-houses and ship-yards, and to blow it out with daily labourers and sailors. It is shrewdly conjectured that he is fond of drink, for he may be generally met with about "grog time." Rum is manifestly of West India origin. The principal seat of the family is on the plantations of Jamaica, although some of the illegitimate branches have resided for several years in New England, where their influence is most unfavourable to the proverbial "steady habits" of the country. The individual who is now in New York, is from the West Indies. He is called by those who know him "Old Jamaica," to distinguish him from his New-England kinsman.

From these descriptions our readers may be able to discover and avoid these suspicious characters. All connexion with them is disreputable, and great injury to health, purse and fame, must attend the slightest intimacy. N. Y. Enquirer.

EULOGIUM ON RUM.

Arise! ye pimpled tippling race, arise!
From every town and village tavern come!
Show your red noses, and o'erflowing eyes,
And help your poet chaunt the praise of Rum.
The cordial drop, the morning dram I sing,
The mid-day toddy and the evening sling.

Hail, mighty Rum! and by this general name
I call each species—whiskey, gin or brandy:
(The kinds are various—but the effect the same;
And so I choose a name that's short and handy;
For, reader, know, it takes a deal of time,
To make a crooked word lie smooth in rhyme.)

Hail, mighty Rum! thy song inspiring merit
Is known to many a bard in these our days:
Apollo's drink they find, is void of spirit—
Mere chicken broth—insipid as their lays;
And pleas'd they'd give a riv'let—aye, a sea
Of tuneful water for one quart of thee!

Hail, mighty Rum! how wondrous is thy power!
Unwarmed by thee how would our spirits fail,
When dark December comes, with aspect sour,
And sharp as razor, blows the northern gale!
And yet thou'rt grateful in that sultry day,
When raging Sirius darts his fervid ray.

Hail, mighty Rum! to thee the wretched fly;
And find a sweet oblivion of their woes;
Lock'd in thy arms as in the grave, they lie—
Forget their kindred—and forgive their foes—
And Lethe's stream, (so much extoll'd by some
In ancient times,) I shrewdly guess, was Rum.

Hail, mighty Rum! what can thy power withstand—
E'en lordly reason flies thy dreadful face!
And health, and joy, and all the lovely band
Of social virtues, shun thy dwelling place;
(For in whatever breast it rears its throne,
Like Turkish monarchs, rum must rule alone.)

When our bold fathers cross'd th' Atlantic wave
And here arriv'd—a weak defenceless band,
Pray, what became of all the tribes so brave—
The savage owners of this happy land?
Were they sent headlong to the realms below
By doom of battle? friend, I answer, no.

Our fathers were too wise to think of war;
They knew the woodlands were not quickly past;
They might have met with many an ugly scar—
Lost many a foretop—and been beat at last.
But Rum, assisted by his son Disease,
Perform'd the business with surprising ease.

And would our western brethren be less proud, or
In other words, throw by the gun and drum—
For ducks and squirrels save their lead and powder—
And send the tawny rogues some pipes of Rum—
I dare predict they all would gladly suck it;
And ev'ry mother's son soon kick the bucket.

But lo! the ingratitude of Adam's race!
Tho' all these clever things to Rum we owe,
Gallons of ink are squirted in his face;
And his bruise'd back is bang'd with many a blow.
Some hounds of note have rung his fun'ral knell,
And ev'ry puppy joins the gen'ral yell.

So have I seen, (the simile is fine,
And wonderfully pat, tho' rather old,)
When rising Phœbus shot his ray benign,
A flock of sheep come skipping from the fold;
Some restless sheep cries baa; and all the throng,
Ewes, rams, lambs, wethers, bellowing pour along.

But fear not, Rum! tho' fiercely they assail,
And none but I, thy bard, thy cause defend,
Think not thy foes, tho' num'rous, shall prevail,
Thy power diminish, or thy being end.
Tho' spurn'd from table and the public eye,
In the snug closet, safely shalt thou lie.

And oft when Sol's proud chariot quits the sky,
And humbler Cynthia mounts her one horse chair,
To that snug closet shall thy vot'ry fly,
And wrapt in darkness keep his orgies there—
Lift the full bottle, joyous to his head,
Then, great as Caesar, reel sublime to bed.

Disappointments and Resignation.—Disappointments, that come not by our own folly, they are the trials or correction of heaven; and it is our own fault if they prove not our advantage. To repine at them does not mend the matter; it is only to grumble at our Creator. But to see the hand of God in them, with a humble submission to his will, is the way to turn water into wine, and he engage the greatest love and mercy on our side. We must needs disorder ourselves, if we only look at our losses. But if we consider how little we deserve what is left, our passion will cool, and our murmurs will turn into thankfulness. If our hairs fall not to the ground, less do we, or our substance, without God's providence. Nor can we fall below the arms of God, how low soever it be we fall; for though our Saviour's passion is over, his compassion is not; that never fails his humble, sincere disciples; in him they find more than all that they lose in the world.—Penn's Fruits of Solitude.

When I behold a fashionable table set out in all its magnificence, I fancy that I see gout and dropsies, fevers and lethargies, with other innumerable distempers, lying in ambuscade among the dishes. Nature delights in the most plain and simple diet. Every animal, but man, keeps to one dish. Herbs are the food of this species, fish of that, and flesh of a third. Man falls upon every thing that comes in his way; not the smallest fruit or excrescence of the earth, scarce a berry or a mushroom can escape him. Addison.

The reflections on a day well spent, furnishes us with joys more pleasing than ten thousands triumphs. Thomas a Kempis.

ELISHA BATES AND THE BEREAN.

And as the Sandy Foundation Shaken was frequently referred to in ancient times by the enemies, as it is in modern times by the pretended friends of the Society, in proof that they held opinions which they did not, and in consequence of that circumstance was often mentioned in the explanations which Friends gave of their belief, some little notice of that treatise will be proper to be given here.

W. Penn and Geo. Whitehead were engaged in a public dispute with a certain T. Vincent and three others—the principal points of controversy were: "Of God, subsisting in three distinct and separate persons."

The impossibility of God's pardoning sinners [without] a plenary satisfaction.

The justification of impure persons by imputative righteousness.

The debate was conducted with rudeness on the part of Vincent and his coadjutors, and finally broken up without allowing our friends an opportunity to state their principles. W. Penn appealed to the public in print—stated the points in question, and endeavoured to show the inconsistency of his opponent's principles—such was the occasion and character of the Sandy Foundation Shaken.

It was at once understood by his enemies as a denial of the divinity of Christ, and W. Penn was consequently committed to prison. But as this was not his intention, he did not choose to lie under the imputation, and accordingly wrote a piece which he called "Innocency with her open Face, presented by way of apology for the book entitled the Sandy Foundation Shaken." On the publication of this "Apology," he was released from prison, but his open enemies ceased not to refer to the Sandy Foundation in proof of his holding the very same opinions which are now attempted to be fixed on him and his brethren, by "professed admirers of their lives and principles."

William Penn, in the very treatise thus misrepresented, in ancient and in modern times, expresses himself in the following terms: "Mistake me not, we never have denied a Father, Word, and Spirit, which are one, but men's inventions." Select Works, p. 21.

But Wm. Penn not only declared, twenty years after this, what he and his friends ever believed and constantly maintained, but in the intermediate time gave a number of Testimonies, not less pointed than that which the Berean would represent as the most obscure and incautious he has seen among Friend's writings.

In 1692, the Editors of the Athenian Mercury, a periodical paper, made an attack on the Society of Friends, and exhibited many false charges against them, in relation to their religious principles. Among others of this description, they charged them with denying the Trinity: and brought in proof, a quotation from Penn's Sandy Foundation, saying, "For the scripture no where calls God the Holy Three of Israel, but Holy One of Israel;" though in the edition I have of Penn's works, I do not find the passage exactly in those words. To this charge of the Mercury, William Penn replies, "But you should in justice have added, of persons, with all the school niceties and distinctions that belong to that sort of explication and scripture, for to that only it is your first proof refers, viz. [the passage from the Sandy Foundation] and adds, 'three persons are not to be found in the Bible.'" "Your proof," continues he, "from 1 John v. 7. There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one," will not support your charge, because it contains not the matter controverted in it, viz. Three Persons, for that is the point in controversy. Let it suffice, if you please, that we believe the scripture, though we reject that interpretation; and that we own three witnesses, and that those three are one, without allowing the intricacy and confusion of the schools." Select Works, p. 672.

In his Key, he has a section headed, "Of the word three, or Scripture Trinity," which states a "perversion," "The Quakers deny the Trinity." To which he replies: "Nothing less: they believe in the Holy Three, or Trinity of Father, Word, and Spirit, according to Scripture. And that these three are truly and properly one; of one NATURE, as well as WILL. But they are very tender of quitting Scripture terms and phrases, for SCHOOLMEN'S; such as DISTINCT and SEPARATE PERSONS and SUBSISTENCES, &c. are; from whence people are apt to entertain gross ideas and notions of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." P. 682. Then six years after this was written the article extracted in the pamphlet, which gave the Berean so much uneasiness. But had he read the foregoing, he possibly might not have considered the other so "incautious and obscure."

Geo. Whitehead, who was engaged with W. Penn in the dispute with T. Vincent and others, also gave his testimony on the subject before us. W. Maddox, one of Vincent's coadjutors, made the following objection against Penn and Whitehead: "You, by refusing to call them three divine Hees, have made it manifest that your quarrel is not with the word 'person,' as some then apprehend; but with the doctrine or fundamental truth expressed by the three persons, viz. the modal distinction, and essential union of oneness of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." To which Geo. Whitehead replies: "It was evident to many, that we found fault with your miscalling and misrepresenting the Father, the Word, and Spirit, and never in the least opposed, nor questioned there being Three such as mentioned in the Scripture, to wit, The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; but there openly confessed to the fundamental truth of them in Scripture terms." See Divinity of Christ, &c. by Geo. Whitehead, p. 23.

In reply to the charge of Arianism and Socinianism, Geo. Whitehead says:

"We had not our principles from either Arius or Socinus, neither did we ever deny the divinity of Christ, or of his being of the same substance with the Father, as Arius or Socinus and others are accused: so that therein we are very unjustly compared and misrepresented, for which I can say, the Lord forgive these our prejudiced opposers." And after enumerating several other charges which had been made against them, he proceeds: "And now we are falsely reckoned Socinians, and most injuriously accused with denying the divinity of Christ, the Son of God, which we are ever always clear of; still confessing him, according to the Scriptures, both in his sufferings, dominion, and glory, who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." See Divinity of Christ, pages 32, 33, 34, 38, 39, and Bevan's Defence, p. 41.

Richard Claridge, in a treatise, entitled "An Essay on the Doctrine of Christ's Satisfaction," &c. says:

"That which W. Penn refuted [in the Sandy Foundation] was not the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, as it is declared in the Scriptures of truth: but the notion of three distinct and separate persons, as the title page plainly shows; or the trinity of distinct and separate persons in the unity of essence, p. 12. The imagined trinity, p. 16. For W. P. sincerely owned and doth own the Scripture Trinity of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

Geo. Fox, in a paper which he wrote from Worcester prison, says: "We believe, concerning God, the Father, Son, and Spirit, according to the testimony of the Holy Scripture, which we receive and embrace as the most authentic and perfect declaration of Christian faith, being indited by the Holy Spirit of God, that never errs. 1st. That there is one God and Father, of whom are all things. 2dly. That there is one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom all things were made, John 1 and 17, Rom. 2; who was glorified with the Father before the world began, who is God over all, blessed for ever. John 15. That there is one Holy Spirit, the promise of the Father and the Son, and Leader, and Sanctifier, and Comforter of his people. 1 John 5. And we further believe, as the Holy Scriptures soundly and sufficiently express, that these Three are one, even the Father, the Word, and the Spirit."

Robert Barclay, in his Apology Vindicated, after denying the charge of agreeing with the Socinians, says: "For I freely acknowledge, according to the Scripture, that the Spirit of God proceedeth from the Father and the Son, and is God." Barclay's Works, London, fol. ed. 1691, page 745.

Geo. Whitehead, in his works, p. 195, says: "The Holy Scripture Trinity, or Three thereby meant, we never questioned, but believed; as also the unity of essence; that they are one substance, one divine infinite Being, and also we question not, but sincerely believe the relative properties of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, according to Holy Scripture testimony, Matt. 28, 29, and that these Three are One. 1 John 5, 7, 11.

The Act of Toleration passed in 1689, contained a profession of faith, drawn up by Geo. Whitehead, John Vaughton, W. Mead, and John Osgood, on behalf of the Society, which was as follows: "I profess faith in God, the Father, and in Jesus Christ, his Eternal Son, the true God, and in the Holy Spirit, one God, blessed for ever; and do acknowledge the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, to be given by divine inspiration." Gough's Hist. vol. iii. p. 234.

I could greatly enlarge the list of quotations, but I am willing to leave the subject for the present. The reader will perceive that I have not taken a few of the most obscure and incautious expressions which were to be found in the writings of our early Friends—that I have published nothing on the Trinity—nothing of the doctrine of distinctions, but what is clearly and fully expressed by almost every writer of eminence in the Society.

I am aware that the views which I have presented of the character of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the interest we have in him, is the great and principal cause of the hostility which has been manifested against me, and thus I may adopt the language, "The reproaches of them that reproached thee are fallen on me"—"for thy sake we are killed all the day long, we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter." But though I regret the existence of this state of things in what is called religious society—though I mourn over the condition of those who are denying the Lord that bought them, yet I am willing to bear my portion of the reproaches and sufferings of the present day. If, with Moses, we esteem the reproaches of Christ, greater riches than the treasures of Egypt, we may also remember, with consolation, the blessings pronounced on those who should be hated, and have their names cast out as evil, for the Son of man's sake.

(Concluded from page 141.)

During his last illness, which was a complication of diseases, he suffered much, especially from an asthmatic affection, which rendered his breathing laborious and painful, and at times prevented his lying down. Under these afflicting sensations he was ardently concerned that he might be preserved in patience, and in resignation to the Lord's will; remarking, that as he had not been tried with much bodily suffering through life, he feared his patience might not hold out to the end. This concern kept him so steadily on the watch, that he seldom made any complaint, meekly and calmly submitting to every dispensation of an all-wise Providence, however painful. Although his bodily weakness and infirmity was great, yet through divine mercy and understanding remained clear and collected until the close: his mind was preserved in quietude and holy confidence, trusting in the mercy and mediation of our adorable Redeemer, and looking forward to the period of his release from the pains and conflicts of time with a hope full of immortality and eternal life. The hour of death is emphatically styled, "an honest hour"—at this awful season dissimulation vanishes, and the great realities of the world to come force themselves on our view. Such a moment is calculated to try the foundation on which the Christian's hope for eternity rests, and in the instance of this dear friend we have another, added to that innumerable company of faithful witnesses that have laid down their lives in full assurance of salvation through the mediation and atonement of a crucified Saviour, "looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of their faith."

Throughout the whole course of his illness his confidence in the rectitude of the principles and doctrines he held, remained unshaken, and his mind appeared peaceful and satisfied in the retrospect of his endeavours to withstand the torrent of infidelity. He uttered many weighty and instructive expressions indicating the sweet and heavenly frame of his spirit, and gave much excellent advice to his children and others who attended upon him.

A few weeks previous to his decease, he addressed two of his children nearly as follows: viz.

"My dear children, I expect soon to leave you. I feel as though my time here would not be long, and the prospect is an agreeable one, though I should have been willing to have attended meetings a little longer with my friends, but it does not seem likely that I shall, and I think I may say with David, 'although my house be not so with God, yet he hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure,' and I believe I have witnessed that, which will enable me to adopt the language of the apostle; 'I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me, and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God.' I hope, dear children, you will be given up to do the Master's will; he hath done much for you, and is calling for faithfulness at your hands, thou in an especial manner, dear —, seeing thou hast been brought to join our Society, mayest thou stand firm in the truth, and faithfully discharge the duties which devolve upon thee. I have remembered the declaration of the Prophet; 'Strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your ploughmen and your vinedressers.'"

A few days after, he said to his eldest son, "I shall not be here long, and I do not know that I desire it. I feel peace of mind; I think I feel an assurance that enables me to say, 'I know that if my earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, I have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens;'" then turning to his daughter, added, "I speak not this boastingly, but for your encouragement."

About the same time he expressed his great desire that his children might be diligent in attending meetings; "and not go there and sit down in an unconcerned manner, but remember for what purpose they assembled, and honestly put the query, 'what lack I yet.'"

16th of 1st month, he said, "In seasons of desertion, which may be compared to the night, we must strive to keep on the watch, that our garments may not be defiled. There have been seasons in which I have felt much stripped and deserted; then I have endeavoured to keep in the patience; but when the dear Master has been pleased again to favour me with his presence, O how comforting! He said to his disciples formerly, 'My peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you; when this can be enjoyed, it is a balm for every thing.'"

20th. Speaking of the necessity he found for watching against an impatient disposition, he said, "one night, lying on my bed, being much oppressed by my breathing, and feeling little of that support which I have at times been favoured with, I thought my situation a trying one, but was soon led to take a view of the sufferings of our divine Master, when nailed to the cross, and my murmuring thoughts were silenced."

At another time in the night season, (as if in deep thought on this interesting theme,) he exclaimed, "what transcendent goodness! love unfathomable! he left the bosom of his Father, and took upon him the form of sinful man—endured all that they could inflict upon him for our sakes—even offered himself upon the cross for our sins, that we, through Him, might obtain salvation."

One evening, after being laid on the bed, finding himself much exhausted, he said, "I do not feel anxious whether I live to see the light of another day or not. I feel comfortable in mind, my peace is made; the grave will have no victory; it has been renewedly sealed to my understanding, I have heard, as it were, a voice, saying, 'Thy name is written in heaven!'"

24th. He remarked to a friend, that he believed the present difficulties in our society were permitted for our good, that our foundations might be tried—that it would not hurt those who were firmly established; but that which was built up of wood, hay, or stubble, the fire must consume.

A few days after, to a friend who came to see him, "My dear friend, I am glad to see thee; I believe thou hast many trials in being amongst us; but I have greatly desired thy encouragement, and that thou mayest stand firm through all—for although the enemy may seem to vaunt himself, his power is limited. The state of things here is very trying, but I believe it would have been even worse, but for the faithful labours of divers friends from your land, all speaking the same thing, united as the heart of one man." The friend remarking that the truth was worth suffering for, he replied, "Ay, it is so; I have suffered for it, and am willing to suffer." On taking leave of him, a desire was expressed that he might continue to the end in that comfortable state of mind, which he then enjoyed; he said, I hope it may be so, but I often feel very poor, and desire to have the prayers of the faithful."

4th of 2d month. His youngest son coming in, he said, "I am glad to see thee, my dear son: I desire that my children may dwell in love, and walk in the fear of the Lord; he has been my support through many and deep trials; he hath brought me out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock that was higher than I; and he hath put a new song into my mouth, even praise to his name."

He was frequently engaged in lively exercise on account of the state of our religious Society, and ardently concerned for the promotion of its real welfare. His solicitude for the preservation of a sound and living ministry amongst us was earnest and fervent, and he made some observations respecting it very near his close.

During the last three or four hours of his life, he said much, though frequently interrupted by great difficulty of breathing; he earnestly desired that those present might be given up to serve the Lord faithfully, saying it was a great consolation to him, that this had been his concern when young, and had continued to be his engagement through life, though oftentimes much in the cross to his natural inclination, yet in humble, simple obedience, he had found sweet peace. He remarked that a religious life was far preferable, even if there was no future state, as our evil propensities were thereby brought into subjection, and the mind enjoyed the comfortable feelings of kindness, meekness, and humility.

During the last conflict, he was engaged in reverent supplication, but the first part was not distinctly understood—he proceeded, "and, oh! grant that my patience may hold out to the end—that neither Jew nor Gentile may have any cause to speak evil of the truth on my account." Near the same time he said, "It is through tribulation that we enter into rest—we must fill up that which is behind of the sufferings of Christ, for the body's sake." Thus he continued uttering many sweet and heavenly expressions, until the power of speech had nearly failed, and he could no longer articulate distinctly—yet a harmonious sound proceeded from his dying lips, and a frequent repetition of "the Holy One" was clearly understood, until the accumulation of phlegm entirely obstructed his voice. Soon after which he quietly departed, in great serenity and composure of mind, about 10 o'clock in the evening of the 5th of 2d month, 1827. Aged about 78 years, a minister 54 years.

FOR THE FRIEND.

FRAGMENTS, No. 2.

John Camm and John Audlands. "These two ministers of Christ Jesus came to the city of Bristol in the 5th month, 1654. First they came amongst a seeking people who kept one day in the week in fasting and praying, waiting for and breathing in spirit after the moving and visitation of God and day of redemption. And amongst us they spoke the powerful word of life, in the dread of his name that lives for ever; and we were seized on and smitten even to the heart, and that day and the visitation of it overtook us, which we had longed and waited for; and from darkness to the marvellous light of the Lord we were turned. Some meetings we had before the more general gathering in and about the city, which began on this wise. On a first day in the morning I went with these two servants of God, about a mile and a half from the city, to a little spring of water, where I often had spent many solitary hours in my tender years, seeking the Lord, where we sat some time and drank of the spring. After some hours of the morning were spent, I saw in them a great travail in spirit. Trembling, J. A. said, "let us be going into the city." So we came to the street called Broadmead, to a house where were several people met together inquiring after these two men of God. J. Audland was under a great exercise of spirit, and said, 'Is there any one that has any interest in a field?' An ancient man said, 'I have a field pretty near.' Notice being given to the people in the house, they came forth, and as we went along, people in the streets went also to the field, called Earlsmead; so that we came a pretty number, were some seats or stools were brought. Dear John Camm began to speak tenderly and in great zeal, directing to the heavenly grace of God, and testifying against sin and iniquity fervently, to which some were attentive. In this season I perceived a great exercise on my dear friend and father in Christ Jesus, J. Audland, who very much trembled. After dear J. C. stood down, he stood up, full of dread and shining brightness on his countenance, lifted up his voice as a trumpet, and said, 'I proclaim spiritual war with the inhabitants of the earth, who are in the fall and separation from God, and prophesy to the four winds of heaven; and these words drop amongst the seed; and so went on in the mighty power of God Almighty, opening the way of life. But ah! the seizings of souls and prickings at heart, which attended that season! Some fell on the ground, others crying out under the sense of opening their states, which indeed gave experimental knowledge of what is recorded, Acts ii. 37. Indeed it was a notable day, worthy to be left on record, that our children may read and tell to their children and theirs to another generation, that the worthy noble acts of the arm of God's salvation may be remembered.'—C. Marshall's Works.

"John Goodwin, of Escaroggh, in Monmouthshire, lived and maintained his family on a farm of four pounds a year, but at length had purchased and improved it, so that at that time he reckoned it worth six pounds a year. The first journey he travelled in the ministry, which was to visit Friends through Wales, he had then got of clear money above forty shillings in all, and he was free to spend it, if there were occasion, in the Lord's service, knowing that he could give him, or enable him to get more. The first time he began to entertain travelling Friends, most of that meeting being gone to Pennsylvania, he had but one bed, which he left to them, he and his wife taking up their lodging in the stable."—Crouch's Memoirs.

Thomas Chalkley. "When I was in Barbadoes, P. M., who accompanied me from Bridgetown to counsellor Week's, told me, that when I was in the island before, he and I had some discourse concerning the use of the sword; he then (not being of our society) wore a sword, but now had left it off and his business also, which was worth some hundreds a year. I had reminded him of Christ's words, that those who take the sword should perish with the sword. And 'resist not evil; and if any smite thee on one cheek, turn the other also.' Love enemies, do good to them that hate you, pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you. After I had used these arguments, he asked me, if one came to kill me, would I not kill rather than be killed? I told him no; so far as I new my own heart, I had rather be killed than kill. He said that was strange, and desired to know what reason I could give for it. I told him, that being innocent, if I were killed in my body, my soul might be happy; but if I killed him, he dying in his wickedness, would consequently be unhappy; and if I were killed he might live to repent; but if I killed him, he would have no time to repent; so that if he killed me, I should have much the better, both in respect to myself and him. This discourse had made so much impression, and so affected him, that he said, he could not but often remember it. And when we parted at Bridgetown, we embraced each other, in open arms of Christian love, far from that which would hurt or destroy."

George Fox the younger, while preaching in a meeting at Dunstable, on the 5th of the third month, 1658, was violently opposed by John Tokely, who, in his rage and fury, came towards him with a drawn sword; but when he saw that George faced him without fear, he retired and brought a loaded gun, which he fired at him, and the shot passed over his head; but George continued preaching, unmoved at so great danger, which the persecutor observing, cried out from the force of sudden conviction, "your faith is strong," and left the meeting.

1659. Stephen Crisp, as he was preaching in a meeting at York, was by the mayor and two aldermen violently pulled down, and haled out with their own hands, and Ann Bell, a citizen's wife, was dragged by them on the ground. Then they took the key of the meeting house door by force out of a man's pocket, and caused the doors to be shut up. With like violence were John Whitehead and others abused, being sore beaten and having their clothes torn. On the first day following, musqueteers were sent to keep them out, who knocked down George Preston as he attempted to go in. On the 8th of the second month following, Friends being met in their own hired house, were haled out of doors without distinction of age or sex, panned and abused, and all the forms and seats were broken up. In the following year a watch was set at York for the purpose of keeping the Quakers out of the city, and one Simon Rider refusing to watch or hire, on that account was sent to prison.

The striking resemblance of these occurrences to the scenes which have been recently passing within the same society in this country, is obvious. It could not have been expected, that in the nineteenth century Friends should be forcibly deprived of their meeting houses in the manner they have been; that the keys should be violently wrested from them, as was the case at Radnor, and a guard stationed to keep them from entering their own meeting house for the purpose of transacting the church affairs on the regular day of holding their stated meetings. Still less could it have been anticipated that such occurrences would take place in the state of Pennsylvania, the asylum for persecuted Quakers, founded by the liberal and enlightened William Penn, and famous for its just sense of religious and civil rights.

John Exham, of Charleville, in the county of Cork, was convinced of the truth whilst a soldier about the year 1658, and being faithful to its divine requisitions, he received a gift in the ministry, and became zealously concerned to visit the small gatherings of Friends in those early days. In the 81st year of his age he manifested the fervour and constancy of his love to the brethren and the blessed cause he had long advocated; by paying a religious visit to the greatest part of the families of Friends throughout Ireland. He was furnished with a spirit of discernment, often speaking very pertinently to the conditions of those he visited. The great house of the Earl of Orrery, situate in the town where he lived, was a splendid edifice, frequently resorted to by numerous visitors; on one occasion, when a large company of great men were assembled there, spending their time in feasting and mirth, John Exham had an impulse on his mind to go to the house, and call the people there met to repentance, which he accordingly did, and denounced the Lord's judgments and wo to that great house, and that it should be destroyed, and become an habitation for the fowls of the air. Hereupon the servants attempted to drive him away, but the earl commanded them to let the honest man speak. Having delivered his message, he went away, but in a little time returned, and calling for the earl, said to him, "because thou hast been kind and loving to the servant of the Lord, the evil shall not be in thy days." The event answered the prediction; for in the late war, after the decease of the earl, the house was destroyed by fire, and the birds built their nests in the ruins. John Exham died 1721, in the 92d year of his age, having been a minister 60 years, and retained his zeal and integrity to the last.

1683. Elizabeth Stirredge. "Our keeper put us into the common jail with the felons. And truly it was a most dismal place, where we had neither stock nor stone to sit upon, nor any resting place to lean against but the black stone wall, covered with soot, and the damp cold ground to lie upon. But before we lay down, three of our friends who were prisoners in the adjoining room, put through the grates to us four chaff pillows and two blankets and a little straw, whereon we lay down like a flock of sheep in a pen, in that very cold winter that we have never had the like since I had a remembrance; when most of us took our rest very sweetly. But when I lay down in that dismal place, it came into my heart a consideration of these things, saying in my heart, 'Lord, thou knowest for what we are exposed to this hardship; it is because we cannot betray our testimony, nor wrong our conscience, nor deal treacherously with our own souls. And seeing it is so, Lord, be thou our comfort in this needful time; for it is thy presence that makes hard things easy and bitter things sweet; and thou hast sweetened the waters of a bitter cup. Oh! thou Physician of value, that can strengthen both soul and body, be with us this night, and all the nights and days that we have to live in this world.' Then the Lord was pleased to open my heart unto him, and to fill it with his living mercy and comfortable presence, inasmuch that it overflowed my whole heart, that I could have sung aloud of the goodness of the Lord and of his mercies and blessings bestowed upon us. But looking over my fellow prisoners, and seeing them so sound asleep, I did forbear to open my mouth. In the morning there came many people to the prison door to see how many of us were dead with our hard fare: some of them were sure, as they said, that I was dead, for I looked as if I would not live until the morning. But finding us all alive and well, they said, 'surely we were the people of God, if there were any.' That being the first day, we had a meeting in the prison, and many friends came there, when we had a very good meeting, and the good presence of the Lord was with us and filled our hearts with joy and gladness, inasmuch that I was constrained to praise the name of the Lord and magnify his power, and to testify in the hearing of many people, that we were so far from repenting our coming there, that we had great cause to give glory, honours, and praises to the Lord God of heaven and earth, for that he had found us worthy to suffer for his name and truth; for his powerful presence was with us, and sanctified our afflictions, and made the prison like a palace unto us, and would not change our state for all the glory of the world, if it were proffered unto us."

FOR THE FRIEND.

(Concluded from page 142.)

The followers of Elias Hicks, when the inconsistency of their opinions with the testimony of the Holy Scriptures and the writings of our ancient Friends, has been so clearly demonstrated, as to render it obvious to every unprejudiced and intelligent mind, commonly resort to one of two expedients—1st, either to deny the importance of doctrines altogether, or 2dly, to contend that the Society of Friends never have had any settled codes of doctrines, or any positive written declarations of their belief.

The work under review completely exposes the falsity of the last assumption, by copious evidence.

As early as the year 1658, and but ten years after the commencement of George Fox's ministry, Richard Farnsworth published a "Confession and Profession of Faith in God, by his people, who are in scorn called Quakers."

Thomas Evans has noticed upwards of twenty treatises, written by various friends previous to the year 1700, expressly designed to set forth the doctrines of the Society, and many of them in the form of confessions of faith.

We are aware that it has been alleged that many of these declarations are from individual members of the Society, and that the body was not, and is not accountable for the doctrines which they contain. That the sentiments of our ancient Friends were different and even discordant, and that individuals were at liberty to publish doctrinal works without the supervision or control of any church authority—these various allegations the "Exposition" shows to be without any foundation. We shall presently make quotations, which will demonstrate, that our ancient Friends neither professed discordant and contradictory opinions, nor permitted them to be published in their name: that they exercised supervision over the doctrines, the conduct, and writings of those who pretended to speak or act as Quakers, and that the avowed object of this exemplary concern was to preserve a consistency of faith and profession in the society. It is indeed difficult to imagine, how any person, who approves of religious association at all, can suppose that any body of people, professing to be in unity, can permit its members to promulgate, in its name and as its doctrines, sentiments entirely opposite and contradictory. If there is no unity of faith and practice, no order, no church discipline or control; if every member can preach and write whatever he pleases, it requires little discernment to perceive, that such an association can expect nothing but turmoil and confusion, during its existence, and a speedy dissolution of its ill assorted and incongruous materials. Upon the principle that doctrines are of no importance, and that the church ought to exercise no control, nor expect any consistency or uniformity of faith from its members,—the humble disciple of a crucified Saviour—the hardy contemner of his divine character and offices—the reverent believer in rewards and punishments—the bold denier of a future state—the friend of good order and the wild anarchist and ranter, might be banded together in the same society, bearing the same name and title. But our worthy predecessors never confounded right with wrong, nor religious liberty with irreligious libertinism.

It was a settled order of the society, almost coeval with its first establishment, that all books and papers written upon the doctrines of the Society, should be submitted for inspection and revision, either to the second day morning's meeting, or the meeting for sufferings in London; and thus it was, that many books, which, without a knowledge of this circumstance, we might suppose to belong merely to individuals, in reality became the official acts and declarations of the Society.

Amongst the works which were thus submitted and approved were those invaluable treatises of Robert Barclay, entitled the Apology, &c. and the Anarchy of the Ranters."

It is a fact well worthy of observation, that although the former of these is a systematic and official exposition of the faith of the Society, and the latter a complete and acknowledged compendium of the nature and character of its church government, yet that neither of these works have found much favour in the eyes of the separatists. In the various pamphlets of garbled extracts from the writings of early Friends which they have published, the "Apology" is very sparingly and reluctantly quoted, and the Anarchy, as far as my knowledge extends, has been passed by entirely without notice or remark.

The "Anarchy of the Ranters," was submitted to and approved by the Morning Meeting as early as 1676. It also appears that a certain William Rogers being dissatisfied with the principles it contained, circulated a reply in manuscript without the approbation of the Morning Meeting, for which act he was disowned from the Society. This testimony of disownment was signed by thirty-three Friends, amongst whom were William Penn, Stephen Crisp, and T. Ellwood. It is exceedingly clear and explicit in its character, representing the conduct of Rogers as being "contrary to all rules of brotherly love, christian fellowship, gospel order, and exemplary practice of the church of Christ, to the defamation of the said Robert Barclay, the great derogation from the christian authority of the said meeting, and the general disservice of truth, &c."

This case of disownment, and another, the history of which we shall defer to a subsequent number, are highly important. If there was not another world extant in the writings of any ancient Friend with regard to the authority and practice of the Society, they would establish the following important conclusions:—first, that the Society had a settled code of doctrines and discipline: second, that a consistency both of faith and practice was required of its members: and thirdly, that where the principles were denied, or the established order of the Society violated, that a disownment from religious communion was the certain result.

The following notions of the followers of Elias Hicks, which they attempt to represent as co-incidental with the principles of the early Quakers, are also completely done away.

1st. That no uniformity of faith ought to be required in the Society, and that where a profession of love and of a belief in internal light are avowed, the utmost latitude of thought and speech with regard to the great plan of christian redemption may be tolerated and allowed.

2dly. That a watchful care over doctrines of ministers, and the publications from the press on doctrinal subjects, are oppressive and unnecessary in the true church; and 3dly. That ancient Friends permitted different doctrines and different practices to prevail amongst them without any check or restraint, without any interruption of the harmony of society, or any disownments from its communion.

We will conclude the present number with two rules of discipline, (confirmatory of these views,) which T. Evans has given us in the Exposition, viz.

"The ancient and approved practice of our religious society, respecting the revision of manuscripts by the Second day's morning meeting, and the minutes on that subject having been considered, it is the judgment of this meeting, that the said practice be invariably observed, viz. that no books concerning the principles of Friends be printed, without being carefully read, and corrected if necessary, by the Morning Meeting in London."

"That the meeting for sufferings take the care of inspecting, ordering, regulating the press and printing of books; and in whatever inatter relating to the printing of books the country Friends find themselves aggrieved, that they write to the said meeting, who are to redress the same, and that no books be printed without the said meeting's direction." 1671, 1672.

(To be continued.)

The Christian loves all mankind, yet he stands in a nearer relation, and bears an especial brotherly love to all who are partakers of the gospel. This regard is not confined within the pale of a denomination, but is extended to all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. He rejoices in the image of God wherever he sees it, and in the work of God wherever it is carried on. Though tenacious of the truths which the Lord hath taught him, his heart is open to those who differ from him in less essential points, and allows to others that right of private judgment which he claims for himself, and is disposed to hold communion with all those who hold the head. He cannot indeed countenance those who set aside the one foundation which God hath laid in Zion, and maintain errors derogatory to the honour of his Saviour, or subversive of the faith and experience of his people, yet he wishes well to their persons, pities and prays for them, and is ready in meekness to instruct those that oppose; but there is no bitterness in his zeal, being sensible that railery and invective are dishonourable to the cause of truth, and quite unsuitable in the mouth of a sinner, who owes all that distinguishes him from the vilest of men, to the free grace of God. In a word, he is influenced by the wisdom from above, which, as it is pure, is likewise gentle and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good works, without partiality, and without hypocrisy.—Newton's Letters.

FOR THE FRIEND.

The following little piece, from the Talisman, though of the lighter cast, is certainly beautiful, and in infancy, perhaps, not often excelled.

To be born with the spring, and to die with the rose,
To sip the fresh sweets of young flowers, ere they close,

To float on the wings of the zephyr at even,
And bathe in the rich flood of glory from heaven,
To shake from the wing the light spangles of gold,
And its course to the deep vaults of azure to hold;
Passing off from the bosom of each like a sigh,
Such is the magical life of a young butterfly.

It resembles Desire, which, in search of new sweets,
Alights on each object of beauty it meets,
But restless, unsated with bliss of the earth,
It returns to the heaven from whence it had birth.

FOR THE FRIEND.

The obstinate spirit of litigation displayed in the following train of proceedings, is, perhaps, a match for any thing to be found in jurisprudence, either in this, or any other country. It is taken from the United States' Law Journal, vol. i. page 491.

Pardee vs. Blackford. 19 Johns. Rep. page 402. The plaintiff was travelling on a turnpike road, in a sort of non-descript one horse vehicle, between a cart and a wagon; and, coming to a toll-gate, the defendant, who was the keeper, demanded twelve and a half cents; insisting that the carriage was a pleasure carriage, and, according to the rates of toll established by law, was consequently liable to the payment of that sum. This the plaintiff disputed; contending that it was a farm carriage, a vehicle of burden, and was liable to the payment of only six cents. But the defendant refusing to let him pass, he paid the sum demanded, and afterwards brought an action against the defendant, in a justice's court, for taking illegal toll; in which action he declared for the penalty of twenty-five dollars; that being the penalty which the laws of New York have in such case provided. The cause was tried by a jury, who, being of opinion that the carriage had been erroneously classed by the defendant, found a verdict against him; and the justice, thereupon, rendered judgment in the plaintiff's favour, for the penalty in question. Upon this judgment, the defendant brought a certiorari, as the course is in the state of New York, to have it reversed; and the supreme court of that state, before whom the certiorari was made returnable, thinking that the jury was mistaken, reversed it. The defendant was as little satisfied with this decision, as the plaintiff had before been with that of the jury, and brought his writ of error returnable in the New York court for the trial of impeachments and correction of errors, where it was determined that the jury was right, and this reversed the judgment of the supreme court.

Here is a case, in which the original dispute was about six cents, carried through all the courts of the state of New York, from the lowest to the highest, occupying probably several days in its discussion, and finally settled by an assemblage of the lieutenant governor, chancellor, judges of the supreme court, and senators of New York. Who can tell what money was spent in its progress? What bickerings and feuds it gave rise to? What loss of time, and interruption to more serious affairs? Well might the wise man say, The beginning of strife is as when one letteth out water; therefore leave off contention before it be meddled with. Prov. xvii. 14.

The point settled is thus detailed. The act of April 1st, 1800, allows the toll gatherer on the north branch of the Seneca turnpike, to take for every chair or pleasure carriage, with one horse, twelve and a half cents; for every one horse cart, six cents. A light one horse wagon, painted on the outside in imitation of pannel work, made with a frame, and boards bent in the inside, the bolster crooked, but no springs, and the seat a common chair on wooden springs, with a skin thrown over it, adapted to go to mill, or to carry passengers, and other purposes, with two persons in the wagon, a trunk, band box, bag of oats, and bottle, is not a one horse chair or pleasure carriage, within the act, but a one horse cart, for which six cents only are demandable. H.

What majesty is there in the Christian's death! What a glory in his hope! As the rivers roll the smoothest the nearer they approach the ocean; as the rose smells the sweetest when dying; as the sun appears more glorious when setting; so it is with the Christian.

It is a singular fact, that the value of iron annually produced in England, greatly exceeds the value of the silver annually produced in Peru.—Lond. Lit. Gazette.

FOR THE FRIEND:
THE WALDENSES.

A simple race
Of mountaineers, by nature's self removed
From foul temptation.

In a remote corner of Italy, the small valleys interspersed among the Alps have for ages furnished subsistence to a people, whose history develops traits which have strong claims upon our admiration and sympathy. In a former article we have alluded to the probable origin of the Valdenses as a christian sect, and although there be striking evidence* adduced to prove their existence from primitive times a church, untainted by the superstition of Rome, yet as certainty cannot on this subject be had, it is not now necessary to pursue the inquiry. It is enough that during the darkest periods of christian history, they have preserved with singular purity the doctrines of our religion, and have thus happily illustrated the motto from time immemorial displayed on their escutcheon, which bears a torch and seven stars environed by darkness, and the words "Lux lucet in tenebris"—the light shineth in darkness. One of the most singular and interesting features in their history, is the concurrent testimony of all who have visited them, both friends and enemies, to the purity of their lives and the simplicity of their characters. A legate of the Pope who was sent into the valleys in the 12th century, while enumerating the causes which led to their estrangement from the church, has unintentionally drawn a fine picture of a devout and simple hearted community—"It is because the men and women, the young and old, the labourer and the learned man do not cease to instruct themselves; because they have translated the Old and New Testament into the vulgar tongue and learn these books by heart and teach them; because if scandal be committed among them it inspires them with horror; so that when they see any one leading an irregular life, they say to him, 'The Apostles did not live so, neither should we who would imitate the Apostles.' In short, they look upon all that a teacher advances unsupported by the New Testament as fabulous."

Sheltered by the lofty mountains which surrounded them, the Valdenses seem to have remained for ages unnoticed, and almost unknown. The scantiness of the subsistence which was gained with difficulty from a sterile soil, compelled them to frugality and industry—the danger to which they were exposed among the precipices of the Alps, the superior purity of their faith, and their affectionate attachment to their pastors, rendered them devout: and what if we should add that the beautiful and sublime scenes with which it was associated in those wild regions must have contributed to cherish feelings of reverence for their simple worship, which left them little taste for the gorgeous forms of the Roman Church? The influence of their pastors, who were supported partly by their own labour, and partly by the voluntary contributions of their flock, seem to have been happily employed to maintain sound faith, pure morals, and the kindest feelings. Litigation was unknown in the valleys, and charity in the most extended sense, was a virtue which, where all were equally exposed to sudden ruin, was practised equally by all. Such were the devoted inhabitants of the valleys of Piedmont; and if the practice of the christian virtues could have availed to save them from destruction, the light which had so long shone in the midst of darkness might have sent forth its rays over the half of Europe. No sooner, however, was the papal power completely established, than the attention of the inquisition was directed to this heresy. From the private arrest of individuals, whose fate was never known, the Roman court proceeded to open war. Animated by spiritual and temporal stimulants, army after army marched to the invasion of the valleys; and though often repelled by the courageous resistance of their victims, the attacks were renewed with a frequency which thinned their numbers, and would have destroyed the energy of less hardy or less devout communities. On these occasions the Vaudois were accustomed to retire to the caves and fastnesses of the Alps, inaccessible to their less experienced persecutors, and often by sudden incursions did they drive back their terrified foes, and recover for a time the possession of their dwellings. In these flights, however, their sufferings were dreadful—the naked rock or more often a bank of snow was the resting place of delicate women, of helpless infancy, and decrepid age—the hidden precipice, the whirlwind or the avalanche swept away numbers of the unhappy wanderers, while the fate of those who thus perished was happiness compared with that which awaited their brethren, who fell into the hands of their merciless enemies. Wearied at length with this unprofitable conquest, or moved by the entreaties of his wife, their sovereign the Duke of Savoy, consented to a treaty, by which they were to be allowed the enjoyment of their own forms of worship. Yet four years after, banishment was again imposed as a penalty on all those who refused to attend mass. The intercession of protestant government could only avail to postpone for a time the execution of these decrees. But in the year 1655, notwithstanding the urgent supplications of the destined victims, a large force was sent into the valleys, and in the depth of winter no less than one thousand families were driven to "the shelterless recesses of the Alpine heights." The commander of the invading army feigning to wish for conciliation, offered terms which were joyfully acceded to by the simple Vaudois; but no sooner had they returned to their dwellings than a massacre was commenced, which has scarcely a parallel in the annals of barbarous nations. It was on the occasion of this massacre that Milton wrote his well known sonnet?—

Avenge, oh Lord! thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold, &c. &c.

Still was the courage of the Vaudois undebated, the survivors retreating to the mountains kept up a partizan warfare, which at length wrung from their enemies a reluctant peace. Their hopes however were not long to be indulged. In 1685, at the instance of Louis XIV. the Duke of Savoy issued a decree, commanding the Vaudois to renounce their faith on pain of banishment and death. Surprised but not unprepared, the protestants of the valleys determined to adhere to their ancient worship, and to defend themselves after the manner of their forefathers. Aided by the French monarch, the Duke sent a large army to compel their submission. This force was repeatedly driven back, and would perhaps have ultimately failed, had not the Vaudois suddenly agreed to surrender on promise of being suffered to leave their native land. Such, however, was not the design of their implacable enemies. The entire population, amounting to 14,000, were thrown into dungeons, from which only 3000 escaped with their lives, on condition of perpetual banishment. Their possessions were divided among the invaders, while the wanderers taking refuge among the Swiss Cantons, were received with the greatest tenderness by the professors of a common faith. "Scattered among the towns and villages of Berne, industrious in their habits and venerated and beloved by their protectors, the survivors might have led a life of comfort, had they not been rendered restless by the love of their native country, so peculiarly strong in mountaineers." The hope of returning to their beloved valleys was ever before them, and by a little band of the fugitives, this cherished hope was destined to be realized. But we must reserve

THE LION HUNT.

We shall close our extracts with an animated description of a Lion Hunt.

"Our party was formed into two divisions. S., R., and ourselves, were to cross the plain about the centre, and beat for him amongst the grass.—Diedrick was our leader. The other party were to skirt the base of the mountain, about which grew a few tall mimosas, and to keep in an even line with us, about half a mile distant. The mountains seemed to meet just before us, but as we approached we saw a pretty wide opening through which we passed, when another valley or plain of similar character, but of much greater extent, was presented to our view. Here all animated nature seemed collected, and to reign unmolested! The signal was, however, soon given, that man the destroyer was approaching, and all the various animals, with snorts and bounds, began to collect in bodies, gnooks, harte-beests, quaggas, spring bucks, and roe bucks. The gnook is the animal so well described by Barrow, the existence of which was but a very few years ago disputed. They run sluggishly at first, but at once they spring out, whisk their long tails about, and with their heads to the ground, defy their pursuers. Their dusky colour and bushy heads give them a strange appearance. A considerable herd of these animals now lay in our path, as we still kept about the same distance from the base of the hills, which here and there were sprinkled with mimosas. It was determined to employ our time until the other division came parallel to us, by endeavouring to get a shot at the gnooks. We put our horses at speed, and as each of those who had guns came pretty near, they dismounted and fired, loaded, and then chased again. Owing to this, we, as well as the herd, became separated. S. had chased in the direction of the mimosas, trenching on the ground which our comrades were to take; he was getting closer to the object, and was about to dismount a second time, when his eyes glanced on the long wished for game—an enormous lion! He was walking majestically slow—but when S. gave the tallyho to us, he couched, and seemed inclined to wait, but soon afterwards cantered off to the mimosas."

"In a few seconds we were all up, at least our division. The first object was to prevent him from climbing the mountain, we therefore rode through the mimosas, about three hundred yards from where he had entered, and got between him and the heights. Diedrick Muller, and S. with their servants and led horses, then rode round the little grove, whilst we were stationed where we first entered. The grove was hardly five hundred yards in length, and twenty in breadth; consequently we could by this arrangement command the whole of it. True to our engagement, as well as heartily wishing their assistance, we waited for the other party. The other part of our division having rode round the grove, came up opposite to us, but at a distance, and as we saw them dismount, we did the same. Our situation was not very enviable; we had but one large gun, but Rennie, who carried it, was perfectly collected. We were talking to each other rather in a whisper, when Rennie very coolly said, "Listen, the gentleman is grumbling." The sound was so very like distant thunder, that we doubted it, but at the same moment I caught a glimpse of the lion walking away not a hundred and fifty yards from us, and he must have been previously still nearer to us than we had calculated. I gave the alarm, which was echoed to our friends, who in an instant mounted and rode up to the lower end, calling upon us to advance. We were moving down to gain a position on a little height, when a gun was fired, followed by four more. This convinced us our other division had joined.

We thought there would have been an end to our sport before it had well begun; but on the contrary, the shots were fired not only to prevent him leaving the copse, but to prove their guns, for a miss-fire is frequently of consequence. The last shot had the effect of turning him, and we now had a full view of him returning to the centre, whisking his tail about, and treading among the smaller bushes as if they had been grass, reminding us most forcibly of the paintings we had seen of this majestic animal.

The last shot, however, had convinced us that our position was not safe, for the ball passed very near us. We called to inform the party of this, and they resolved on another plan of attack. They desired us to station two Hottentots on a hill above our position, and we were to join them. We crossed again through the bush, and it was then determined that we were all to dismount, and tie our horses together, and then to advance on foot. This is the usual plan, and it is done to secure any person from galloping off by his horse taking fright or otherwise, which would induce the lion to pursue, and thus one or other might be sacrificed. We hardly had begun to tie our horses, when the Hottentots stationed on the hill, cried out that the lion was running off at the lower end, where he had attempted to escape before. We were on horseback in a second, but the lion had got ahead; we had him however in full view, as there was nothing to intercept it. Off he scampered.—The Tambookus who had just come up, and mixed amongst us, could scarcely clear themselves of our horses, and their dogs howling and barking—we hallooing—the lion still in full view, making for a small copse, about a mile distant—and the number and variety of the antelopes on our left, scouring off in different directions, formed one of the most animating spectacles the annals of sporting could produce. Diedrick and S. being on a very spirited horse, were the foremost, and we wondered to see them pass on in a direction different from the copse where we had seen the lion take covert. Christian gave us the signal to dismount when we were, as well as could be judged, about two hundred yards from the copse. He desired us to be quick in tying the horses, which was done as fast as each came up. And now the die was cast—there was no retreating. We were on lower ground than the lion, with not a bush around us. Diedrick and S. had now turned their horses, for as we afterwards learned, they had been run off with in consequence of their bridles having broken. The plan was to advance in a body, leaving our horses with the Hottentots, who were to keep their backs towards the lion, fearing they should become unruly at the sight of him."

"All these preparations occupied but a few seconds, and they were not completed, when we heard him growl, and imagined he was making off again—but no—as if to retrieve his character from suspicion of cowardice for former flight, he had made up his mind in turn to attack us. To the growl succeeded a roar, and in the same instant we saw him bearing down upon us, his eye-balls glistening with rage. We were unprepared; his motion was so rapid, no one could take aim, and he furiously darted at one of our horses, whilst we were at their heads, without a possibility of preventing it. The poor horse sprung forward, and with the force of the action, wheeled all the horses round with him. The lion likewise wheeled, but immediately couched at less than ten yards from us. Our left flank thus became exposed, and on it fortunately stood C. Muller and Rennie. What an anxious moment! For a few seconds we saw the monster at this little distance, resolving, as it were, on whom he should first spring. Never did I long so ardently to hear the report of a gun. We looked at them aiming, and then at the lion. It was absolutely necessary to give a mortal blow, or the consequences might perhaps be fatal to some one of the party. A second seemed a minute. At length Christian fired;—the underjaw of the lion dropped—blood gushed from his mouth, and he turned round with a view to escape. Rennie then shot him through the spine, and he fell. At this moment he looked grand beyond expression. Turning again towards us, he rose upon his fore feet—his mouth bleeding, his eyes flashing vengeance. He attempted to spring at us—but his hind legs denied him assistance: he dragged them a little space, when Stephanas put a final period to his existence, by shooting him through the brain. He was a noble animal—measuring nearly twelve feet from the nose to the tip of the tail. Diedrick and S. at this crisis rejoined us, and eagerly inquired if all were safe. They had seen the lion bear down upon us, and they thought it impossible but that one of us must have suffered. The anxiety now was to learn whose horse had been the victim, and it was soon announced that it was a highly valued one of poor Diedrick's. The lion's teeth had pierced quite through the lower part of the thigh; he afterwards died of his wounds."

MISSION OF MADURA.

Of the innumerable missionaries sent out by the Catholic church into all parts of the heathen world, the Jesuits, before the fall of their society, proved themselves, on all occasions, the most enterprising and successful. The implicit obedience exacted by their rules to the supreme authority, gave a unity to their efforts which could not but greatly promote the accomplishment of their purposes; especially as this obedience was not merely a cold assent of the judgment, nor a submission of weakness to power, but a surrender of the whole heart and soul to the general welfare; so that each individual, while labouring in unison with his fellows, and by the command of his superior, exerted himself with all that vigour and constancy, which ordinarily flow from self-interest alone. To the advantages which their cause derived from this uniform direction, and zealous display of their energies, was added a peculiar adaptation of talent to missionary pursuits, acquired by a long course of study, to which their novitiate was usually subjected in the schools or colleges of the order. Their establishments in the interior of Southern India, which for the sake of convenient description, are embraced in this narrative under the general title of the Mission of Madura, exhibited in the principles upon which they were founded, and the manner in which they were conducted, an example of skilful policy, of courageous and persevering enterprise, of assiduous, self-denying, laborious application, which required but the foundation of a purer faith, and perhaps more exalted motives, to rank with the noblest efforts ever made to ameliorate the condition of the human race.

After long experience, and a vast expense of labour, the Jesuits of India had at length ceased to hope for the general reception of Christianity in those parts of the country, in which commercial or warlike intercourse had rendered the manners and habits of Europeans familiar to the natives. They had succeeded in making many converts in various places along the coast; but the number was small compared with the whole mass of the population, and consisting almost exclusively of persons belonging to the lowest orders, or of outcasts from the higher, contained within itself the strongest impediments to its farther extension.

The prejudices of caste have an influence over the minds of the Hindoos, which is almost inconceivable by those who have not dwelt among them. Even between those classes which most nearly approximate in rank, no intimate domestic intercourse can exist; and the two extremes of the scale are more widely separated than man from the inferior animals. Cows and monkeys are objects of respect if not of worship to the Brahmins; but the miserable Pariah is their scorn and abhorrence; his sight is loathsome; his touch is pollution; his society is degradation and eternal infamy. The sentiments of the Brahmins are shared by the other castes in a degree proportionate to their respective elevation. All regard the Pariahs as an inferior order of beings, to mingle with whom is to sink to their level, and to incur the contempt and avoidance of associates, friends, and even relatives. The pride, and worldly interests, and dearest affections of the Hindoos were therefore enlisted against a religion, which not only received this despised people into its bosom, but in its ordinances and promises made no distinction between them and the most exalted of their countrymen. The Portuguese themselves, having, through ignorance of the institutions of India, admitted the Pariahs into social as well as religious fellowship, became, in the minds of the natives, identified with this tribe; and their habits of living, their disregard of the fantastic rules of cleanliness inculcated by the Brahminical superstition, their worse than cannibal fondness for the sacred flesh of the ox, contributed still further to their supposed degradation. It is true that their power rendered them terrible; but the dread which was thus added to disgust, served but to increase the aversion with which their religion was regarded; as the reptile which is only loathed for its form, is shunned with horror for the venom of its fangs. Other Europeans had not been less inattentive, in their habits and associations, to the native prejudices, than the Portuguese. All were therefore ranked in the same class; and the name of Feringee,* though connected with superior skill and indomitable courage, was, among the pagans of Hindostan, another word for all that was sacrilegious in conduct and contemptible in manners.

Convinced that these prejudices must constitute an insurmountable obstacle to the general diffusion of their faith, wherever their real origin might be known, the Jesuits conceived the project of throwing off the European dress and character, penetrating into the interior provinces, and presenting themselves to the natives as Brahmins of a new sect, come from the North to teach them the law of the true God. They might thus at once free themselves from all those embarrassments in which they had been involved by the injudicious conduct of their predecessors; might claim, and, if their assumed character should be well supported, might receive the respect and observance due to the most favoured caste; and having obtained full scope for the exercise of their peculiar powers in directing and controlling the minds of their fellow-men, might look forward without presumption to the establishment of their creed, and with it the permanent influence of their order throughout the country. This plan seems to have been formed about the middle of the 17th century; and was carried into effect with all the cautious and insinuating, yet persevering policy, which has ever been a prominent trait among the disciples of Loyola.

The interior of the southern portion of the Peninsula, having never yet submitted to the Mogul power, was divided among a number of petty heathen princes, and preserved the institutions and customs of the Hindoos in greater purity than they were found in most other parts of India. As the inhabitants had little communication with the coast, and knew Europeans only by reputation, they were not likely to detect the proposed imposition, supported, as it was to be, by the skilful zeal of Jesuits. Madura was selected as the first scene of the enterprise; and the fathers who arrived at the station, singly, and at considerable intervals, were chiefly Portuguese: but when experience had proved the practicability of the scheme, and the labour began to thicken on their hands, they were joined by recruits from France, Italy, and other Catholic countries of Europe; and the mission was gradually extended to the neighbouring territories of Macava, Mysore, and the Carnatic.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF MERCY.

[Concluded.]

Such was the commencement of the Misericordia, a society that has never relaxed in its zeal, through so many centuries, and under all the changes of government. Whatever enemy entered Florence, these Brothers and their property were always respected. The French, their last invaders, did more,—they entrusted them with a set of keys to the city-gates, that they might not be impeded in their labours; and Napoleon was preparing to establish a similar institution at Paris, when his own downfall put an end to the scheme.

After Piero's death, the porters were desirous of hiring an apartment, where they might hold the meetings of their new society. For this purpose, as their funds were inefficient, they appealed to their fellow-citizens, and placed at the door of the Baptistery a painting of a dead Christ, with the box at the foot of it, bearing this inscription,—“Fate elemosine per i poveri infermi e bisognosi della città.” It was on a 13th of January, and the people, eager to evince their gratitude, and to encourage them, flocked from all quarters to that church-door with their alms; and before the day ended, the box could not contain the offerings, so that the money lay heaped on the lid. From this contribution, more than one apartment was purchased, not hired; and the porters continued unweariedly in their works of benevolence, till at the end of a few years the Archbishop convened them before him, and blessed them. The benediction was “in honour and glory of the most Holy Virgin, and of St. Peter Martyr, and of St. John the Baptist, and in reverence of St. Tobias, their Protector; and masses were ordained, with litanies and prayers, for the souls of all benefactors to the institution.” How agreeable to read of an Archbishop's exercising his divinity in the cause of humanity!

The porters would by no means consent to admit the other workmen of the city; upon which the latter formed a separate society of their own. They were afterwards united together, under the title of “La Compagnia della Misericordia,” on the 2d of October, 1423, and governed by eight Captains, a Notary, and a Purveyor. It also appears that during the contentions of the Guelph and Ghibellini, the society experienced a slight division, which however soon ceased,—a rivalry in deeds of pure good-will could not but allay the fury of party spirit.

No men ever deserved the gratitude of their country more than these Brothers, for their conduct in the times of the plague. Florence was visited by this scourge no less than eleven times in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. At some of those periods, especially in 1348, as many as six hundred persons died, day after day, within the walls. There is undeniable evidence,* in the archives of the institution, confirming Landini's account of the intrepidity of the Brothers, at every several period when the black banners were unfurled at the “Tribunale di Sanità.” They bore the sick to the hospitals, and the dead to the sepulchres; and as they journeyed through the streets, they were preceded by one ringing a bell, warning the people to escape from their approach, lest the infection should be spread by them, while they dared it for the welfare of the community. Notwithstanding their exposure to infection, it appears they suffered in a less degree, proportionably to their numbers, than the more cautious citizens. This is a proof that a sound courage is the best preservative against the plague, as well as against every other species of disease; and it gives me pleasure to add, that when the typhus fever raged in Florence, about eight years ago, not one of the Brothers was attacked by it, though they not only removed the sick from their houses, but in many instances attended them as nurses. As an instance of the grateful feelings of the Florentines, we are told that, after the last severe visitation of the plague in 1633, when it came to the turn of the Misericordia to go to the cathedral and render thanks to God, the populace crowded the streets through which they were to pass, and all the bells in the city were ringing, while from every side and from every window there were shouts of “Viva! viva la Compagnia della Misericordia!”—as if, continues Landini, the health of the citizens, one and all, depended on the charity and diligence of those Brothers.

The company consists of three orders, the first in rank is that of the “Capi di Guardia,” their number is seventy-two, of whom fourteen are noble, and thirty are priests, including the grand duke and the archbishop. The second order, called “Giornanti,” consists of twenty priests, and one hundred and five laymen; and the third, the “Stracciafogli,” of one hundred and eighty, of whom thirty are priests. These, together with the supernumeraries, amount to about twelve hundred. Four “Capi di Guardia,” and fifteen “Giornanti” must be in attendance. At the sound of their bell, which can be heard in every part of the city from the top of that beautiful tower designed by Giotto, they never fail in assembling more than a sufficient number of the Brothers. It tolls once for the removal of the sick, twice for a common accident in the streets, and three times for death. A “Stracciafoglio” is promoted to the honours of a “Giornante,” and finally to those of a “Capo di Guardia,” in recompense for diligent attendance; and negligence is punished by degradation. There are no fines. It costs about six crowns to be enrolled, in which sum is included the purchase of the dress. None are admitted but those of good character, and none who belong to what they term the “arti vili,” such as butchers, fishmongers, servants in livery, coachmen, cobblers, sausage makers, and barbers. We may smile at these exceptions, but let it be remembered we have our own prejudices against surgeons and butchers on a jury; and that while a tailor is but the ninth part of a man in England, he does not so much as appear in the list of “arti vili” in Tuscany.

They hold themselves compelled to attend on any emergency, wherein their offices may be beneficial.

* Boccaccio, in the introduction to his Decameron, gives an account of the great plague in 1348, without once alluding to the Society farther than where he speaks of “lo ajuto d'alcuni portatori,” and that without a word of commendation. It must be borne in mind that Boccaccio was making out an exaggerated case of distress; and that it did not suit his purpose to relieve the mournful colouring of his picture, intended, by the force of contrast, to give the tales that followed a higher brilliancy. Indeed, the anecdotes he brings forward, are sometimes in contradiction to each other; and he himself, as in his Life of Dante, appears to have considered fables, provided they are interesting, fully as important as facts.

FOR THE FRIEND.

Silence and exactness of discipline are strictly enforced on pain of expulsion. They are provided with the apparatus of our English Humane Society. It is their duty to convey the sick to the hospital, or from one house to another, as they may be required. If they are sent for, as it sometimes happens, under peculiar circumstances, to attend the beds of the sick, they watch by them night and day, and perform every office of the kindest nurses; and that without respect of persons, for it was not long since that they performed this duty towards a Jew. Should they be witnesses in the houses of the poor, to any painful scene of want, they are permitted to give relief in money out of their own pockets, and this is done to a considerable extent; and they are bound to make a report of the poverty of a sick person, when he is assisted by the Company from a fund raised by some of the Brothers, who undertake to go about the city, always in their usual disguise, with a box to crave alms for the sick poor. As these alms are divided weekly, and with a certainty against deception, a Florentine, or the stranger within his gates, inclined to be charitable, knows where to lodge his money to the best purpose.

For so many benefits to the public, such constancy, such toil, the rewards, beyond the honour of the Brotherhood, are small. When sick, provided he is a "Capo di Guardia," the stipend is six livres a week; if a "Giornante," only four; and he is visited by their own physician. Those of the third order have no claim in case of illness; but all are buried at the expense of the Company, and they possess a burial ground for themselves, bestowed on them by the government. Their physician has fourteen crowns a year, their secretary sixteen—little more than honorary salaries; but their actual servants, whose time is fully employed, have sufficient wages for their support. There is also a small dower, should it be demanded, of ten crowns, granted to the daughters of such as have acted for a certain time as nurses to the sick. It is prohibited that the Brothers should receive any thing, on their own account, from the public, with the single exception of a draught of water.

In answer to my inquiries respecting their funds, I learned that they have enough, but are by no means rich. Their property lies in land and houses.

An abuse, of an aristocratical nature, has crept into the institution since the days of the republic: nobles are made "Capo di Guardia," without earning the dignity by diligence. Leopold the First frequently slipped on his sackcloth, and bore the litter in his turn among the Brothers. His son, the late Ferdinand, and the present Leopold, never paid the Company that personal respect. When Leopold the First became emperor of Germany, he endeavoured to establish the Misericordia at Vienna, without success. "La Compagnia della Consolazione," at Rome, is rather a company of guardians and attendants to a hospital; and among the imitations of the Misericordia in other parts of Italy, its best spirit is lost, while in all the principal towns of Tuscany it exists in the full force of the original in Florence. Tuscans have more humanity, in all the relations of life, than their neighbours; and in any urgent case, when the delay of a few minutes might be fatal, instead of waiting for the Brotherhood, they render every assistance at the moment. As an instance of this, it was but a few days since that two men nearly lost their lives in saving a girl who had thrown herself into the Arno. Whether a society of the Brotherhood of Mercy is necessary in London, or whether it could be established there, are questions not easy to determine. In the first place, Englishmen might object to the disguise, which is necessary to prevent the recognition of friends that would obstruct them in their duty; as well as for the sake of separating every thing tending to personal vanity from the pure benevolent feeling. No thanks are here due except to the Society in a body. There are no anniversary dinners, no toasts and sentiments with three times three, no blazing accounts in the newspapers of their activity, heroism, and charity. All goes on quietly, modestly. The Brothers know how much they are beloved, and are content without a display of their influence. Every mark of respect is however paid to them; the military present arms, and individuals take off their hats, whenever they pass the streets.

"Let me write their songs and I care not who makes their laws," is an expression which has almost passed into a proverb, to indicate the manner in which the opinions and habits of a people are formed. A proverb, a song, or an epigram, fixes upon the memory, and leaves an impression which often defies the efforts of reason to efface. There is another cause why careful observers of men, pay great regard to the tenour of these light effusions. They are generally struck out in an unguarded moment, and many are the instances in which sentiments that have been carefully concealed have thus been uncovered, and designs betrayed that the author would never have ventured to disclose in his more watchful moments.

It often happens that men who shrink from a serious argument, can wield the shafts of invective, and misrepresentation, and ridicule, with effect; and it is not always that these light troops of party warfare can be hemmed in without a possibility of escape, by such heavy armed and powerful opponents as our friend from Ohio. It is natural for every one to trust to the weapon with which nature has furnished him; and I consider a resort to ridicule and burlesque on a grave subject, as a tacit confession of a weak cause, of a real indifference to the subject, or of being met by a more powerful antagonist. These reflections have been excited by a publication in a late newspaper, entitled "An exposition of an exposition, or, a thin poem on a thick book." The piece has some smartness, and I am quite willing to leave the author to enjoy the applauses of his party, who no doubt think it very fine, and will not soon be likely to undertake a more serious refutation of that excellent compilation. In examining these verses, I think I perceive that more has been said or sung than was designed; and as I attach some weight to the maxim which I have quoted above, I will point out to the readers of the Friend, the inferences which are fairly to be drawn from them. In the first place, then, I venture to assert that the object of the compiler of the Exposition has been fully obtained; that he has brought together an amount of evidence upon the early doctrines of the Society, altogether irresistible and incontrovertible. Whatever errors of doctrine there may be in the work, are those of Barclay, Whitehead, Penn, Pennington, and "good old father Fox." Whoever therefore attacks the book, attacks the opinions of these men upon the great cardinal points of christian faith. Let us hear what our witty polemic has to say about it—

"But truly 'tis a hopeless task
To patch the sadly broken mask
That priests of other year have reared,
And simple laymen long have feared."

The secret, then, is at last out!—the faith of the Society of Friends is a broken mask—the delusion and contrivance of priests!!

"The thraldom of our age has broke,
And men arise as though they woke."

I strongly suspect that the sentiments contained in these few lines will instill their poison into many minds—be repeated and admired by men, women, and children—and become the nucleus of opinions hostile to all revelation. Let us put them in plain prose:—"The attempt of this author"—such is their import,—"to support the opinions of the Society of Friends by the authority of George Fox and Robert Barclay, is a hopeless task; for the age has become far too enlightened to believe such doctrines, however they may have been held by 'priests of other years.' We have broke our thraldom, and find that we have been dreaming till now." The thraldom which is thus broken is that of christian faith—the thraldom of those who believe that without a Redeemer they perish—the thraldom of being bound to the doctrines revealed in scripture—the thraldom of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. And to what do they awake?

"They learn 'tis better to believe
Less that they do not understand;
And to be cautious to receive
Faith retail'd at another's hand."

For know ye well that God has given
The unconditional right of thought,
And men, when bigotry is riven,
Will think and worship as they ought."

What is this, but saying that they mean to believe just so much of scripture doctrine, and the revelation of the gospel, as they see fit? that an exposition of the faith of George Fox, nay, of that of the apostles, is faith, retailed at another's hand? And has the Almighty given us "the unconditional right of thought?" Is power then right? Are there no moral limits? Is there no supreme, eternal and unchangeable law of right and true—the moral obligation to conform to which, is as imperious and powerful as the laws which govern the physical world? Men may find when it is too late for repentance, that although the will is free to disobey, yet that the rebellious from that supreme command "are outlawed, cast forth and exiled from the world of reason and order, and peace and virtue, and fruitful penitence, into the antagonist world of madness, discord, vice, confusion and unavailing sorrow."

The stanzas I have quoted plainly indicate what the author means by bigotry, and as his opinions must be presumed to be the very opposite to that—we need be at no loss to understand what is meant by the last line—that men, when bigotry is riven,

"Will think and worship as they ought."

The empire of reason and philosophy is once more to be established—under better auspices, he may flatter himself, than in France. The misguided followers of Paine, who met to celebrate the birth-day of their wretched "sect master," may hail the accession which their ranks are likely to receive, from the circulation of sarcasms and epigrams like the one I have been examining, personal, "witty, profligate and thin," which prepare the mind more speedily and effectually than almost any other mode of culture, for the growth of licentious opinions.

MELANCTHON.

Do not accuse others to excuse thyself, for that is neither generous nor just. But let sincerity and ingenuousness be thy refuge, rather than craft and falsehood, for cunning borders very near upon knavery. Wisdom never uses nor wants it.—Penn's Fruits of Solitude.

FOR THE FRIEND.

THE ELDERS OF PHILADELPHIA AND ELIAS HICKS.

Accidental circumstances have delayed the continuation of this narrative, till I fear the reader's interest is weakened, and his recollection of the course of events has become indistinct. I shall therefore remind him, that it was in consequence of Ezra Comfort's desire of a conference with Elias Hicks, that the first interview took place between the latter and two of the elders. The refusal on the part of Elias to consent to that meeting, and subsequently to a private conference with the elders, gave rise to the correspondence which is published in the 17th number of the Friend. With that correspondence the intercourse between the parties closed; no further attempts being made by the elders to confer with Elias.

The note of the latter was accompanied by a certificate, drawn up and signed by three members of the southern quarterly meeting, which was intended to explain away the offensive part of the discourse delivered at that meeting. It is justly remarked by the elders in their reply, that the certificate was drawn up several weeks after the circumstance occurred; that it is in several respects not only vague and ambiguous, but, in others, corroborates the statements made by Ezra Comfort. These statements are further confirmed by the printed letters and sermons of Elias Hicks, which go so far beyond all that was then alleged in infidelity and disbelief, that it is only extraordinary that he should have taken such pains to throw so flimsy a veil over his sentiments. Elias also says, that Ezra Comfort departed from gospel order, in not mentioning his uneasiness when present with him, and when he could have appealed to Friends of the southern quarterly meeting, to justify him. The truth is, that Ezra Comfort did endeavour to have such an interview. He expressed his uneasiness with the sermon, and his wish to see Elias, to an elder of that meeting, one of the leading separatists, who discouraged him, and told him that Elias had not preached unsound doctrine. Moreover, he had an engagement which rendered it necessary to travel many miles that afternoon, so that he was obliged to defer expression of his uneasiness till he should again meet with Elias. On his way home, he called at a friend's house in Philadelphia, and made the request I have mentioned in a former paper. Elias arrived on the 7th in the city. Ezra Comfort came the next day, expecting to find the time and place for a conference arranged, and remained in town for that purpose, till the afternoon of the ninth. The interview was refused; and refused too in terms of haughty defiance. He was not amenable to the elders of Philadelphia. Ezra Comfort had acted disorderly, and contrary to the discipline—the requisitions of the elders were arbitrary and contrary to the established order of the society. Upon this point, after all, the whole merits of the question turn; for as to the charges preferred against him their truth is incontrovertible. In the first place, the recommendation of the discipline, neither in its letter or its spirit, requires that the uneasiness which any person may feel respecting doctrines publicly preached shall be expressed to the preacher without a witness. It has always been thought proper to advise with a judicious elder on the subject, and ask his presence at the interview; and in the discipline of New York Yearly Meeting it is enjoined, that such interview shall be had, if practicable, in company with two elders. Ezra Comfort, therefore, acted in strict accordance with the discipline, in unburdening his mind to a few of his friends here, and requesting them to assist him in procuring the conference. Was it proper for the elders to refuse a request so made by a respectable Friend and approved minister? On the contrary, by his communication they became possessed of information of a very serious and interesting nature. They were told that a Friend who was shortly to visit Philadelphia, and was expected to pay a family visit to two, or at least one of the meetings there, was preaching anti-christian doctrines. The discipline required of them, to watch over the flock of Christ under their charge. They would have neglected that duty, and proved themselves unfaithful to the church, if they had not pursued the course which they took, and informed E. Hicks of the charges made against him, and that it was incumbent on both them and him to examine into the truth. Neither is it true, as has been alleged, that the elders, in a body, requested to see Elias, before he had preached these unsound doctrines at their own meetings. He had preached at Pine street in the morning, and at Green street in the afternoon of the 8th, and had shown clearly the nature and tendency of his doctrines. But to all those, however, who believe that the doctrines taught by Elias Hicks strike at the foundation of Christianity, no laboured argument is necessary for the vindication of the elders. The case was a plain one, and their conduct the dictate of sound principle, and unbending integrity. They had been informed, and they believed that he held and preached unsound opinions; they sought to ascertain the fact, and either to convince him of his errors, or to recommend the subject to "the weighty attention of his friends at home." This was all they proposed to do; it was what the humblest individual in the society had a perfect right to do, and what, clothed as they were with authority in the church, they could not consistently avoid doing.

It is proper to add, that at interviews which were afterwards had between Ezra Comfort and Joseph Whitall and Elias Hicks, the latter admitted and defended the doctrines with which he had been charged, and which, in his letters to the elders, he denied that he held.

I shall narrate, in my next paper, the persecution of Leonard Snowden, which grew out of these events, and which, as it paved the way for the laying down of Green street monthly meeting, and for the separation from our quarterly meeting of a large body of disaffected members, is too important a part of the history of this melancholy schism to be passed by in silence.

Nothing needs a trick, but a trick; sincerity loathes one. We must take care to do right things rightly; for a just sentence may be unjustly executed.—Penn's Fruits of Solitude.

ELISHA BATES AND THE BEREAN.

Mount Pleasant, 3d mo. 26, 1827.

The Berean of the 20th inst. contains a notice of the article published in the first number of the Repository, headed "The Doctrines of Friends Defended." In the first place, the writer objects to the title of the article, and thinks it improper. I, however, think it appropriate, and am willing to leave the question to our readers to decide. In his second paragraph, he mentions as "one of" [my] "errors," the expression, (in the Repository,) of an "aversion to controversy." That "the general features of" [my] "writings, taken in connexion with the time and circumstances in which they were written, indelibly stamp them with a controversial character," &c. From this remark, I suppose, the Berean would be understood to mean, that at the time the Doctrines and Pamphlet were written, certain opinions had been put in circulation, which the general features of these writings militated against. If this was the case, I was not "one of the first," as he says, "voluntarily and gratuitously to engage in the contest. The first and gratuitous part had been done before the Doctrines were written; and therefore my writings were defensive. A true statement of the case as respects my writings, was given in the preface to the Doctrines. I had for years, I may say, for many years, and long before the present state of religious society developed itself, believed, that a work on the general plan of that which I afterwards published, would be useful to our own members, and also to serious inquirers of other denominations. In compiling that work, I certainly wished to adapt it to the time and circumstances in which it was written. And it could not have been a suitable publication if it had not been so adapted. But I do not consider, that this fact indelibly stamps it with the character of being controversial. He goes on to say, that having been foiled in this "warfare," I am "now entering upon my second campaign." But it will be time enough for him to boast of a victory when he gains it. He might have waited till their various articles of "Reviews" shall have been examined, and then left the decision to our readers.

In regard to the quotation which they manufactured, and presented to their readers, as if taken from the Pamphlet of Extracts, they say: "That this is a misquotation, or rather that a quotation has been inadvertently added to these words, we readily admit." But they do not say that it was not intentionally done. To set down deliberately, and mark as a quotation from me, what he had written himself, and then make it more pointed by putting in the words "he says," must be very inadvertent indeed. It was an act, which is unjustifiable on any ground whatever. The Berean, it seems, resolved to justify himself, has recourse to constructions—scraps of quotations, and several of them unfairly taken—italics and small capitals to render words emphatic which I had not, to make it appear that I really did attach great importance to opinions. Still the charge rests upon him, of manufacturing a quotation. I have said that in this essay some quotations are unfairly taken. Such is that which he brings in saying: "To guard as much as possible against such a diversity of opinions, and connectively against those feelings which naturally spring from such causes, is the object of the following essay." Here the very form of expression has reference to something going before, and explaining the sort of diversity of opinion alluded to. It is thus expressed in the sentence immediately before that which he quoted—"On subjects thus lying at the foundation of the Christian religion, and which have an intimate relation to our feelings and love, gratitude and obedience to our Divine Benefactor, it is certainly desirable that no discordance of opinion should exist among the members of the visible church." The Berean cannot call this in question, without running into manifest inconsistency.

He says: "The Berean never said that opinions were of no importance." No, he only inadvertently marked as a quotation what he had written himself, to make me say that they were, and then represented me as a persecutor, for saying it. The inconsistency as well as unfairness of this procedure still rests upon him—that if opinions are of importance, he need not have raised the objection—if they are not, he need not have troubled himself with the opinions of others.

The Berean notices my remarks on their creed; and tells me that a declaration of belief is not what they understand by a creed. Individuals of the Society of Friends have often made such declarations on behalf of themselves and their brethren. "Yet the Society," says he, "has never owned, nor admitted a creed." He might have gone further, and said that individuals have often accompanied such declarations, with arguments and evidences in their support, and also opposed contrary principles—and all this, of course, did not amount to a creed.—Wherein then, I would ask, were the Doctrines or Extracts a creed? But he says, "the society have never owned nor admitted a creed." But I say that they have held certain settled principles, and a denial of these has been, from the days of Geo. Fox to the present time, considered a forfeiture of the rights and privileges of members.

"Now the efforts of E. Bates," says the Berean, "to produce uniformity [that is, in writing the Doctrines and Pamphlet] in conjunction with others further eastward, have sacrificed men's natural comforts and enjoyments to a great extent." What this sacrifice of men's natural comforts and enjoyments can be, that is occasioned by the Doctrines and Pamphlet—I am totally at a loss to conceive, unless it is the difficulties in which the writers of the Berean have become involved on the occasion.

He goes on to say, the quotation made in the Pamphlet, page 20, from W. Penn, will not, he thinks, bear the construction I have put upon it. I may well ask, what construction did I put upon it? I left it to speak for itself, without note or comment. I noticed in my former essay, that they had committed themselves, by finding fault with my printing the words Person, and Father, Son, and Spirit, in italics, as they were so printed in the folio edition of Penn's Select Works. And the consequences of that inadvertency still rests upon them.

As he draws towards the conclusion of his article, he undertakes to sum up my essay as turning on a misquotation, the italicising of a word, a mistake in their application of the word creed, and a number of accusations of unfairness, &c. Some of our readers, I apprehend, will make a different summary from this. "But," says he, "the broad merits of the points at issue appear to be avoided." There was little occasion for this remark—and my prospect is, that he will have still less—and by way of reflection he adds, "that there is a goodly portion of the old orthodox temper and feeling diffused through [my] essay." If "orthodox" is, as it is defined in our best dictionaries to be, "sound in opinion and doctrine—not heretical," as it is not the worse for being as old as Christianity itself, I hope a goodly portion of that temper and feeling will continue to be diffused through all my essays, for I trust I shall not be ashamed of the gospel of Christ.

The essay in the Berean, which I have been noticing, closes with an extract from a sermon said to be preached by Thomas Story: the object of which appears to be, to show the inconsistency of personal dislike, anger, railing, perverse disputes, imperious insults, &c. on account of differences of opinion on religious subjects; which I think, if correctly taken, is very suitably selected. I do not at all doubt that it may be useful, both to the writers and readers of that paper. Indulging this hope, I shall look to the future numbers of the Berean for an exemplification of this suitable caution.

FOR THE FRIEND.

REVIEW OF T. EVANS' "EXPOSITION."

(Concluded.)

In exhibiting the case of William Rogers, we adverted to another instance of disownment which took place at an early period after the foundation of our religious Society.

The history of this case, which Thomas Evans has detailed at some length, we shall proceed to notice.

Those who have had intercourse with Elias Hicks or his initiated followers, are aware that the foundation of their whole fabric is a profession of a belief in the "light within," to the entire exclusion of the proper divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and to the rejection of his sufferings and death at Jerusalem on the cross, as an atonement for the sins of all mankind. Elias Hicks has often asserted that Christ was divine as every other good man is divine, viz. by the Spirit of God communicated to his soul—that he was not the Son of God until after he received the Holy Spirit at the time of John's baptism—that we can attain to as great or greater degrees of righteousness as He did, with many other bold and irreverent denials of the glorious divinity and majesty of the eternal Son of God.

In addition to these antichristian and irreligious sentiments with respect to the divinity of our blessed Saviour, Elias Hicks and his followers have been constant in their expressions of disrespect and disesteem of his holy offering on the cross, denying that his sacrifice was any atonement for our sins—that it was of no more advantage to us than the blood of bulls and goats shed under the law; and that a circumstance which occurred near two thousand years ago, could not benefit those that lived at the present time, with many other equally plain and open denials of the "Lord which bought us" with no less a price than his own precious blood. These libertine views, for a long time after their first promulgation by Elias Hicks, were represented as being consistent with the doctrines of our ancient Friends, and an adoption of them was affirmed to be a return to the early faith of the Society; but the ample refutation of this notion, which from time to time appeared, and the conclusive mass of evidence to the scriptural soundness of our ancient Friends, have induced many of the advocates of the new doctrines to change their ground, and to admit that their views are discordant from those of many of the early Quakers, whilst they, at the same time, affirm their coincidence with those of others, and declare that a difference of doctrine existed in the Society on the subject of the character and offices of Christ from its very foundation, although so little importance was then attached to one belief or another, that friends permitted very different views to be preached and circulated amongst them without any breach of unity, or any condemnation or disownment. The preposterous idea that our ancient Friends had no belief, or to or three opposite beliefs, but were indifferent as to either, or whether any was embraced by their Society, the case quoted in the "Exposition" completely falsifies.

It appears that Jeffery Bullock, who was a member of the meeting of Sudbury, England, so early as the year 1676, embraced and promulgated precisely the same doctrines as Elias Hicks—pretending, like the latter individual and his followers, to have attained to a greater degree of spiritual discernment than the Society of Friends, he undertook the task of introducing a higher dispensation, and began his career by promulgating the antichristian notion, that the light of grace in the heart "superseped the necessity, and cancelled the benefits" of the coming and sufferings of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Being faithfully laboured with, and rebuked by the Society for this and some other errors, he assumed an air of offended dignity, and inveighed with great vehemence against the faithful elders of the church. Persevering in his unsound principles and disorderly practices, he was disowned about the year 1676, by a large quarterly meeting. But the restless nature of that libertine spirit into which he had unhappily fallen, induced him to trouble the Society still further, by writing an acrimonious and abusive book against Friends.

This tract was answered by Isaac Pennington and Giles Barnardiston. Extracts from these replies are given in the "Exposition," from which we shall quote.

"Giles Barnardiston says that Bullock upbraided the Society because its judgment "is gone forth against him for denying that Christ that died at Jerusalem to be the Judge and Saviour: who, having denied Him in his workings for our salvation, we cannot think it strange to see him inveighing against the ministers and elders, and the form and order in the church established by the Lord, and his power in them, which disowns his disorders."

G. Barnardiston further says,

"And as to our testimony to that Christ that died without the gates at Jerusalem, we are glad for the truth and our sakes thou has printed it, and our dealings with thee in that particular, concerning thy opposition to us in it, and we can leave it to the witness of God in the consciences of them that see it: and thy seeming answer unto it is something answered in what is already written; and I am willing to add this further, seeing though thinkest thou art yet unanswered, and also for the sake of the simple, [the church of] Rome and the priests, saying, that they own justification and condemnation by that Christ that died at Jerusalem, makes it not antichristian doctrine; and we do not deny the true doctrine that Rome and the priests own, but the antichristian, and it is not contrary to the scriptures and the form of sound words to expect justification and condemnation by that Christ that died at Jerusalem, but agreeing with them: and thy subtlety is seen in taking those expressions to exclude the manhood, in which it is really included, which says, 'By grace you are saved; and therefore (thou savest) not by him that died,' though he was full of grace, and by it tasted death that he might reconcile unto God, without which (there is) no salvation."

"But thou tellest us only all the world was freed from their offerings for sin by that one offering: and that only has an also too, they were outwardly reconciled by the death of his Son. And was not He that was the one offering for sin that ended all other sufferings, the Justifier, Condemner, and Saviour? Why else did he put an end by it to all other offerings, but because they were faulty, and had not efficacy in them to justify and save? And He that reconciles to God by his death, must needs be the alone Justifier and Saviour: and there is not another."

"And our testimony has always had a reverend esteem of that precious blood that was spilled without the gates, as being of great value in the sight of the Lord, and having a testimony in it towards the remission of sin, to oblige all that are sensible of the end thereof, not to live unto themselves, but unto Him that died for them. And as they are to be blamed that will not come to the light, but cry it down; relying upon the death and sufferings without it, so art thou, who pretendest to cry up the light to render the loving kindness of the Lord invalid in sending his Son to lay down his life and precious blood, and taste death for mankind. And such as speak from the Light, which is the Life that was in that blessed body, can never disregard, but have an high esteem of what he did and suffered therein."

Thomas Evans has also given, in an appendix to the "Exposition," the testimony of disownment issued against Bullock, by the meeting at Sudbury. It is too long for insertion in this article, but we earnestly hope that the whole case will be carefully examined in detail by all our readers. The first paragraph in the testimony is as follows:

"For the clearing of the precious truth of God, professed by us, his people called Quakers, from the occasion of stumbling and reproach given by Jeffery Bullock's pernicious doctrine, in affirming that he neither expects justification nor condemnation by that Christ that died, or was put to death at Jerusalem: These are to certify, all Friends and friendly people whom it may concern, that we testify against this doctrine as stated by him, as both pernicious and antichristian, and contrary to plain scriptures, and the constant testimony borne amongst us from the beginning.

Very little comment need be made upon this plain and forcible case. We consider that it decisively settles the questions at issue between the Society of Friends, and the followers of Elias Hicks, if it was the only evidence now in our power to adduce from any ancient writings.

Here was a man who held Elias Hicks' doctrine that the sacrifice of Christ was not an atonement for the sins of mankind—that it was a mere atonement for outward legal sins, and an abrogation of the legal sin-offerings. We find the Society of Friends and its "faithful elders," under the same concern for the cause of truth and the honour of their Redeemer, which actuated the elders of Philadelphia towards Elias Hicks, labouring with Bullock to convince him of his errors; and we perceive in the conduct of this old opponent, in disregarding the counsel of the faithful members of the Society and assuming an air of offended dignity, a complete prototype of Elias Hicks' conduct in rejecting the caution and advice of the elders of Philadelphia, and continuing to preach his unsound doctrines; and to complete the parallel, as Jeffery Bullock's principles were disowned by a large Quarterly Meeting as antichristian, and contrary to the acknowledged principles of the Society of Friends, so now the unsound notions of Elias Hicks have been regularly disowned and disclaimed by two large Yearly Meetings. We wish it was in our power to conclude the account, by saying, that Elias Hicks had been mercifully favoured with a sense of his grievous departure from the faith of the gospel, and was ready, with unfeigned meekness, to lay down his crown and humble himself at the feet of that blessed Saviour, whom he has despised and denied, as we learn from official documents, was the case with the deluded Jeffery Bullock. It appears from a very pathetic recantation of his errors, in writing, dated in 1686, which is given at large in the "Exposition," that this misguided man was, through adorable mercy, brought to a sense of his grievous departures from the faith of the gospel, and we trust, found a place of true repentance and an acceptance again into divine favour.

This case, as we have before observed, shows conclusively that our ancient Friends were one in doctrine with that part of the Society who are now opposing the principles of Elias Hicks and his followers, and demonstrates that the primitive Quakers, so far from permitting such principles to go unproved amongst them under the pretence of charity, actually disowned persons from their communion, at the very time when the Society might reasonably be apprehended to exist in its most spiritual and rightly exercised state. Surely nothing but the fact that our ancient Friends were sound in their faith, and considered it necessary that all professing with them should be of the same principles, could have induced them to disown a member from their communion, at the very time when they were most closely bound to each other by common sufferings from cruel persecutors—and that too, for the very doctrines which the followers of Elias Hicks now aver to have been the doctrines professed in the spiritual age of the Society, and from which they charge Friends with having receded.

We earnestly recommend the perusal of this case, as well as the whole of T. Evans' "Exposition," to all our readers. We have touched upon few, very few, of the deeply interesting subjects it contains, from a wish not to occupy too much space in the columns of the Friend—our object being rather to introduce the Exposition to the notice of our readers, than to present even a cursory view of much of its contents—at a future time we may, perhaps, make some further extracts from it, but for the present, we close our remarks.

FOR THE FRIEND. NEGRO SLAVERY.

In the 10th number of the African Observer, a sketch is given of the late very important decision of Sir William Scott. We have made the following abridgment of the article, which we recommend to the careful perusal of our readers. They will not fail to perceive the importance of the concluding paragraph, the circulation of which, we trust, will be the means of rescuing many a negro from a return to slavery.

An unusual degree of interest has been excited in England by a recent decision of Sir William Scott, in the high court of admiralty. The case excites the greater attention, not only from its relation to the subject of slavery in general, but from its effect upon a question which had been generally supposed irrevocably settled in English law. Ever since the year 1772, it has been understood, if not by the profession, at least by the community in general, that the moment a slave landed upon the English shore, he became free. The recent decision has given a new aspect to the case. It will doubtless be interesting to our readers to see this case, and the former one, stated somewhat in detail.

The celebrated case of Somersett, which has been considered as establishing the freedom of slaves, whenever they landed in England, is given very briefly in Clarkson's History of the Abolition of Slavery,* and apparently without the attention to accuracy, by which the works of that excellent author are usually marked.

James Somersett, a negro, was imported from Africa, and sold in Virginia. In the latter part of 1769, he was brought by his master Charles Stewart to London. Somersett at length left the service of his master, who thereupon had him seized, and conveyed on board the ship Ann and Mary, then lying in the Thames, and bound for Jamaica. Before the vessel put to sea, a writ of habeas corpus was served on the captain, requiring him to bring the said negro James Somersett, before Lord Mansfield, and show the cause why he was detained on board the ship. The captain, in return to this writ, informed the court, that he detained the said negro as the slave of Charles Stewart, with the intention of selling him as such in the island of Jamaica. This was near the end of the year 1771. The case being considered a very important one, it was referred to the court of king's bench, and the counsel for the negro requested time to prepare for argument, which was granted, and the hearing postponed till the following term. No less than five counsellors were heard in defence of the negro, and two in support of the claim, at the different terms when the cause was argued. The eloquence displayed on this occasion is said to have been seldom, if ever exceeded; and the arguments exhibited a fund of erudition, and an extent of research, which few cases are capable of eliciting.

Lord Mansfield (Trinity term, June 22, 1772) gave his final decision very briefly. After reciting the causes assigned by the captain for detaining the negro James Somersett on board of his ship, and making a few preliminary observations, he subjoins, "the only question before us is, whether the cause on the return be sufficient? If it is, the negro must be remanded; if it is not, he must be discharged. Accordingly, the return states, that the slave departed, and refused to serve; whereupon he was kept to be sold abroad. So high an act of dominion must be recognised by the law of the country where it is used. The power of a master over his slave has been extremely different in different countries. The state of slavery is of such a nature, that it is incapable of being introduced on any reasons moral or political; but only positive law, which preserves its force long after the reasons, occasion, and time itself from whence it was created, are erased from memory. It is so odious, that nothing can be suffered to support it, but positive law. Whatever inconveniences, therefore, may follow from a decision, I cannot say this case is allowed or approved by the law of England; and therefore the black must be discharged."

However desirable it must be to the philanthropist, that slaves landing in England should become instantly free, candour requires the admission, that the decision of the above case fails to establish that doctrine. One important point is certainly established by it: A slave accompanying his master to England, cannot be forcibly sent off the island.

* Vol. i. p. 64. In the above passage it is asserted, that both Granville Sharp and Lord Mansfield were desirous of a decision on the broad principle, whether an African slave coming into England became free? Whereas it appears evident from the report of this case in Hargrave's State Trials, and in Lloft's Reports, that Lord Mansfield was very unwilling to decide the cause, even upon the more limited ground whereon the decision was actually rested. After argument by counsel, Lord Mansfield observed, "The question is, if the owner had a right to detain the slave, for the sending him over to be sold in Jamaica. In five or six cases of this nature, I have known it accommodated by agreement between the parties. On its first coming before me, I strongly recommended it here. But if the parties will have it decided, we must give our opinion." And a little further on, "If the parties will have judgment, fiat justitia, ruat cælum, let justice be done whatever be the consequence." Lloft's Reports, p. 17. Such being the feelings of the Judge, we may very naturally conclude he would narrow the decision as far as practicable; at least we can hardly imagine he would decide any thing more than what he supposed his duty required.

But whether a master bringing a slave into the island may lawfully exact his services there, is another question. Whether, again, upon a slave landing on the island, the claims of the master become void, or only voidable, may be questioned: but the question is not answered by this decision. It appears, however, by the judgments subsequently pronounced in several cases by the English judges, that the construction has always been in favour of the freedom of the slave, as long as he continued in England. A question still remains, what will be the condition of a slave, who shall visit Great Britain, and return again to the island in which he was previously held? Is the right of the master revived by the return? This is the question whose decision has recently produced such an effervescence in the English community.

A female of the name of Grace, held as a slave in Antigua, was taken to England as an attendant on her mistress, a planter's wife. There she remained for some time as a servant, and upon the return of her mistress to Antigua, she accompanied her thither. A question was afterwards raised respecting her freedom. Several points were made; but the principal question, and, indeed, the only one which involves a general principle, was, whether the power of the owner, which is admitted to have become dormant while the woman remained in Great Britain, was revived on her return to Antigua? The cause was tried before one of the local tribunals, and decided against the freedom of the woman. An appeal was made to the high court of admiralty, where, after an elaborate opinion by Sir William Scott, the judgment of the court below was confirmed.

Taking this decision, and the arguments by which it is accompanied, as an exposition of the present law of Great Britain, in relation to slaves, the matter may be summed up in few words. A slave passing, with or without the consent of his master, from a slave colony dependent upon Great Britain to the mother country, or taking refuge on board an English ship of war, becomes immediately free, and cannot be lawfully carried back by force into the colony from which he escaped. But a slave having thus become free, and returning to the colony from which he escaped, relapses into his original state of slavery.

May we not be permitted to hope, that, if this decision should not be reversed, the case may obtain the attention of parliament? If the air of England is not yet too pure to sustain a dormant slavery, probably an act of parliament might be procured which would impart to it all its boasted purity.

It may be observed, that the air of several of our states is nearly as pure as that of Great Britain; and had not this quality been impaired by an article of the constitution, would probably have been wholly so. One case may, and sometimes does, occur, in which these non slave-holding states furnish a complete asylum to the slave. When a master is accompanied by his slave into one of the free states, the latter may choose his own time for returning into slavery; there is no law to compel his return. An instance of this kind occurred a few years ago in this city. Upon application to Judge Washington for a certificate to authorize his removal, the judge replied, that, as the slave did not escape from another state or territory into this, he had no authority to direct his return; the man must choose for himself whether to go back with his master or not.

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH, 1, 1828.

We are indebted to an accomplished literary friend for the account of "the Mission to Madura," which is inserted in our present number. It will interest our readers both by the beauty of the composition, and the interest of the narrative; and illustrates, in a remarkable manner, the policy of the order of Loyola. It would be unjust to deny, that men of sincere piety, enlightened minds, and Christian humility, have often been found in the ranks of that extraordinary army; but as it has been justly remarked, it was its own authority, and not the authority of true religion, which the society wished to establish by its missionary labours. "Their Christianity, cameleon-like, too readily assumed the colour of every region wherever it happened to be introduced." As the Jesuit of Madura produced a pedigree to prove his descent from Brahma; another, in America, assured a native chief that Christ had been a valiant and victorious warrior, who in the space of three years had scalped an incredible number of men, women, and children. The Baron von Humboldt relates that he saw the Indians of the interior performing their pagan rites and savage dances in honour of a Christian festival; and the barbarians of the Magellanic Straits offer sacrifices to a wooden idol which they call Christ!

A history of the corruptions which Christianity has suffered among pagan nations would form one of the most curious and melancholy mementos of human frailty and superstition that has ever been erected.

A pamphlet has been printed in this city, within a few days, which purports to be an epistle from a large committee of the Yearly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia to Friends of Ohio and Indiana. We wish our western subscribers and readers to spread the information, that no address of the kind stated has been issued by any committee of the Yearly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia. The pamphlet in question has been framed by the followers of Elias Hicks, the separatists from the Society of Friends, and is the result of that disorganizing and revolutionary course, which they have been so long secretly, and are now openly pursuing. Its design is, to scatter the seeds of disaffection and insubordination throughout the Yearly Meetings of Ohio and Indiana. We trust that sound Friends in those meetings will be on the alert, to watch and to check the influence of this wily scheme for dividing and rending the church.

OBITUARY.

From the Annual Monitor for 1828.

MICAJAH COLLINS, Lynn Mass., aged 63, dec. 1 mo. 1827.

Communicated in a Letter from Lynn, N. America.

No doubt the intelligence of the decease of our beloved friend, Micajah Collins, has reached Newport before this time; yet there are circumstances in connexion with this mournful event, that are interesting to us in this vicinity, and which will undoubtedly be so to many of our friends in different parts of the United States. His public testimonies had become, of late, much more frequent than usual; accompanied with a lively evidence of divine power, under which he had been favoured to feel the low estate of our Society, in a manner truly prophetic. Having frequently alluded to the termination of his labours, his friends had been apprehensive that his time was verging towards the close; but perhaps no one anticipated so speedy a termination; although, like the declining sun in the outward firmament, which enlarges as it descends, so every succeeding day his mind seemed more and more expanded.

He attended our late quarterly meeting held at Seabrook, during the severe cold weather, and was considerably exposed in that journey. On his return, he complained of being very much chilled; and attended meeting on first day, evidently indisposed. At this time, the sudden death of Nathaniel Watson seemed to affect him very much; and he observed to an intimate friend, "Who knows but I may go as suddenly?" after some further remarks, he said, "Some of us will follow him very soon: now mark my words."

The next day, he had a confirmed bilious fever, with strong symptoms of typhus; but his physicians saw nothing alarming in his case, and expected he would recover. He seemed perfectly indifferent to his bodily indisposition, and appeared to regard the apprehensions of his friends, with an unaffected complacency, frequently observing, "I am not yet able to discover whether this sickness will be my last or not." At intervals, his nervous system was so much affected, as to produce delirium; yet, through all, not an expression escaped him, unbecoming the devoted Christian. He lay almost entirely free from pain, and would often observe, that it seemed to him like a bed of roses.

About thirty hours previous to his decease, he was favoured with the prospect of futurity; and in the presence of many friends, with a voice and pronunciation as melodious as at any time in his life, he spoke for about half an hour, in such a strain of heavenly eloquence, that all hearts seemed melted into tenderness. He spoke of his prospects of future happiness without the shadow of a doubt, and said, there was nothing like regret accompanying his mind; that he could as cheerfully bid his friends farewell, as if he was going on a journey.

After it was understood that he would be glad to see his friends and neighbours, more than a hundred repaired to the house, to take a last farewell, and to receive from his dying lips a confirmation of those testimonies which he had so abundantly declared. His discriminating sense of the state of those who took him by the hand, carried the most powerful evidence of the divine influence under which he spoke, to the admiration of all who heard him; while the audience evinced the deep regret they felt at parting with him. His physician could not understand why he should be so strongly impressed with the idea of approaching dissolution; while such a perfect serenity pervaded his body and mind; and seemed anxious to prevent so much company visiting him. To all remonstrances, Micajah would calmly reply, "I am glad of the company of my neighbours; it does not hurt me; but, on the contrary, I feel refreshed by the interview: it is very precious to part in love."

Thus, as the first visitors would bid him farewell, and retire, others were introduced, which continued until a late hour in the evening previous to his close. After the company had withdrawn, his mind seemed a little wandering for some time, as the doctors anticipated; and doubts were entertained whether he would again be rational. But at four o'clock, two hours before his exit, he again resumed his pious exhortations, in which the love of God was wonderfully conspicuous, in comforting the mourners in Zion, and strengthening the feeble in spirit. I watched with him the night but one previous to his decease, and was present the evening preceding his close; but language would fail me to give an adequate description of this solemn, awful, and interesting scene: suffice it to say, that I believe it seldom falls to the lot of mortals, to witness a more glorious and triumphant exit from this world of woe. Without regret for the past, or apprehensions for the future, his soul seemed disencumbered from the body, long before the vital spark had fled.

His natural affections, at the awful period, displayed their characteristic feelings, first to his beloved wife and companion in tribulation; and from her to all mankind. His close was so tranquil that it was difficult to determine when he breathed his last. Thus death was despoiled of his mortal sting, and the grave obtained no victory, in the removal of our long tried, faithful friend, Micajah Collins.

It appears that a number of those who had been disaffected towards Friends, and had absented themselves from meeting, and some of them been disowned, visited M. C. on the evening in which he saw so many, and have since become tender, and have attended meetings steadily.

MISSION OF MADURA.

As it was highly important that the missionaries should present themselves to the natives with all those advantages of mind, as well as of station, which were calculated to command their respect, the individuals chosen for this work were men of respectable talents, skilled in the mathematics, astronomy, and medicine, and well acquainted with the language of the people among whom they were to reside. That their connection with Europeans might not be suspected, they were in the habit of setting out in the night from the stations on the coast, and during their journey took every possible precaution to escape the notice of the people, avoiding even the lighting of fires in the dark, and thus exposing themselves to the danger rather of being devoured by wild beasts, than of incurring the risk of failing in their undertaking by an untimely discovery. Their dress, and manner of living, and rules of social intercourse, were conformable with their assumed character. Their only clothing were sandals to the feet, and a robe of linen round the body, of the yellow colour usually worn by the religious teachers of the Hindoos. On their foreheads they placed the characteristic mark of the Brahmins, made with a paste of sandal wood. Their claim to the high rank of the priesthood was also maintained by frequent public ablutions, by strict abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, and by the exclusive use of vegetable food, without even the addition of spices or other condiment. Their lodging was no less bare and wretched than their diet was meagre; and in all respects, as regarded bodily comforts, they led a life of mortification which served to exalt their reputation among the natives, by whom this species of self-denial is held in high repute. As the mortification of the flesh is equally meritorious among Roman Catholics, as among Hindoos, the Jesuits needed no excuse to their consciences for conforming, in this respect, with the prejudices of the natives: but in the more equivocal compliances which their scheme exacted, they found it convenient to shelter themselves under the high example of St. Paul: "And unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews."

The petty despots in whose dominions they resided, sharing the religious sentiments of the people, were favourably impressed by the same conduct which gained the respect of the multitude; and as this friendly feeling was assiduously cherished by all those means which a subtle and experienced policy suggested, it seldom happened that the hand of power was interposed to check or disturb their proceedings. The short imprisonment to which malicious misrepresentations of their wealth, acting upon the avarice of the princes, occasionally subjected some of their number, was hardly to be accounted a misfortune; as all the bodily inconvenience it occasioned was probably overbalanced by the consolation arising from the merit of the suffering; and a single instance of martyrdom, which occurred in the province of Marava, served more to rouse their enthusiasm by throwing a new glory around their enterprise, than to depress their energy by the terrors of the example.

To the respect derived from their assumed rank of Brahmins, from their self-denying life, and from their display of superior knowledge, was added a feeling of gratitude for the services which their medical skill often enabled them to render: and as no disgrace was incurred by their fellowship, they soon succeeded in making proselytes out of every class, from the lowest to the highest. Selecting the best disposed and most intelligent of their converts, they formed them into schools, and instructed them carefully in the principles and grounds of their newly adopted faith, so as to qualify them for acting the part of catechists, or subordinate teachers. After a sufficient course of religious education had been completed, the neophytes were taken into the immediate service of the missionaries, where they learned those rules of conduct, and arts of insinuation, in which their masters were so well skilled. Thus prepared, they were sent out as pioneers to clear the way for the more efficient labours of their superiors. Dispensing themselves through the villages and towns, they frequented places of public resort, and in the character of merchants or physicians, even penetrated into the interior of private houses without exciting suspicion. Wherever they went, they neglected no opportunity of entering into conversation, and provoking controversy on religious subjects; and if an individual appeared disposed to listen, they returned to him again and again, till, having made some impression by their arguments, they prevailed on him to accompany them to the missionary, by whom the conversion was generally completed. Perhaps the schools of the catechists may have been the better frequented, and the teachers formed in them the more zealous and faithful in their work, as the funds which the Jesuits had at command, were employed less in their own frugal support, than in the maintenance of their native assistants. This plan was found to be so effectual, that it was continued as long as the mission was deemed of sufficient importance to warrant the trouble and expense; and scarcely fifty years have elapsed since the schools were finally suppressed. In the employment of catechists, care was scrupulously taken not to offend against the rules of caste, each of them being of the same rank with those to whose conversion his efforts were directed, the Pariah teaching the Pariah, the Brahmin only the Brahmin.

But argument was not the only instrument of proselytism used by the Jesuits. They well knew the influence which show, splendour, and parade exert over the imagination and feelings of the ignorant; and, though personally plain and abstemious, were careful to give their religion all the advantages of these attractions. Their churches, built after the neatest architecture of the country, were embellished by pictures and statues; and, on great occasions, were decked out with the most showy ornaments which their invention could devise, or their finances provide. In the celebration of their festivals they vied even with pagan magnificence, lest their saints might suffer in comparison with the gods of the country. Crowds were collected together, processions were formed, images decorated with garlands and false jewels were carried about in ornamented cases, the sound of bells and of musical instruments was mingled with the shouts of the rabble, and a scene of glitter, bustle and noise was presented, delightful to the ignorant and frivolous natives, and well calculated, if not to amend and purify their affections, at least to fix them upon the externals of a religion which thus invited them to idleness and enjoyment.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

In consequence of the press of other matter, we have deferred until now, our intention of making further drafts from the extensive report under the above head. The writer of the letters from whence we derived the account relative to converted Jews, pursuing his route into the interior of the Turkish territory, details in his correspondence much interesting information relative to its soil, climate, population, &c. the customs and manners of the people, and the condition of those amongst them under the denomination of christians. The following is given as a specimen.

On the 17th I left Adrianople for Ternovo, but was obliged to return thither on the 20th, from the affairs connected with the Jews, of which I gave you a detail in my last. This matter being arranged, I again left Adrianople on the 22d, and the next evening reached Iamboli for the second time. About seven miles short of Iamboli we passed through the Bulgarian village of Fondoukli, the residence of the head of the family which anciently occupied the throne of the khans of the Crimea. When the Turks conquered that country, they transported the reigning family into their own dominions, and settled them in this and some other surrounding villages, which they gave them as an appanage. All the males of this family still bear the title of Sultans; and it is said that a compact was made, when they resigned the throne of the Crimea to the Ottoman monarch, that if ever the race of the latter should fail, one of the former family should succeed to the throne of Constantinople. Iamboli is a town consisting of about 2000 houses, half Turkish, and the other half Bulgarian, with a few families of Jews. I found at the khan an Albanian doctor, who had come hither to vaccinate the children of Iamboli. He said he had vaccinated about an hundred at this town, and 1000 at Selimnia, where he is established. Before his arrival at Selimnia, three or four years ago, the practice of vaccination was scarcely known.

On the morning of the 24th I reached Selimnia, 12 miles distant from Iamboli. This is a very considerable place, deserving almost the name of a city, and is most picturesquely situated in the recess of a plain, at the very foot of the Balcan mountains, which rise abruptly and magnificently above it. It contains about 5000 houses, the majority of which are said to be Bulgarian, and is famous for its manufacture of coarse woollen cloths and rifle gun-barrels, which are much esteemed throughout Turkey. One of the largest fairs of Romelia is annually held here in the month of May, to which merchants of every description, and from all quarters, resort. A good many copies of our Greek Testaments were sold here at the last fair, and care will be taken to have supplies brought hither on all future occasions. The Christian population have no church within the city. They possessed one some years ago, which was burnt down, and the Turks have never allowed them to rebuild it. An attempt was once made, but the Turkish mob came tumultuously, and pulled down what had been built. They have, however, a church in each of the two Fauxbourgs adjoining the city, and the poor Christians still assemble for divine service in a miserable cabin standing in the old church-yard, which I went to visit.

On the 25th November I left Selimnia and crossed the Balcan, which presented magnificent mountain and forest scenery, rendered the more interesting by a storm we encountered on the summit, and which, on clearing away, exhibited all the sublime varieties incident to such a scene. The smiling hilly region into which, after seven hours' travelling, we descended on the other side of the mountain, with its valleys laid out in pasture-land, regularly fenced, and its hamlets and scattered farm-houses, (a thing I never remember to have seen before in Turkey,) brought to my mind vivid and most agreeable recollections of the peculiar charms and beauties of my dear native country. The first part of this district is wholly inhabited by Turks, for whose agricultural industry the face of the country speaks well; and not being able to reach a Bulgarian village before sunset, we were obliged to accept the hospitality of a Turkish one. On arriving in a Bulgarian village, the house of one of the peasants is allotted to the traveller; and before an ample fire, and with the simple wholesome fare, which the industrious zeal of the honest Bulgarian housewife rarely fails in a short time to set before him, he never finds himself, in a journey through Turkey, in such comfortable quarters. But in a Turkish village, where the natural pride of the Turkish character, equally with the seclusion in which their females live, forbid the admission of the traveller into their houses, he has no other resource but the room or rooms set apart in every village for the reception of strangers, and which it may be supposed are not attractive. On no other occasion, however, was I under the necessity of accepting this sort of accommodation, and I was very glad of the opportunity which this system of domestication for the night, in the families of the Bulgarian peasantry, gave me of observing their manners and customs on both sides of the Balcan. They appeared to me to be a simple, hospitable, industrious, honest people; and under all their oppressions, which, since the Greek revolution, have been doubled in their measure, cheerful at least, if not contented. Their little cabins, plastered and floored with mud, are generally clean and orderly, and their women decent, notable, and industrious. I shall always remember, with pleasure, and a sort of gratitude, some of the evenings which I passed by the firesides of this poor people. But to return; passing through a varied, and in general cultivated and well peopled country, I, on the afternoon of the 26th, reached Ternovo. This ancient capital of Bulgaria is singularly built on the two sides of a deep ravine, through which a river flows, and is surrounded, as it were, by rocks and precipices. It is computed to contain 5000 houses, of which 800 only are Bulgarian.

On the 28th of November I left Ternovo to return to Adrianople. I very much wished to have extended my journey to Bucharest, but the advanced state of the season, and the quarantine established in Wallachia in consequence of the plague being at Rustchuck and other places on the Danube, which would have cost me more time than I could afford, induced me to renounce this part of my plan. I took, in my return, another and the more usual route, halting for the first night at Cabrova, a large Bulgarian town at the foot of the Balcan, famous for its manufacture of hardware. It was a few years ago a very rich and flourishing commercial town, but has been greatly impoverished, in common with most parts of Turkey, since the period of the Greek revolution. I was detained here a day by bad weather, which rendered the Balcan impassable, but was enabled the next day to cross it in comfort, and fully to enjoy its beauties. At the foot of the southern side of the mountain lies the Bulgarian village of Shipka, and two hours beyond the town of Kesanlik. In this beautiful district is manufactured the otto of roses, so well known and much esteemed, and extensive gardens of roses are cultivated for this purpose. I passed the night of the 30th at Eski Zagora, a considerable town six hours beyond Kesanlik, both of which are inhabited by a population of Turks and Bulgarians pretty equally divided. At Eski Zagora there are, however, some Jews. Arriving after sunset at Eski Zagora, I could induce no one to show me the house of the Archimandite, to whom I had a letter from Hilarion, desiring him to lodge me for the night; this town, as well as Kesanlik, being in his diocese. Such is the fear and suspicion which reign in these countries; and here, more particularly, they have fears of any communication with an European since the misfortune of the poor Greek, which has now been so generously remedied by the exertions of friends in England; I was thus prevented from seeing him, and obliged to pass the night at the post-house. Two days more brought me again, by the way of Mustapha Pasha, to Adrianople.

Provided with letters from some Greek friends at Adrianople, I finally left this city on the 3d of December, and passing the night at the village of Hazkeui, where the few Christians inhabitants speak Turkish and a little corrupted Greek, and are very illiterate, arrived at the Forty Churches next morning. Kirk Killesi is a flourishing town, agreeably situated in a rich plain, at no great distance from the range of mountains which, branching off from the grand chain of the Balcan or Hæmus, take a southerly direction parallel to the coast of the Black Sea, and extend, though in a diminished form, to the shore of the Bosphorus. It contains a considerable population of Turks, and about 1,500 families of Greeks. Although inhabited by so large a number of Christians, and bearing the singular name of the Forty Churches, it is remarkable that it has no church, nor is there any historical account, or probable tradition that it ever had one. Where no church has from ancient times existed, the Turks make a rule, from which they rarely or ever depart, not to allow a new one to be built; and although the inhabitants of Kirk Killesi have repeatedly, and upon so strong a plea of necessity, strove to obtain this permission, they have never yet been able to succeed. Even the repair of an old church has been at all times, since the Turkish conquest, a matter of great difficulty, and the permission only to be obtained by the payment of large sums of money; nor in any part of Turkey can a nail be driven, a pane of glass mended, or a tile replaced in the roof of a church, or any building attached to it, without leave procured from the Turkish authorities, under penalty of a heavy fine:—and since the period of the Greek revolution no permission of this kind has been given at all. The Greeks, indeed, do venture to make these small repairs by stealth, otherwise their old churches would long ago have crumbled to pieces; and from zeal to their religion brave the danger of discovery, and the consequences which always result from it.

As a proof of the strictness with which these laws are enforced, I may cite the case of a poor priest at Galata, who, dwelling within the precincts of a church, had his little apartment whitewashed. The Aga shortly after came to pay him a visit, suspecting, possibly, that it might be a profitable one to him, and applying his finger to the wall, from which the newly applied white readily came off, taxed the poor man with his crime; not being able to deny it, he was obliged to expiate it by the payment of several hundred piastres.

On the morning of the 6th December, I took leave of my good friends of Kirk Killesi, and proceeded to Scopo, three hours distant from the former. This is a small town, of about 500 houses, almost all Greek, and has an active population, who are in better circumstances than ordinary. It has a church and an Hellenic school. I informed the schoolmaster, and some others of the inhabitants, that they would be supplied with New Testaments from Kirk Killesi, although I found that some copies had already, from different quarters, reached this place. Indeed, the edition published by our Society, is now pretty generally known, and I trust will be more so still. From Scopo I passed on to Yena, two hours further, where I spent the night, in the house of the Tehourbadgi, or Greek superintendent of the village, to whom I gave a New Testament, and he promised to take charge of any that might be sent him for sale. Yena was formerly a considerable town, but now exhibits marks of the greatest misery and decay. The Tehourbadgi told me, that about 100 years ago it contained 1000 houses, and that he himself, in his youth, remembered 400, which have now dwindled to 150, and all these old and falling to ruin. It has three churches; but a school they till lately maintained, is now given up for want of means to support it. The taxes they have to pay, under various forms, are beyond their means; and to this is added, the misfortune of their village being so situated as to be a convenient place for Turks in their journeys to lodge at. This is a source of great oppression, as the inhabitants have to provide food as well as lodging for the person quartered upon them, and each family may have, on an average, 40 or 50 konaks, as they are termed, annually. What has contributed to the decay of Yena is the state of anarchy in which the whole district, and indeed a large part of Romelia, was, until within a very few years past. Armed bands of robbers used to traverse the country, whose chiefs, when united, could muster several thousand men, and were in the habit of assaulting, plundering, and burning any village which had not strength to resist them. Every place was obliged to have its little fortification, remains of which in various parts appear, among others at Scopo and Yena; and on one occasion both of these places were attacked and plundered, and the greater part of the houses burnt. Scopo has risen from its ruins, but at Yena only remain the habitations which were spared by the fire. The present sultan has succeeded in exterminating these bands, which for a long time set at defiance the force of the government; and at present all the woods throughout Romelia are perfectly safe.

I had thought of taking another route to Constantinople, by the way of Viza; but the swelling of the rivers, by the rains that had fallen, obliged me to turn into the beaten road; and on the 7th I reached Chiorlu, and on the 8th Silivria. On an eminence, mid-way between Chiorlu and Silivria, I passed the melancholy spectacle of a man impaled; a frightful instance of the severity of Turkish justice. This wretched man was a Turk, who in this very place had, about twenty days before, robbed a Bulgarian peasant of his horse and money: being traced and discovered, he was brought before the Pasha of Adrianople, who sentenced him to be impaled on the spot where the offence was committed. A short time ago, such a public and ignominious execution of a Mussulman, for the mere robbery of a rayah, would not have been ventured on by the government; but since the dissolution of the janissaries, the Turks are kept under with a strong hand, and are now quite as rigorously controlled as the Christian subjects of the Porte.

At the request of several of our subscribers we insert the following letter from Anna Seward to James Boswell. It has been repeatedly published, yet very possibly to many of our readers it may be new. It seems that Boswell, in his Life of Johnson, mutilated, abridged, and changed the minutes sent him of this conversation, and the present is represented to be a corrected and just account of it. We have no feeling of hostility to the memory of the great moralist;—no disposition to detract from his stupendous literary fame, or to question his reputation for piety. We believe that it is by no means uncommon for exalted talents to be associated with great human infirmity, and for the genuine spirit of devotion to live under a load of bigotry and superstition, derived through such infirmity, in connection with the prejudices of education. It is very obvious, on the perusal of the Life of Johnson, that his vast mind was strongly tinged with those imperfections, of which the dialogue is a striking corroboration.

Anna Seward, it will be recollected, was the well known author of a monody on the death of Major Andre; and the Quaker lady, who "so chafed the mighty lion," was Mary Knowles, distinguished in her day, in and about London, for much singularity and eccentricity of character; for a masculine understanding, considerable literary acquirements, and superior conversational powers, which latter recommendations gained for her a ready access to the higher circles and literati.

"You ask me for the minutes I once made of a certain conversation which passed at Mr. Dilly's in a literary party, in which Dr. Johnson and Mrs. Knowles disputed so warmly; as you seem to have an idea of inserting this dispute in your future meditated work, (the Life of Dr. Johnson,) it is necessary that something should be known concerning the young person who is the subject of it."

"Miss Jenny Harry was (for she is now no more) the daughter of a rich planter in the West Indies. He sent her over to England to receive her education in the house of his friend, Mr. Spry, where an ingenuous Quaker lady, Mrs. Knowles, was a visiter. He affected wit, and was perpetually rallying Mrs. Knowles on the subject of her Quaker principles, in the presence of this young, gentle, and ingenuous Miss Harry, who, at the age of eighteen, had received what is called a proper polite education, without being much instructed in the nature and grounds of her religious belief;—Mrs. Knowles was often led into a serious defence of her devotional opinions, upon these visits at B—. You know with what clear and graceful eloquence she speaks upon every subject; her antagonists were shallow theologians, and opposed only pointless rallery to duty and long studied reasoning, on the precepts of Scripture, delivered in persuasive accents and harmonious language. Without any design of making a proselyte, she gained one. Miss Harry grew very serious, and meditated perpetually on all that had dropt from the lips of her Quaker friend, till it appeared to her that Quakerism was true Christianity. Believing this, she thought it her duty to join at every hazard that class of worshippers. On declaring these sentiments, several ingenious clergymen were employed to talk and reason with her—but we all know the force of first impressions in theology, and Mrs. Knowles' arguments were the first she had listened to on this important theme. This young lady was reasoned with and threatened in vain; she persisted in resigning her splendid expectations for what appeared to her the path of duty. Her father, on being informed of her changing principles, informed her, that she might choose between one hundred thousand pounds and his favour, if she continued a church woman, or two thousand pounds and his renunciation, if she embraced the Quaker tenets; she lamented her father's displeasure, but thanked him for the pecuniary alternative, assuring him that it included all her wishes in point of fortune.

"She soon after left her guardian's house and boarded in that of Mrs. Knowles, to whom she often observed, that Dr. Johnson's displeasure (whom she had often seen at her guardian's, and who had always been fond of her) was amongst the greatest mortifications of her then situation; and once she came home in tears, and hold her friend she had met Dr. Johnson in the street, and had ventured to ask him how he did, but that he would not deign to speak to her, but passed scornfully by; she added, 'you and he are to meet soon in a literary party, plead for me.'

"You remember our all dining together at Mr. Dilly's, and the conversation after dinner, which began by Mrs. Knowles' saying, 'I am to entreat thy indulgence, doctor, towards a gentle female to whom thou used to be kind, and who is unhappy at the loss of that kindness; Jenny Harry weeps at the consciousness that thou wilt not speak to her.' 'Madam, I hate the odious wench, and desire you will not talk to me about her.' 'Yet, what is her crime, doctor?' 'Apostacy, madam. Apostacy from the community in which she was educated.' 'Surely quitting one community for another cannot be a crime in itself, if it be done from a motive of conscience. Hadst thou been educated in the Romish church, I must suppose thou wouldst have abjured its errors, and that there must have been merit in the abjuration.' 'Madam, if I had been educated in the Romish church, I believe I should have questioned my right to quit the religion of my forefathers; well, therefore, may I hate the arrogance of a young wench that sets herself up for a judge of theological points, and deserts the religion in whose bosom she was nurtured.' 'I hope she has not done so—I hope the name of Christian is not denied to sectaries.' 'If the name is not, madam, the common sense is.' 'I will not dispute that point with thee, it would carry us too far; suppose it granted, that in the eyes of the simple girl, the weaker arguments appeared the strongest, her want of better judgment deserves thy pity not thy anger.' 'Madam, it has my anger, and ever shall have it.' 'Consider, doctor, what a noble fortune she has sacrificed—she must be sincere.' 'Madam, I have ever taught myself to consider that the association of folly cannot extenuate guilt.' 'Ah, doctor, can we suppose the Deity will not pardon a defect of judgment (if such it should prove) in the breast, where the desire of serving him according to its ideas, in spirit and in truth, has been a preferable consideration to that of worldly interest?' 'I pretend not to set bounds to the mercies of the Deity, but I hate the wench, and shall ever hate her; I hate all impudence, but the impudence of a chit's apostacy I nauseate.' 'Alas, doctor! Jenny Harry is the most timid creature breathing; she trembles to have offended her parent though far removed from his presence; she grieves to have offended her guardian, and perhaps she grieves still more to have offended Dr. Johnson, whom she loved, admired, and honoured.' 'Why then, madam, did she not consult the man she pretends to love, admire, and honour, upon her new-fangled scruples? If she looked up to that man with any part of that respect she professes, she would have supposed his ability to judge of fit and right at least equal to that of a raw wench just out of her primer.' 'Ah, doctor, remember it was not from amongst the learned and witty that Christ selected his disciples: Jenny thinks Dr. Johnson great and good, but she also thinks the gospel demands a simpler form of worship than that of the established church, and that it is not wit and eloquence that is to supersede the force of what appears to her a plain and regular system which cancels all typical and mysterious ceremonies as fruitless, and even idolatrous, and asks only simple obedience and the homage of a devout heart.' 'The homage of a fool's head, you should have said, madam, if you will pester me about the ridiculous wench.' 'Suppose her ridiculous, she has been religious and sincere; will the gates of heaven be shut to ardent and well meaning folly, whose first consideration has been that of apprehended duty?' 'Pho, pho, who says it will, madam?' 'Then if heaven does not shut its gates, shall man shut his heart? If the Deity accepts the homage of such as sincerely serve him under every form of worship, Dr. Johnson and this simple girl will, it is to be hoped, meet in a blessed eternity, whither earthly animosities must not be carried.' 'Madam, I am not fond of meeting fools any where; they are detestable company; and while it is in my power to avoid conversing with them, I shall certainly exert that power; and so you may tell the odious wench, whom you have persuaded to believe herself a saint, and whom soon, I suppose, you will convert into a preacher; but I will take care she does not preach to me.'

"The loud and angry manner in which he thundered out these replies to the calm but able antagonist, affrighted us all but herself, who gently, not sarcastically, smiled at his injustice. I remember you whispered me—'I never saw the mighty lion so chafed before.'"

LINES WRITTEN IN A HIGHLAND VALLEY.

To whom belongs this valley fair,
That sleeps beneath the filmy air,
E'en like a living thing,
Silent as infant at the breast,
Save a still sound, that speaks of rest,
That streamlet's murmuring?

The heavens do seem to love this vale,
The clouds with scarce seen motion sail,
Or mid the silence lie;
By that blue arch, the beauteous earth,
Mid evening's hour of dewy mirth,
Seems bound unto the sky.

Oh! that this lovely vale were mine!
Then from glad youth to calm decline,
My years would gently glide;
Hope would rejoice in endless dreams,
And memory's oft returning gleams
By peace be sanctified.

There would unto my soul be given,
From presence of that gracious heaven,
A piety sublime,
And thoughts would come, of mystic mood,
To make in this deep solitude
Eternity of time.

And did I ask, to whom belonged
This vale? I feel that I have wronged
Nature's most gracious soul;
She spreads her glories o'er the earth,
And all her children from their birth,
Are joint heirs of the whole.

Yea! long as nature's humblest child,
Hath kept her temple undefiled
By sinful sacrifice,
Earth's fairest scenes are all his own,
He is a monarch, and his throne
Is built amid the skies.

We should suffer no day to pass without thinking of, and acting for that day when we shall be "judged according to our works," as the only evidences of our faith; and very encouraging is that kind and considerate expression of our Lord, concerning a poor woman, showing that he is no hard master, and not unreasonable in his requisition—"she hath done what she could."—Jane Taylor.

FOR THE FRIEND.

SCRAPS,

From my Port Folio.

"Now, Timothy, don't be always poring over them wearisome papers and accounts," said Experience, "there's never no use in such an everlasting worrying and worrying about what can't be help'd, but if you must be writing, do write something to the purpose—write to the steam-boat folks about another season ticket, time's going on." "Why, my dear," says I, "there is perhaps, as thou sayest, no great use in worrying about what cannot be remedied, but these same papers afford me some little amusement, rather a scarce article with me now-a-days; they are mementos of many mistakes and mishaps, it is true, but they remind me also of by-gone hours of quietness and comfort; and when the reality is gone, the recollection is better than nothing: however, possibly, I may write somewhat about the steam-boat." "Oh, well, then," says she, "I'll just tell Biddy to let Seraphina know that we shall be in town as soon as possible. I am extremely anxious to see her and the children, and I'm afraid if she don't get word immediately, they'll be all here first." "Well then, Experience, as thou art only anxious to see them, omit sending word, and peradventure it may come to pass, without thy being obliged to leave home." "It may peradventure come to pass," said she, "yes, I suppose it may come to pass, but I don't want it to come to pass, and it shan't come to pass—why, it will be warm weather directly, and then they must all come into the country after the air, you know; and then what chance, I wonder, will Biddy and I have of getting to town before every thing is frozen up, and the steam-boat done again?" Seeing she seemed to be getting a little warm, and knowing her to be somewhat tonguey at times, I thought it best to drop the subject, and quietly turn to my writing. This Seraphina, that Experience was so anxious to see, was Seraphina Adelina Snipitoff, wife of our cousin, Moses Snipitoff, pretty largely in the man-milliner and variety line: they were originally merely Snipits, but some years back, Seraphina being a great admirer of the emperor Alexander, insisted that Moses should put, what she called, a Russian extermination to his name, and accordingly they became Snipitoffs. Our family name is Goodenough, and its origin, like that of most others of much antiquity, is involved in some obscurity; but it was probably given to my ancestor, as being somewhat descriptive of his activity in business, and the liberality with which he applied the stimulus of the goad to his cattle, allowing little grass to grow under them when at labour: be this as it may, my immediate predecessors were certainly industrious, painstaking, prudent people, carefully looking both before, and after, and consequently became well to live in the world; so that I am one of those whose father, as the saying is, was born before him; not that I inherited sufficient to enable me to live in idleness, had I been silly enough to wish it, but I had a handsome beginning, and with the aid of my wife, was getting along reasonably well; I say with the aid of my wife, for I find that without that aid, little can be done to purpose. Some time after Experience become intimate with Seraphina, she discovered that our name had a vulgar, disagreeable, uncouth sort of a sound, and endeavoured to soften and civilize it, as she said, into Goodenough. "No, no," said I, "it is ill tampering with a creditable name, and unhappily we are far enough from Goodenough; but if there must be an alteration, I'm thinking that Gadenough might not be amiss, considering thy present habits." Since then we have occasionally had squabbles on this point, but the matter has never been definitively settled. For many years we led a peaceful and contented, if not a happy life. Experience, though perhaps her price was not above rubies; was certainly an active, bustling woman; our daughter, Biddy, was cheerful at her sewing, or her wheel; and my son, Marmaduke, and I, after moderate labour, enjoyed with genuine relish our frugal meal, and untroubled slumber; and we might possibly have passed thus pleasantly on to the termination of our pilgrimage, but for a summer visitation, which our cousins, the aforesaid Snipitoffs, inflicted upon us in pursuit of air:—by the way, I may observe that one might be led to suppose there was, in summer, little or no air to be found in the city, and no sun nor dust in the country—formerly, some over-fed nabob perhaps, laden with more wealth and pomposity than was convenient in the dog-days, might disencumber himself a little at a watering place; and now and then a rickety infant, hardly worth raising, but which did not choose to die, and which the town doctors were tired of seeing, would be sent off to the country, otherwise little was done in this way, except indeed, the praiseworthy Sabbath day "incursions," as Seraphina says, of a numerous class, to the habitations of such of their acquaintance as were, unluckily, near enough, and vain enough, and good humoured enough, to be eaten up, and laughed at. But now, thanks to the all-accommodating steam-boat, no sooner can the weather with any decency be called warm, than away they scour, not only the female appendages of the important man of law, or physic, or merchandise, but those also of the eleventh deputy of his fifteenth clerk, are all off, in quest of air. But to return; Seraphina Adelina Snipitoff and her daughters were dashing, showy personages, and this important visitation made no small stir amongst us; it is true, the hours they kept grievously interrupted our business, and deranged the regularity of the family. The morning was commonly half gone, and my appetite with it, before they were ready for breakfast. This of course caused a like postponement of dinner, and so on to the end of the chapter—however, we put a good face upon the matter. Experience was determined to do every thing genteelly, and upon the whole succeeded wonderfully. I remember one morning, among the other arrangements equally judicious, she ordered Sip to tidy himself, and wait upon table; accordingly, after some time he made his appearance, his black face glistening with soap suds, and a bit of white garter round his hat, and taking a chair, sat kicking his heels for a while tolerably patient, but finding no immediate call for his services, "I 'most think, aunt," said he, "if I be'n't wanted partiklar, I'd as good turn out the cows, 'um seems mortal uneasy somehow?" "Turn out the cows," said I, "at this time of day! why have they been left starving so long?" "Why 'cause I had to go down to the squire's to see if Madam Coramnoby couldn't no how lend some silver notions to put on the table while the quality staid, 'cause you see our few dabs be as old as the hills, and batter'd out of all reason in a manner; and then Molly sent me over to old Marcy Scrubwell's for a taste of butter, 'cause our'n was over garlicky and saft like for the quality." "Well," said I, "could not somebody else turn them out?" "Why Molly said how she'd do it, but she got in such a fumigation washin' Biddy's 't'her white frock, and aunt's cap, as 'em might dry agin' a'ternoon, she clean forgot seemingly."

I had sown a field of grain, and it was important to harrow it in immediately, more especially as the weather looked threatening, but in the afternoon the white frock and the cap were exhibited sure enough, and the Snipitoffs must take a ride, exercise being in demand as well as air; accordingly the horses were taken from the harrow, a flood of rain came, and it was impracticable to finish the job, till too late, so the crop was lost. These rides were sadly in the way of our farming operations, but they were at length luckily put an end to. Experience, it seems, had heard from our visitors some hints about the roughness and vulgarity of our family wagon, she therefore made Sip get the ancient rickety brick dust coach from the out house, where it had stood ever since lawyer Spinittout's vendue, when it was bought for the sake of the old iron, and they sallied forth accordingly in this "more genteeler ekipage," as Seraphina said; but they had not journeyed many miles, broiled with heat and half choked with dust, looking after "romantical sitivations, suitable for potery and skidding," as the young ladies said, when a sudden jolt broke down the hind seat, and let Experience and Seraphina into the box, where two old hens and a Muscovy duck were quietly sitting on their eggs, and which Sip in his hurry to throw on the lid had overlooked; the screams of the women and the cackling and fluttering of the fowls, alarmed the horses, and away they went—and the old coach, and Sip, and the Snipitoffs, and the poultry, and Experience, came flying home after a fashion seldom witnessed in our neighbourhood.

Several of Major Denham's camels became drunk in passing the desert beyond Mourzuk. Their eyes grew heavy, and lost their animation; their gait was staggering, and every now and then they fell, like a man in a state of intoxication. It arose from eating dates after drinking water—these probably passing into the spirituous fermentation in the stomach.

Every day I live convinces me, more and more, of the folly and usefulness of forming any defined wishes for earthly happiness, either for myself or for others that are dear to me—nothing will do but resigning all to the disposal of Him, who not only knows, but does what is best for us.—Jane Taylor.

FOR THE FRIEND.

JOHN LEDYARD.

This extraordinary man may be taken as the type of a character, which is found more frequently, perhaps, in North America than in any other part of the civilized world; a character, in which the traits of the Tartar and the Arab are grafted upon the stock of European civilization, forming a singular combination of the patience, the resources, and the industry of the one, with the wandering habits, the fiery restlessness, and the improvidence, which characterize the other. His name will not, like that of Daniel Boone, be viewed through the mist of ages as the pioneer of civilization; nor was he, like Meriwether Lewis, the successful explorer of untrodden wilds; but he is one of the most signal examples on record of romantic enthusiasm, of an unextinguishable thirst for adventure and novelty, of courage and fortitude amidst sufferings, from which even an Indian would shrink; and all these wild qualities softened by kindness of heart, and elevated and sobered by religious feeling, in a manner that strangely interests and fixes our attention.

John Ledyard was born at Groton, in Connecticut, in the year 1751. Having the misfortune to lose his father at an early age, his education devolved upon his mother, who was left a widow with several children, and in straitened circumstances. The restlessness of his nature was early developed. He applied to the study of the law, but soon becoming weary of its monotony, went at the age of nineteen to Dartmouth College, to qualify himself for a missionary among the Indians. After leading the life of a student for four months, he left the college secretly, and spent several months in rambling through the wilderness, the companion oftentimes of the sons of the forest. He returned to college, and soon again becoming weary of a settled life, he felled a forest tree, and constructed from its trunk, with the aid of some fellow students, a canoe fifty feet long, and three feet wide. In this he voyaged the Connecticut river to Hartford, which he reached after several narrow escapes from the rapids of the river; of the navigation of which he was totally ignorant. "With a bear-skin for a covering, and his canoe well stocked with provisions, he yielded himself to the current, and floated leisurely down the stream, seldom using his paddle, and stopping only in the night for sleep. He told Mr. Jefferson, in Paris, fourteen years afterwards, that he took only two books with him, a Greek Testament and Ovid, one of which he was deeply engaged in reading, when his canoe approached Bellow's Falls, where he was suddenly aroused by the noise of the waters rushing among the rocks through the narrow passage. The danger was imminent, as no boat could go down that fall without being dashed in pieces. With difficulty he gained the shore in time to escape such a catastrophe, and through the kind assistance of the people in the neighbourhood, who were astonished by the novelty of such a voyage down the Connecticut, his canoe was drawn by oxen around the falls, and committed again to the water below."

Ledyard's next occupation was the study of divinity, with the view to obtain the station of parish minister. Repeated disappointments in this expectation, drove him from his theological pursuits, and he embarked, as a common sailor, on board a vessel bound to Gibraltar. It was the misfortune of Ledyard always to be the victim of his enthusiasm and imagination. At Gibraltar, he witnessed for the first time, the splendour of a military establishment—"the pomp and circumstance of war." The effect upon his romantic spirit was irresistible. He enlisted in the British service, and it was only by the greatest efforts of his captain that the new recruit was released. He returned with the vessel to Hartford, penniless and dependent, only to experience again the miseries of inaction, and be stung by them to some new enterprise. He had heard from his father that they had wealthy relatives in England, and he resolved to seek them out and throw himself upon their patronage. He accordingly worked his passage as a sailor to Plymouth, where he arrived without money or friends. In company with an Irishman with whom chance and poverty had brought him acquainted, he begged his way to London, and seeing the family name on a carriage, presented himself to the owner as an American cousin. He met with a reception that put his dreams to flight, and he never renewed the attempt. Happily for his fame, the last expedition of Captain Cook was then preparing, and he determined to join it. He enlisted as a marine, and offered to accompany that sagacious seaman, who, perceiving at once the rare qualities of the adventurer, took him into his service, and made him a corporal of marines. Ledyard performed the whole voyage, and kept a private journal which has been lost. Two years after his return, he published at Hartford, an account of the expedition, which is remarkable for the force, vivacity, and discrimination, with which it is written. Ledyard was present with Captain Cook, when that ill-fated navigator perished in a contest with the natives of Hawaii. He gives a particular narrative of the event, and attributes it to the injustice and arrogance with which the natives had been treated. After his return he remained for two years in the British navy, and then returned to Hartford. His mother kept a boarding house, and Ledyard presented himself as a stranger who was desirous of obtaining lodgings. His disguise could not conceal him from the penetration or the yearnings of maternal love. His mother eyed him with strict scrutiny again and again, and finally apologized for her rudeness to a stranger, by saying that he was so much like a lost son of her own, that she could not keep her eyes from him. This proof of earnest affection overcame her wandering, though not prodigal son, and he threw himself into her arms, with the exclamation, that her lost son was before her. A few months of repose was all that Ledyard could bare. He became impatient of inaction, and conceived the plan of a mercantile voyage to the north west-coast, and after a series of mortifications, of encouraged and then blighted hopes, which would have quelled the spirit of any other than our hero, was compelled to abandon the scheme. Robert Morris was his first patron in this project, and had not the clouds which gathered round the setting orb of that great merchant prematurely burst, Ledyard would probably have been the means of fixing in Philadelphia the seat of one of the most lucrative trades that the boldness of modern enterprise has opened. From Philadelphia he proceeded to Cadiz, and thence to Brest and L'Orient, still bent upon prosecuting this adventure. Finding all his expectations blasted, he turned his thoughts into another channel. He determined to circumbulate the globe, and by travelling through Siberia, and crossing at Behring's Straits, to find his way thence to the Atlantic coast of America. Not obtaining permission from the empress of Russia to pass through her dominions, he accepted an invitation to embark at London, in a vessel bound to Nootka Sound, which was to land him where he pleased on the western coast of America, and thus to give him an opportunity of effecting a part at least of his plan. He accordingly embarked with no other equipments than two dogs, an Indian pipe, and a hatchet. Before the vessel was out of sight of land, she was countermanded by an order from government, and disappointment was again the fate of our adventurer. His invincible spirit met it with composure, and he soon resumed his original plan of travelling on foot to Kamschatka. He set off, and after passing through Hamburg and Copenhagen to Stockholm, traversed the most unfrequented parts of Finland round the head of the Gulf of Bothnia, in the depth of winter, and reached Petersburg early in the spring, after performing a journey of fourteen hundred miles in seven weeks. After waiting nearly three months at Petersburg for passports, he proceeded by the usual route through Moscow and Kazan to Tobolsk. An extract from one of his private letters written about this time, affords a more vivid and graphical sketch of his character than the most elaborate portrait. "My health is perfectly good; but notwithstanding the vigour of my body, my mind keeps the start of me, and I anticipate my future fate with the most lively ardour. Pity it is, that in such a career one should be subjected, like a horse, to the beggarly impediments of sleep and hunger."

It is a dangerous perversion of the end of Providence, to consume the time, power, and wealth he has given us above other men, to gratify our sordid passions, instead of playing the good stewards, to the honour of our Great Benefactor, and the good of our fellow creatures. But it is an injustice too; since those higher ranks of men are but the trustees of heaven, for the benefit of lesser mortals; who, as minors, are entitled to all their care and provision. For though God has dignified some men above their brethren, it never was to serve their pleasures, but that they might take pleasure to serve the public. For this cause, doubtless, it was that they were raised above necessity or any trouble to live, that they might have more time and ability to care for others; and it is certain, where that use is not made of the bounties of Providence, they are embzzled and wasted.—Wm. Penn's Fruits of Solitude.

All the real and reasonable enjoyments of life are entirely compatible, not only with an ordinary profession of religion, but with the highest spirituality of mind; and are greatly sweetened by it, if kept in their subordinate place.—Jane Taylor.

FRAGMENTS.—No. 3.

William Edmundson. At this time, my brother and I were at a fair in Antrim; being late there, we proposed to lodge that night at Glenavy, six miles on our way homeward. Before we got to Glenavy, I was under a great exercise of spirit, and the word of the Lord came to me, that my shop was in danger to be robbed that night. I told my brother of it. So we concluded to travel home, and went about a mile beyond Glenavy; but my spirit was still under a great exercise, the word of the Lord moving me to turn back towards Clough. Whereupon I was brought under a great exercise of spirit, betwixt these two motions, to travel back, and my service unknown; and my shop, on the other hand, in danger to be robbed; which brought me into a great strait, for fear of a wrong spirit. I cried to the Lord in much tenderness of heart, and his word answered me, "that which drew me back should preserve my shop." So we went back to Glenavy, and lodged there. I slept little, because of many doubts about the concern; on the other hand, I durst not disobey, for I knew the terms of God for disobedience. The next morning my brother went home, but I rode back to Antrim, and took lodgings at an inn. When I came into the house, I found Ann Gould in despair, and Julian Wartwood with her. When they knew who I was, for they had heard of me before, the poor disconsolate woman revived for joy, and got up, for she was in bed, overwhelmed with trouble of mind. I then saw my service of coming there was for her sake; so when we came to discourse of matters, I told them how I was brought there by the good hand of God, led as a horse by the bridle to the place where they were; they therefore greatly rejoiced, and praised God; the tender woman was helped over her trouble, and she saw it was a trial of temptation she had lain under. When I came home, I inquired about my shop, whether it had been in danger of robbing? They told me, the night I was under that exercise about it, the shop window was broken down, and fell with such violence upon the counter, that it awakened our people, and the thieves were frightened and ran away. So I was confirmed, that it was the word of the Lord that said, that which drew me back should preserve my shop, and I was greatly strengthened in the word of life, to obey the Lord in what he required of me; for I was much afraid lest at any time my understanding should be betrayed by a wrong spirit, not fearing the loss of goods, nor sufferings for truth, its testimony being more to me than all things.

Gilbert Lately was frequently engaged in soliciting the aid of persons in power for the relief of his suffering friends, with whom his honesty and faithfulness to his profession had gained him considerable influence. In one of his visits to lord D'Aubigny, on behalf of C. Evans and S. Cheevers, imprisoned in the inquisition at Malta, he bid Gilbert follow him into the Queen's chapel. On seeing the people upon their knees, and the candles lighted on the altar, he halted, and asked the lord, what he meant by bidding him come there, for, said he, "thou knowest I can bow to nothing." Upon which he answered, "Follow me, and nobody shall hurt you nor meddle with you." Gilbert followed him to a room behind the altar, where was another of the Queen's priests. When they entered, lord D'Aubigny said to him, "You never yet saw me in my priestly habit, but now you shall." It seems probable this was done to see how the friend would act, and whilst he was making ready, Gilbert's zeal was kindled, and he stepped upon one of their private altars, and began to preach to them. Among other expressions, he said, "We have an altar off which you have no right to eat." The priest asked, "What altar is this you speak of?" "The altar I speak of," said Gilbert, "is that on which the saints daily offer up their prayers to the living God." The priest replied, "Friend, there is no greater state attainable than what you speak of; and so they parted for that time. When those women arrived in England, after their liberation from that dreadful imprisonment, they visited Gilbert Lately, and requested him to introduce them to their benefactor, who had obtained their release. On being presented to lord D'Aubigny, he inquired if they were the women who were confined at Malta; to which they replied, they were; and expressed their gratitude for his kindness, and their readiness, at any time, to make any returns in their power; he replied, "Good women, for what service or kindness I have done you, all that I shall desire of you is, that when you pray to God, you will remember me in your prayers."

William Penn. The works of his ancient and esteemed friend, John Banks, being ready for the press, he dictated the preface to an amanuensis, while he walked his chamber, supported by his staff. It was the last piece he published, and contains the following excellent advice. "Oh that none who make profession of the dispensation of the spirit may build beside the work of Jesus Christ in their own souls, in reference to his prophetic, priestly, and kingly office; in which regard, God, his Father, gave him, as a tried stone, elect and precious, to build by and upon. Concerning which great and glorious truth, we most humbly beseech the Almighty, who is the God of the spirits of all flesh, the Father of lights and spirits, to ground and establish all his visited and convinced ones, that they may grow a holy house and building to the Lord. So shall purity, peace, and charity, abound in the house and sanctuary, that he hath pitched, and not man." "Now, reader, before I take my leave of thee, let me advise thee to hold thy religion in the spirit, whether thou prayest, praïsest, or ministerest to others; go forth in the ability God giveth thee; presume not to awake thy beloved before his time; be not thy own in thy performances, but the Lord's, and thou shalt not hold the truth in unrighteousness, as too many do, but according to the oracle of God, that will never leave nor forsake them that will take counsel at it; which that all God's people may do, is, and hath long been the earnest desire, and fervent supplication of theirs and thy faithful friend in the Lord Jesus Christ."

Abigail Abbott, of the province of Munster, was convinced about the year 1675, by William Bingley, and in a few years after her conviction was called to the ministry. She was an eloquent woman, of a majestic presence, much admired, and followed. She travelled, on truth's account, both in Ireland and England, had acceptable service in many places, and several persons were convinced by her ministry. She was greatly applauded by many, and being not strong enough to bear praise, was transported into pride thereby, lost her gift and fellowship with Friends, and, from the highest pitch of applause, fell into as low degree of contempt. It is certain however, that she became sensible of her fall, and suffered many bitter agonies on that account, passing the latter years of her life in retirement, great sorrow, and mortification. She wrote two papers, condemning her conduct, and containing pertinent cautions to others. In the latter were more particularly specified her miscarriages, and she warned those in the ministry to watch against that Luciferian spirit, which would deck itself with the gifts, and not to value themselves upon any gift which God bestows on them, because that opens a wide door for temptation, and was, as she confesseth, the first inlet to all the miseries that befel her. Here she grew impatient of contradiction, and deaf to advice; and, at length, in contempt of the good order established among Friends, was married by a priest to a man not in unity with them. Let him that thinketh he standeth, whether preacher or hearer, take heed lest he fall.

Thomas Ellwood, having accompanied his father to the petty sessions at Watlington, and the carriage being stopped by two men, who seized the horses by the head on their return after dark, his father, after some remonstrance with them without effect, called upon his son to disarm them. "I stood ready at his elbow," says T. E.; "waiting only for the word of command. For being naturally of a bold spirit, full then of youthful heat, and that heightened by the sense I had, not only of the abuse, but insolent behaviour of these rude fellows, my blood began to boil, and my fingers itched, as the saying is, to be dealing with them. Wherefore stepping boldly forward to lay hold of the staff of him that was nearest to me, I said, Sirrah, deliver your weapon. He thereupon raised his club, which was big enough to knock down an ox, intending no doubt to have knocked me down with it, had I not, in the twinkling of an eye, whipt out my rapier, and made a pass upon him. I could not have failed running him through, had he stood his ground, but the sudden, unexpected sight of my bright blade glittering in the dark, so amazed and terrified the man, that, slipping aside, he avoided my thrust, and letting his staff sink, betook himself to his heels for safety, which his companion seeing, fled also." "At that time and for a good while after, I had no regret for what I did and designed to have done; but went on in a sort of bravery, resolving to kill, if I could, any man that should make the like attempt, or put any affront upon us; and for that reason seldom went afterwards upon those public services, without a loaded pistol in my pocket. But when it pleased the Lord, in his infinite goodness, to call me out of the spirit and ways of the world, and give me the knowledge of his saving truth, whereby the actions of my former life were set in order before me, a sort of horror seized on me, when I considered how near I had been to the staining my hands with human blood. And whenever afterwards I went that way, and indeed as often since as the matter has come into my remembrance, my soul has blessed the Lord for my deliverance, and thanksgivings and praises have arisen in my heart to him who preserved and withheld me from shedding man's blood."

FOR THE FRIEND.

Innocent cheerfulness and practical goodness beautifully illustrated; the simile of shaking off the dew is inimitable, and the movement of the old lady in release of the fly is not surpassed by the happiest strokes of a certain writer, once in repute, but now justly repudiated for his licentiousness.

"The Royalists, though many of them without religion, generally retained the form. Some, though by no means all, of the latter class of Puritans, had neither form nor religion."

"Is not that a little harsh, my love?" said the old lady.

"It may be so," answered he. "But to be sure, the times were truly awful. In common times men sin against their principles, and then one hopes their principles may mend them. But some of these men rebelled upon principle,—shed royal blood for conscience sake. What, therefore, could mend them?"

"You," she replied, "if they could have heard your last sermon on peace of conscience."—How far the Vicar agreed with his lady, it is impossible to say, as he said nothing himself, but read on.

"I cannot help thinking," said the old gentleman after a pause, "that their scheme of religion in some instances, spoiled their tempers. I do indeed heartily commend their abstinence from vicious or dissipating amusements. But surely cheerfulness is not a crime. That God, who is 'Our Father,' must love to see his creatures happy. If, then, instead of perpetual fasting and 'will worship,' they had gone abroad among the glories of nature,—if even they had refreshed their spirits by a commerce with science and art, I think, by the mercy of God, they would have become happier themselves, and therefore less jealous of the happiness of others. They would have shaken off the dew of their own comforts on all around them." Whilst he said this, his lady, as if to illustrate his argument, was straining her eyes and muscles to release a fly, which had audaciously leapt into the cream pot. She was so happy herself, she would not willingly suffer even a fly to be miserable.

Some men employ their health, an ugly trick,
In making known how oft they have been sick,
And give us, in recitals of disease,
A doctor's trouble, but without the fees;
Relate how many weeks they kept their bed,
How an emetic or cathartic sped;
Nothing is slightly touched, much less forgot,
Nose, ears, and eyes, seem present on the spot.
Now the distemper, spite of draught or pill,
Victorious seemed, and now the doctor's skill,
And now—alas, for unforeseen mishaps!
They put on a damp night cap, and relapse;
They thought they must have died, they were so bad;
Their peevish hearers almost wish they had.

COWPER.

FOR THE FRIEND.

OHIO AND INDIANA EPISTLE.

We were pleased to observe in the last number of "The Friend," a notice of the fact that the followers of Elias Hicks had issued an epistle to Friends in Ohio and Indiana. It is to be hoped that the information will reach our brethren in those states in time to prevent their being imposed upon by the document; the writers of which have been so uncandid as to assume the name of the Society of Friends, and to style themselves a committee of Philadelphia yearly meeting, to neither of which titles have they any just claim.

The new regime seems to have made a great change in the views and dispositions of the seceding party. Previous to the separation they were troubled with continual apprehensions and alarm lest committees should assume powers not delegated to them, or meddle with subjects which "the body" had not extended to their care. They were perpetually sounding forth the most solemn warnings to their credulous partisans, to be beware of assumed prerogative, and to watch narrowly every act which envy or prejudice could distort into an attempt at personal aggrandisement. Had a committee of Philadelphia yearly meeting of Friends addressed an epistle to the members of another yearly meeting, and with the avowed object of promoting party views and measures, as is the case with the one under consideration, the alarm would have been sounded far and wide, and many a fearful tale put into circulation of direful consequences which might be expected to flow from such an unprecedented and daring usurpation. But the tune is quite changed now, and having set up an "association" (as they term it) of their own, all these deeds of "oppression, and tyranny, and domineering," pass off very well; and however unlawful they may be for Friends, it seems are perfectly innocent and proper when performed by themselves.

We have been fully satisfied, ever since the period of their secession from the Society of Friends, that maugre all their professions of respect for the discipline, and their determination to support it, they were resolved to observe its salutary regulations so far only as they could be made to promote their own schemes; yet we should have supposed that a regard to appearances would have deterred them from an act so unprecedented as that of a committee assuming the power of addressing members of other independent yearly meetings; such a proceeding is not only "unknown to the Society of Friends, and unauthorized by its discipline," but is, in the present instance, highly indecorous and unchristian.

The design of the epistle is obvious upon the very face of it; every page breathes the spirit of discord and division. In the first paragraph, they acknowledge that they have received information "of the prevalence of a spirit of strife, contention, and discord, in their borders," and yet with a steadfastness of purpose worthy of a better cause, they have thrown this epistle among them, fraught with those very materials from which their trials have originated, as if determined to add to the flame of discord rather than extinguish it.

The second paragraph complains that they are called "unbelievers, &c." Now, a fitter occasion for proving that they were believers in the Christian religion, if such were the fact, could scarcely have offered. The writers of the epistle must be aware that Indiana yearly meeting has issued a testimony against the doctrines of Elias Hicks and his followers, as exhibited in his sermons, and in the Berean, two "standard works" amongst the new sect—that this testimony has been adopted by the meeting for sufferings of Ohio yearly meeting, and widely circulated among Friends in the western states; and that one of the signers of the epistle is generally believed, and for good reasons, to be a principal writer for the pages of the Berean. Such being the facts, it would seem peculiarly proper, that in an address to the members of those very yearly meetings, and on subjects relative to a controversy arising out of the alleged doctrines, the followers of Elias Hicks should have corrected any errors into which those meetings had fallen, respecting their unbelief. If the positions assumed in the Testimony alluded to had been incorrect, and they really believed in the doctrines which the sermons and the Berean controvert, we cannot see how they could, either in justice to themselves or to their mistaken brethren, have avoided a candid and honest avowal of their sincere belief in those fundamental doctrines which they are charged with denying. But the epistle is totally silent on the subject—they do not even allude to it; and it is, therefore, perfectly fair to conclude that they cannot, and dare not, deny the truth of the statements contained in the Testimony. Silence bespeaks consent; and they stand convicted of holding those unsound notions by their own tacit confession.

In the third paragraph, they make a parade of their christian demeanour, in not returning "railing for railing," "rendering good for evil, &c." But before they sound their own praise, they should be certain that they merit it. We are far from desiring to bring a railing accusation against any man; but the truth should be told. We appeal to the pages of "The Friend," to show how far the followers of Elias Hicks have observed their own maxims. The facts are directly against them—to call respectable and worthy men, "bloodhounds of persecution," &c. &c.—to expel them from their meeting houses, and oblige them to meet in the public roads, is certainly not complying with the rules which themselves have laid down. We refer our readers to the columns of "The Friend" for statements of these incontrovertible facts, and leave every one to draw his own inferences. Professions, however plausible or specious, will do little for us, if our practice does not correspond. The followers of Elias Hicks may talk of the "non-resisting spirit of the Lamb" and of its having no "weapons of offence or defence;" and those who are unacquainted with their proceedings, may give them credit for their paper moderation; but it must acknowledged, that their conduct has fully evinced that they have little confidence in their protection offered by such a "shield." Their policy has been to seize and secure all they could get hold of, and at this moment they hold unjust possession of many of the meeting houses within the yearly meeting of Philadelphia, several of which they have obtained by means, that neither innocence nor non-resistance can justify or excuse. Yet on page 7 of the epistle, they tell us—"We feel desirous that in all our conduct, a strict regard may be had to justice and equity, and that on every occasion where property or records may be in dispute, Friends may manifest their willingness and care to maintain those principles inviolate, by such measures as truth may dictate." When we compare with this assertion, their conduct at Abington quarterly meeting, at Byberry, Radnor, Darby, Buckingham, Solebury, Middletown, Bristol, Haverford, and several others noticed in "The Friend," where they violently took, or unjustly kept possession of the property, to the entire exclusion of Friends, we are astonished at the cool deliberation with which they make these smooth and peaceable professions. Several instances could be mentioned, on unquestionable authority, of their active members expressing themselves in very unseemly and threatening terms, indicating a disposition to resort to violence in keeping and taking possession of meeting houses, and at Rahway, after the close of a late monthly meeting of Friends, the Hicksites remained behind to organize a meeting for themselves; and so resolutely were they bent on having possession of Friends' books and papers, that as the clerk was leaving the house, with the bag under his arm which contained them, they seized it and continued dragging it and the Friend who held it, until he got some distance from the house; at length they forced it from him, and bore it in triumph into their meeting. If these are "such measures" as their notions of "truth dictate," it is not difficult to reconcile their conduct with their "desires," but it would be more honourable to speak in language which had less appearance of being intended to deceive.

The epistle fully admits that the followers of Elias Hicks have separated from the Society of Friends, and the awkward attempts to conceal or disguise the fact, only serve to make its truth more obvious. It acknowledges, too, divers serious infractions of the discipline. "Individuals, say they, were constrained to apply to neighbouring monthly meetings, and were received and acknowledged as their members without certificates. Several monthly meetings from the same motives were induced to make application to such other quarterly meetings as were willing to receive them as branches thereof." The epistle admits that "the discipline makes no provision" for these irregular acts; and any person who is at all acquainted with the organization of our religious society, must at once perceive that they amount to a complete breaking up of all order and church government, and a total disruption of the outward bond which unites members to the body. Such measures makes individuals insubordinate to, and independent of, those meetings where they properly belong, and to which they are accountable; and make every man the sole arbiter of his own actions. This licentious liberty is fully recognised by the epistle in closing the paragraph where these acts are noticed, for they say,—“In these instances the feelings of christian sympathy and tenderness toward the afflicted, were found to be the best rule of action.” If every man’s “feelings of sympathy and tenderness” are to be adopted as the “best rule of action,” in cases where the established rules have been openly violated, all attempts at the maintenance of good order in civil or religious societies are alike useless, and anarchy and confusion must be the unavoidable result.

The epistle represents that “the great body of Friends in five of the quarterly meetings,” and “several monthly meetings,” were united in appointing representatives to the yearly meeting of the new Society, held in the 10th month, 1827, which “meeting,” say they, “was large.” The reader may judge how great the “body of Friends” approving the separation was, from the fact that this yearly meeting consisted of less than half the number that usually attend the yearly meeting of Friends of Philadelphia; and most of those who did attend, were persons unaccustomed to take a part in the management of the affairs of the Society, and many of them had been regularly disowned from the Society of Friends.

The framers of the epistle proceed to tell us that the “part of the Society who stand opposed to them, have generally withdrawn and set up meetings for themselves, &c.” This assertion is at variance with their own acknowledgment on page 4,—that “there appeared no way to regain the harmony and tranquillity of the body,” that is to say, there was no way to carry “their own measures, but by withdrawing themselves.” Now, if the followers of Elias Hicks were obliged to withdraw themselves, it follows that the Society of Friends remained, and “the setting up of meetings” must be construed to mean no more than that Friends being expelled by the violence of the separatists from their own meeting houses, have maintained the meetings of the Society in such convenient places, as could be procured for the purpose.

(To be continued.)

FOR THE FRIEND.

The following extract from a French work recently published in Paris, displays in so striking a point of view the advantages of national education, that I have thought the perusal of it might prove interesting to some readers of the Friend. We live in a country, where, happily, these advantages are highly estimated; and in many parts of which there are abundant facilities for their attainment. It must, nevertheless, be conceded, that, in many of the remote districts of our extensive Union, the facilities of education are possessed but in a partial degree, and materially interfered with by circumstances inseparable from the condition of newly settled countries. Encouragement, however, may be derived from the view here presented of arts and manufactures extending, and agriculture itself flourishing, in a near ratio to the degree of attention paid to the education of the people.

Mons. Charles Dupin, member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and one of the professors of the Royal Conservatoire des Arts, exhibited in an address with which he opened a course of lectures, in 1826, on mechanics and geometry, a map of France, in which the different parts of that country are distinguished from each other by gradations of light and shade, proportionate to the degree of attention paid in these respective districts to the education of the people, and accompanied that exhibition with a statement of facts and observations as curious as they are important.

So great, it appears, is the difference between some parts of France and others with regard to the state of education, that while, in some departments, the tenth part of the population frequent the primary schools, in others, scarcely the 230th part receive education in these establishments. Nor are the neglected provinces those in which nature is the least bountiful, or the climate unpropitious to intellectual improvement, but one of the most deficient is the department of Touraine, sometimes called the garden of France.

Mons. Dupin divides France by a line, drawn from Geneva to St. Malo, into northern and southern France, of which the former contains 32 departments, with 13 millions of inhabitants, the latter 54 departments, with 18 millions of souls—and then makes it evident that almost all the symptoms and beneficial results of the progress of civilization are manifested in these two divisions in striking accordance with the number and internal condition of the primary schools.

The 13 millions of the north send 740,846 children to these schools; the 18 millions of the south only 375,931; therefore the former 56,988, for each million, the latter only 20,885, consequently not much more than one-third of the former proportion.

Now observe the result.

The 32 departments of the north pay an annual land tax of nearly 128 millions of francs; the 54 departments of the south 125 1-2 millions, though the quantity of land is nearly twice as great; the 32 departments of the north pay in taxes on trades and manufactures 15 1-3 millions of francs, the 54 departments of the south 9 2-3 millions: therefore each million of inhabitants of the north contribute annually to the treasury of the state, as a tax upon their industry, the sum of 1,175,000 francs, while the same number in the south pay 435,000 francs—a proportion almost precisely corresponding with that of the respective number of children attending the schools.

Mons. Dupin has examined the list of patents granted for new inventions from the 1st of July, 1791, to the same day in 1825, and found that the inhabitants of the 32 departments of enlightened France had taken out 1689 patents, those of the 54 departments of the south, 413. He examined the records of the public colleges of Paris and the lists of those who were distinguished by honours and prizes, and after exempting all the natives of Paris, it still appeared that 107 natives of the north, and only 36 of the south, had received those distinctions,—a fact which is rendered still more striking and curious by the circumstance, that of those 143 tokens of superior merit, 37 are of a higher kind than the rest, and that of these, 33 have been earned by the sons of the north, and 4 only by those of the south.

Mons. D. also searched the registers of one of the most renowned establishments in France, the Polytechnic Schools, for 13 successive years, and found that of 1933 pupils, who had been received during that period, 1233 belonged to the 32 departments of the north, and only 700 to the 54 departments of the south.

The Academy of Sciences at Paris consists of 65 members; of these, the 32 northern departments have furnished 48, the 54 southern only 17.

The learned and philanthropic professor has expressed his decided opinion, that the striking superiority of the north of France over the south is, if not exclusively yet principally the result of a higher degree of attention to primary education, by which the former is distinguished, and his inquiries have excited so much interest, not only in France, but also in other parts of the continent, that he has publicly been called upon to pursue them still farther, and especially to extend them to the moral state of the inhabitants of the different provinces.

A MEMORIAL OF MARY DYER,

One of the early worthies and martyrs in the Society of Friends.

BY BERNARD BARTON.

We too have had our martyrs. Such wert thou,
Illustrious woman! though the starry crown
Of martyrdom has sate on many a brow,
In the world’s eye, of far more wide renown.

Yet the same spirit grac’d thy fameless end,
Which shone in Latimer, and his compeers;
Upon whose hallow’d memories still attend
Manhood’s warm reverence, childhood’s guileless tears.

Well did they win them: may they keep them long!
Their names require not praise obscure as mine;
Nor does my muse their cherish’d memories wrong,
By this imperfect aim to honour thine.

Heroic martyr of a sect despis’d!
Thy name and memory to my heart are dear!
Thy fearless zeal, in artless childhood priz’d,
The lapse of years has taught me to revere.

Thy Christian worth demands no poet’s lay,
Historian’s pen, nor sculptor’s boasted art:
What could the brightest tribute these can pay
To thy immortal spirit now impart?

Yet seems it like a sacred debt to give
The brief memorial thou mayst well supply;
Whose life display’d how Christians ought to live;
Whose death—how Christian martyrs calmly die.

THIRD MONTH, 8, 1828.

Some time ago we intimated our intention to provide paper, of a texture better calculated to bear friction, than that we had used; unexpectedly we soon after met with a lot, of a quality that suited our purpose, and the two or three last numbers of the Friend have, accordingly, been printed on this new paper. We therefore hope that our subscribers will have no further reason to complain on that head.

The subject of “The Elders of Philadelphia and E. Hicks,” has again been intermitted, from causes not within our control; it is expected to be resumed next week.

It would have been to us a pleasure also to have given the continuation of the well written and interesting article on the Waldenses; we shall look for it in time for our next.

The pleasantry of the “Scraps from my Port Folio” is so much to our own liking, that we cannot doubt their being a welcome treat to our readers generally. We should be pleased that our valued correspondent would turn over the leaves again, and favour us with a few more extracts.

FOR THE FRIEND.
MISSION OF MADURA.
[Concluded.]

A people who needed such inducements to draw them within the pale of Christianity, could not be expected to comply at once with all the requisitions of their new religion, and to renounce entirely the habits and modes of thinking to which they had been accustomed from infancy. The Jesuits, who appear to have been at least as anxious to gain partisans, as to make good Christians, suffered no unnecessary scruples to stand in the way of their success: and many superstitious practices were overlooked in their proselytes, which it was hoped that a stronger growth in the faith might ultimately supplant.

The prosperity of the mission corresponded with the zeal and policy with which it was conducted. The number of converts at the single station of Aoor, in Madura, was estimated, but a few years after the arrival of the first missionaries, at no less than 30,000. Father Bouchet had found the place a small and miserable village: making it the centre of his labours, he built a handsome church, attracted crowds of people from all parts of the country, and lived to behold it a flourishing city. At the commencement of the last century, the native Christians connected with the several missions, were reported to amount to more than 200,000; and their numbers were afterwards considerably increased. Had the Jesuits been permitted to pursue steadily the system which they had found so successful, it is not improbable that the mass of the people would have been induced to join them; and a powerful nation of Roman Catholics might have been established in the south of India. But several circumstances intervened, at first to modify their plan, and restrain their exertions, afterwards to counteract their influence, and ultimately to put an end to the mission.

The friars of other religious orders resident at Goa and Pondicherry, had, from the commencement, regarded their proceedings with an unfavourable eye. Blinded as they were to the remnants of heathenism which hung about the faith of their own immediate flocks, they could see with the keenness of an envious and jealous spirit, the shameful idolatry which contaminated the congregations of their more fortunate rivals. Complaints against the Jesuits were carried to Rome, where their culpable indulgence to the native prejudices was portrayed in no friendly colours; and it was even represented, that so far from bringing over pagans to genuine Christianity, they might be justly accused, from their conformity with the heathenish customs of the country, of having themselves become converts to the religion of the Hindoos. It was to no purpose that they defended themselves upon the grounds of policy; and adduced in their favour the concession of the apostles to the Jewish proselytes. They received a peremptory order from the holy see to preach the Roman catholic religion in all its purity, and entirely to suppress those unchristian practices of the Neophytes at which they had hitherto connived. Conceiving that the reasons for their conduct were not well understood, and their motives imperfectly appreciated in Europe, they ventured to disobey the order; and for more than forty years maintained a contest with their own church, which must have added very greatly to the difficulties and inconveniences peculiar to their situation. The affair had at length assumed so much importance, that a cardinal was sent out to India as apostolic legate, to investigate the merits of the case, and report the result of his inquiries for the decision of his holiness. The consequence was that a papal bull was issued, with all due formalities, forbidding the toleration of superstitious customs, and exacting an oath of the missionaries that they would conform, without tergiversation, to the spirit and letter of the decree. No alternative was now left to the Jesuits. However disposed they might be to doubt the infallibility of a judgment so much at variance with their own, they were compelled to submit to a power which they recognised as absolute. Their worst anticipations were justified by the event. Not only did instances of conversion become much less frequent; but many of those who had already joined the church, not finding in the consolation of its promises, glorious as they were, a sufficient compensation for the new restrictions imposed upon them, relapsed into idolatry.

While the mission was suffering under this severe blow, another and still greater misfortune threatened entirely to overwhelm it. The French and English had brought into India that enmity which had dyed so many other lands with their blood. The plains of the Carnatic became an arena for their tremendous struggle in arms; and the courts of the native princes were a no less busy scene of their intrigues and negotiations. As soldiers, as political agents, as merchants, Europeans, in great numbers, found their way into the interior provinces of the south; and wherever they went, carried with them those habits and manners which the native Hindoo had ever been taught to look upon with abhorrence and disgust. The missionaries could no longer conceal their connection with this detested race.

Their persons and their religion became alike contemptible; conversion ceased altogether; and, in several places, an almost universal apostacy marked the alienation of their former friends.

About this time the society of the Jesuits was abolished; and most of the fathers, not unwillingly, it is presumed, left a country which could present to their minds only recollections of ineffectual care and toil, and the image of hopes now flown for ever. The remnant of their flocks, reduced to less than a quarter of their former number, was entrusted chiefly to native priests, whose miserable religious education in the schools of Goa had proved insufficient to eradicate the deep selfishness of their nature, and could not even secure them the respect of those of whom they had the spiritual charge.

From Tobolsk he proceeded to Irkutsk, and there embarked at a point on the Lena, one hundred and fifty miles distant from that town, with the intention of floating down its current to Yakutsk. When he left Irkutsk, the harvest was at its height, and the reapers in the field; a river navigation of fourteen hundred miles transported him, in twenty days, to the depths of a Siberian winter.

All his attempts at proceeding further eastward were baffled, and he was detained by secret instructions from Petersburg, which had preceded him.

At Yakutsk, one of those strange incidents, by which real life surpasses the marvels of fiction, befell him. This was his meeting with one of his companions in the voyage with Cook, a captain Billings, who had not heard of him since their return from the southern ocean, and who might well be surprised at meeting him on the borders of the arctic sea. Billings persuaded Ledyard to return with him to Irkutsk, where he was arrested as a French spy! and hurried, under charge of two savage attendants, to the frontiers of Poland—a distance of four thousand miles, performed in six weeks, in the depth of winter, and under every circumstance of privation and contumely. Even this harsh and cruel act of despotism did not subdue his spirit or sour his temper. "The rest of the world," says he, "lies uninterdicted; and I may pursue another route." Ledyard reached Königsberg absolutely destitute, and in bad health. He there sold a draught for five guineas on Sir Joseph Banks, the friend of science and liberal enterprise; and was thus enabled to reach London, after an absence of fifteen months. Scarcely had he settled himself in his lodgings, when that generous friend proposed to him an expedition into the interior of Africa. Ledyard eagerly embraced the offer, and waited immediately on the secretary of the African Association. That gentleman was struck, before he knew the name and business of his visitor, with the manliness of his person, the breadth of his chest, the openness of his countenance, and the inquietude of his eye. Being asked when he would set out, "to-morrow morning," was the undaunted and decisive reply. Not on the next day, but with as little delay as possible, he commenced the journey. In less than two months from the time of his leaving London, he arrived at Cairo, the starting point of his expedition. He was to proceed up the Nile to Senaar, and thence westward along the supposed course of the Niger. After three months of vexatious disappointments, all things were ready for his departure. But the night was fast closing on all his visions. Exposure to that deleterious climate had brought on a fever, the fatal effects of which were aggravated by an over dose of sulphuric acid, that terminated his life in the eleventh month, 1788, in the thirty-eighth year of his age. Thus perished one of the noblest spirits of that or any other time, if nobility of spirit consist in generous feelings, in carelessness of self, in the power of enduring every shape of evil and adversity, in having the mind filled with great and bright ideas, and the will inflexible, and the talents adequate for realizing them. He perished on the same deadly soil which has received the ashes of Park, of Hornemann, of Burkhardt, of Belzoni, of Bowdich, and perhaps of Clapperton; the earliest of that illustrious hecatomb, by whose sacrifice, it might be fancied, in the language of oriental fiction, that the mysterious and offended Genius of the desert and the Niger, has been at length appeased.

I cannot conclude this brief and hurried narrative better than by quoting the language of the eloquent author from whom I have abridged it.²⁴

"Regret is deep, not only for the extinction of such a spirit, but for the loss of that chance of discovery, which attended his undertaking. He had seen more of Asia and Africa, he could endure more, persevere further, than any other man. His intense zeal, incredible activity, dauntless courage, resolute honour, comprehensive intelligence, promised all that could be achieved by an individual. Beyond three hundred leagues, however, he was to go alone, in the attempt to cut the continent across, between the parallels of twelve and twenty degrees of N. latitude; and it may be doubted, whether failure was not inevitable. The biographer of Mungo Park observes, that the sufferings of that traveller during his first journey, and the melancholy fate of Major Houghton, Mr. Hornemann, and other explorers distinguished by their enterprise and ability, demonstrate the utter hopelessness of such undertakings, when attempted by solitary and unprotected individuals. Without any contest with the natives, or death by wild animals, or any other accident, out of forty-three Europeans who left the Gambia in perfect health, with Park, only four survived, (one being deranged,) when he wrote from Sansanding. In capacity of endurance, Ledyard might be regarded as equal to any of his race; probably no man ever underwent severer trials. 'I have known,' said he, in one of his conversations with Mr. Beaufoy, 'I have known both hunger and nakedness to the utmost extremity of human suffering; I have known what it is to have food given me as charity to a madman; and I have at times been obliged to shelter myself under the miseries of that character, to avoid a heavier calamity. My distresses have been greater than I have ever owned, or ever will own to any man.'

"Notwithstanding the unequalled hardships of his life, and the invariable frustration of his plans, Ledyard never lost confidence in himself, or in the goodness of the Deity; nor betrayed the least misanthropic spleen. The smallest ray of hope excited him to the utmost effort; whatever seemed possible, he would essay with alacrity, 'contemplatively, cheerily, and industriously;'—he overflowed with gratitude for any obligation; the benevolence of his disposition is abundantly exemplified by his ruinous excursion to Copenhagen for the relief of Major Langhorn. In the midst of his disasters, and in the severest straits, he repeats, fondly as it were—'Upon the whole, mankind have used me well.' 'I have always thought urbanity more general than many think it to be.' 'Hospitality I have found as universal as the face of man.' We have already cited his tender tribute to woman. Such testimony is doubly creditable to our nature. Indeed, who that has mingled long with society, or travelled much, being himself possessed of good qualities, but has experienced more kindness than malevolence; more than he has ever bestowed, or could bestow,—enough to enable him, also, to exclaim—'upon the whole, mankind have used me well!' As an example of Ledyard's religious confidence and strain, we may quote this paragraph of a letter to his mother, sent when he was about to depart from London for Egypt:—

"'Truly it is written, that the ways of God are past finding out, and his decrees unsearchable. Is the Lord thus great? So also is he good. I am an instance of it. I have trampled the world under my feet, laughed at fear, and derided danger. Through millions of fierce savages, over parching deserts, the freezing north, the everlasting ice, and stormy seas, have I passed without harm. How good is my God! What rich subjects have I for praise, love, and adoration!'

"His affections centered in his mother and sisters at home, and his country was exceedingly dear to him. His journals and letters yield the finest ejaculations of unfeigned domestic love, expansive patriotism, and tender sensibility.

"Ledyard spoke, and no doubt honestly, of his preference for the scenes and persons of home, when he was hieing to Kamtschatka, or eagerly preparing to plunge into the interior of Africa. So, Mungo Park, as he entered that continent the second time, wrote to his wife—"I need not tell you how often I think about you. The hopes of spending the remainder of my life with my wife and children will make every thing seem easy; and you may be sure I will not rashly risk my life, when I know that your happiness and the welfare of my young ones depend so much upon it." Those hopes and resolves, and that knowledge, might almost be questioned, when it is recollected, that, after Park's first expedition, he was well situated in every respect with his family; that he had acquired renown sufficient to content any ordinary ambition; in short, that no necessity drove him from the domestic circle, and involved him in the risks to which he fell a victim. But we do not doubt he was sincere. The passion of enterprise, and a thirst for glory, only increased by the share which he had gathered, explain the apparent inconsistency of his professed sentiments with his conduct. Ledyard never had the same motives for remaining at home; but we cannot suppose that one of his excellent faculties and virtues would have been unable to succeed there, if any local influence could have subdued his natural propensity to range the earth, and brave all imaginable ills and dangers, in quest of knowledge and 'a small degree of honest fame.' 'The peculiar frame of his mind and temper,' says his biographer, 'was such, that nothing would have been more idle, either in himself or any other person, than to think of chaining him down to any of the dull courses of life, to which the mass of mankind are contented to resort, as the means of acquiring a fortune, gaining a competence, or driving want from the door. Poverty and privation were trifles of no weight with him, compared with the irksome necessity of walking in the same path that all the world walked in, and doing things as all the world had done them before. He thought this a very tame pursuit, unworthy of a rational man, whose soul should be fired with a nobler ambition. This kind of enthusiasm smacks of insanity, in the estimation of the very sober-minded of our generation; the theory is not rare, that a certain number of crazy folk, acting at large in the various pursuits of society, are indispensable in the economy of human existence and improvement. Whoever attends to the situation of a prime minister in England or France, or of an American President, will be apt to conclude, that the avidity for political eminence and power, indicates as much wildness of fancy, or distemperature of judgment, as the errantry in question. A Londerderry and a Canning perish from immense and inevitable official fatigue and anxiety; hundreds of those near them are ready to spring into the same place. The fatal breach is filled without the least difficulty. The lives of conquerors, usurpers, viziers, sultanas, queens, courtiers, afford innumerable instances of like infatuation.

"Captain Carver yielded to the same constitutional bias as Ledyard and Park; and he who had penetrated into "antres vast and deserts wild," and survived in full vigour a two or three years' intercourse with savage life, and seven thousand miles of desperate roam, died in London, through want, with three commissions in his pocket; having experienced there worse treatment from the Lords Commissioners of Trade and Plantations, than he ever suffered by any individual Indian or barbarous tribe. Zebulon Pike and Meriwether Lewis, explorers, whose achievements shed lustre on the American name, were cast in a similar mould, and tempered or leavened with the same mercurial and irresistible spirit. Lewis, 'when only eight years of age, habitually went out in the dead of night, alone with his dogs, into the forest, to hunt the racoon and the opossum. In this exercise, no season nor circumstance could obstruct his purpose—he plunged through the winter snows and frozen streams.' The history of his expedition with General Clark, shows how admirably his manhood corresponded to the habits and energies of his youth. We may give a passing sigh to the manner of his death, remembering vividly the graphic and pathetic picture of it which Wilson, the Ornithologist,—a congenial spirit, worthy of being commemorated in the same page,—has left for posterity."

THE YELLOW VIOLET.

When beechen buds begin to swell,
And woods the blue bird's warble know,
The yellow violet's modest bell
Peeps from the last year's leaves below.

Ere russet fields their green resume,
Sweet flower! I love, in forest bare,
To meet thee, when thy faint perfume
Alone is in the virgin air.

Of all her train, the hands of Spring
First plant thee in the watery mould;
And I have seen thee blossoming
Beside the snow-bank's edges cold.

Thy parent Sun, who bade thee view
Pale skies, and chilling moisture sip,
Has bathed thee in his own bright hue,
And streak'd with jet thy glowing lip.

Yet slight thy form, and low thy seat,
And earthward bent thy gentle eye,
Unapt the passing view to meet,
When loftier flowers are flaunting high.

Of, in the sunless April day,
Thy early smile has staid my walk;
But midst the gorgeous blooms of May
I pass'd thee on thy humble stalk.

So they, who climb to wealth, forget
The friends in darker fortunes tried;
I copied them—but I regret
That I should ape the ways of pride.

And when again the genial hour
Awakes the painted tribes of light,
I'll not o'erlook the modest flower
That made the woods of April bright.

FOR THE FRIEND.

SCRAPS,

From my Port Folio.

(Concluded.)

Seraphina was a voluble, conversible woman, having a notable gift of the gab, as the saying is, and she made free use of her gift. She did not speak three thousand proverbs, nor treat of creeping things and fishes, but she held forth abundantly on visitings, and fashionable parties, and fashionable dresses, and Broadway, and promenade on the battery, and incursions on the water, and genteel society, and pittyresk sinery, and I know not what; to hear all which, Experience and the effect of these precious communications was such as might be expected from the wisdom of the recipient. The commendable qualities of my wife were rather accidental than otherwise, and her domestic habits being infixed little more than skin deep, were, of course, quickly eradicated; gentility and discontent crept into my household, and quietness and comfort crept out; and visitations to the city, and visitations from the city, fully occupied the time of Experience and Biddy; and even honest Marmaduke became infected with the prevailing mania. When they were engaged in preparations to return the aforementioned visitation of our cousins, the wearisome turnings, and cuttings, and bleachings, and starchings, and clappings, put the whole family in commotion. In all this I took little interest, but happening one day to pass through a room unexpectedly, I found Biddy standing with a strap passed round her waist, and Sip at one end, and Molly at the other, pulling in opposite directions, till Sip grinned from ear to ear, and Molly seemed in no small perspiration; and at every pull, Experience secured what they had gained, by passing large pins through a canvass wrapper. Now Experience and I are pretty portly people, rather bulky than otherwise, and Biddy having enjoyed good health and a good appetite, naturally took after us in this particular. “Abomination,” said I, for I was surprised out of my usual moderation, “what are ye about with the girl?” “Oh nothing, father,” panted out Biddy, for she could hardly speak, “I’m only getting ready for my corsets.” “Getting ready for thy coffin poor simpleton, I fancy,” said I. “Nonsense,” said Experience; “now don’t discourage the child, Timothy; she bears taking up very well so far considering, and there’s no use talking about it: how would she look, I wonder, among the genteel people in the steam-boat, with half an acre of waist? She must be tight, every body’s tight; I shall take up myself a little, though, may be, not lessen my capacity so soon after dinner.” “Instead of taking up thy tabernacle, Experience,” said I, “it might be well if thou would take up more commendable resolutions; and as to thy capacity, I believe few think it needs lessening; however, if Biddy is to be squeezed to death, better do it at once, than mangle her after this sort: let Marmaduke put her under one of the screws of the ciderpress, and take a turn or two with the old mare, and she’ll soon be genteel enough.” But my opposition availed little; the preparations went on—the visit was paid; and when they returned, I was not a little shocked with the appearance of the group. Biddy, by perseverance in starvation and lacing, had succeeded in screwing her waist into a nothingness truly wonderful; it fairly gave me the stomach-ach to look at her; and she carried on her head a frightful affair, as much like our big pewter dish upside down as any thing I can just now think of. She was, in short, so thoroughly transmogrified, that even the old cow, that she had milked hundreds of times, stared at her with amazement, and seemed to be altogether in a quandary as to what she might be; and poor little Experience Seraphina Adelina Snipitoff Goadenough, our youngest daughter, appeared to be nearly frozen; it was a raw, piercing day, and she had nothing on her arms but a strip of a rag over each shoulder. “Why, my lamb,” said I, “art thou not almost perished?” “O yes, pa,” said she, “I’m all goose flesh.” “Ah! my dear,” said I, “I wish there was not a greater goose in the house; thou art only a goose outwardly, whereas”—but happening to look round, I espied Experience, and did not think it needful to pursue the discourse any further. I have already remarked that Marmaduke had also become infected with the prevailing disease, the mania of gentility. I had suspected this for some time, before he ventured to ask me, after some coughing and stammering, whether I did not think he might as well try to get into business. “Get into business, my son!” said I, “why, art thou not in business already—a cultivator of the earth? The business of the first man in paradise, and out of it; a business advocated by the good and wise of all ages; a business by which Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, became rich and great?” I had got upon a favourite subject, and might probably have continued the discourse for some time, but was stopped by Experience, who had overheard us. “As to what Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob did,” said she, “it is neither here nor there; if they made money by farming, pork and flour must have fetched a better price than now; ’tis like there might have been a French war, or a hurricane in the West Indies, or a scarcity in Ireland, or something else uncommon, to raise the price; but for a young man like our Marmaduke to go for to slave his life out in raising things that won’t sell for nothing, ’tis a shame; look at the gentlemen that go up and down in the steam-boat, they don’t look as if they’d been creeping twelve hours a day after a plough; no, they follow something more genteel, and more profitable too, I guess, or they couldn’t afford to be always coasting about so.” “Yes,” said I, “I have looked at these same gentlemen travellers, and a wearisome sight it is to behold the crowds of idlers continually passing to and fro, and in such extreme haste too, that boilers must be heated to the verge of explosion, and horses lashed on with savage severity, when, in all likelihood, the sole business of one half of them, on arriving at their place of destination, is to return again; but as to Marmaduke’s business, if it must be so, the first thing needful, is a small capital; I should not mind selling the field over the road, it is rather unhandy, and might be spared.” “Selling the old worn out field!” said Experience, “and who, I wonder, would buy it? No, borrow at once a handsome sum, and mortgage the farm, Marmaduke’s profits will soon enable us to repay it, and we shall keep the property unbroken.” This advice seemed to be palatable; however, the truth is, that whether palatable and reasonable or not, the advice of Experience is commonly sure to prevail; the money was borrowed, my son established in business in connection with Marcus Junius Snipitoff, the son of our cousin Moses. Experience was now in her element; what with visitations to Seraphina, and the superintendence of Marmaduke’s establishment, she was ever on the go, and her time too fully occupied to attend to her own domestic affairs, which prospered accordingly; however, as to poor Marmaduke, his establishment, as indeed might have been foreseen, soon came to an extermination, as Seraphina says. Whether young Snipitoff snipp’d off more of the common stock than was commendable, I know not; certain it is, the whole soon vanished like the “base fable of a vision,” as Seraphina says, and I was glad to escape from the wreck with the loss of half my estate. Having been benefited so little in my own case, by the facility of intercourse, and the multiplication of the means of indulging a gadding disposition, it may be supposed that I regard with no particular complacency the efforts that are making to scatter these conveniences over our country in every direction, inasmuch, that in a short time, an honest man may hardly be able to stir about his lawful business without danger of tumbling into a canal, or breaking his shins over a railway. However, I oppose them not, these excavations and constructions will doubtless fill, for a time, “the mouth of labour,” let the pockets of the projector and stockholder fare as they may; and my learned old friend, Alexander Scraggletop Barelikit, the schoolmaster, formerly of Mucklestonechoakthapple, in Aberdeenshire, says, “that anent thae warks, he has nae doot in his ain privat mind but that, by farcelitatin’ intercoorse, they may ten’ to devil loup our resoorses, an’ gie muckle exheeliration to the march of ceveelisation in the oot lyin’ wilder-nesses.”

“did most seriously incline:”

Desunt cætera.

Integrity is a great and commendable virtue. A man of integrity is a true man, a bold man, and a steady man; he is to be trusted and relied upon. No bribes can corrupt him, no fear daunt him; his word is slow in coming, but sure. He shines brightest in the fire, and his friend hears of him most, when he most needs him. His courage grows with danger, and conquers opposition by constancy. As he cannot be flattered or frightened into that he dislikes, so he hates flattery and temporising in others. He runs with truth, and not with the times—with right, and not with might.

Extracts from B. Barker's Journal.

Wishing to profit by the apparent tranquil state of Thessalonica, and of the country from thence to Constantinople, by way of Seres, Philippopoli, &c., the Rev. Mr. Leeves and myself suggested the plan of a tour in those parts, and it was agreed that I should perform that journey as soon as the weather would admit of travelling in this country: consequently, on Thursday, the 27th April, 1826, I sailed for Thessalonica with a French brig of war, and proceeding to Foghia, a port almost at the entrance of the Gulf of Smyrna, we waited there five days, until we had further orders from the French commodore to continue our voyage.

Thessalonica, commonly called Salonik, is situated at the innermost end of an extensive gulf of the same name, and on its N.N.E. shore. It stands on the side of a low mountain, extending to the sea-shore, and is surrounded by a wall, the foundations of which appear to be, by the solid construction, of a more remote date than the rest of the ramparts. It has six gates, which are opened and shut at about the rising and setting of the sun. Some of its streets are wider and better paved than is usually to be seen in other parts of Turkey; nevertheless, the greatest portion of them are narrow, crooked, and dirty.

The pashalic of Thessalonica embraces five provinces, viz. Callamania, situate to the S.E. of the town; Langatho, to the northward; Vodina, to the N.W.; Veria, to the W.S.W.; and Catharine, to the S.W. It is governed by a pasha of three tails, who has his musselim, or lieutenant, and about 3000 Turkish and Greek Albanian troops, and a civil court, composed of a mulla, cadi, and the ayans. The population of Thessalonica is generally computed thus:

Jews, from	25	to	30,000
Turks	15		20,000
Greeks	5		6,000
Turkish Jews			1,200
Europeans, mostly Roman Catholics			150
Greek Catholics			100
Protestants			15

The Jews have one chief Rabbi, with a considerable number of others under him, 36 synagogues, a large school, and several small ones. Their language is the Jewish-Spanish, which they read and write with the Rabbinical characters; and those who have had a superior education know also the ancient Hebrew.

Before the Greek revolution, the population of all these provinces, together with that of Thessalonica, was computed to be about 50,000 souls, and now it is estimated at only 30,000. The greater number of those missing emigrated, the others have been killed. The Greeks have, in Thessalonica, an archbishop and about 40 priests, 12 large and 6 small churches; one school of upwards of 100 scholars for ancient Greek, and several small ones for the Romain; also an hospital and a plague house. They are clever, but not so industrious as the Jews. At present there are but a few merchants of this nation, having emigrated, or been ruined by Aboul Nabout; they are principally shopkeepers, artisans, dyers, manufacturers, or sailors. Before the revolution, the Greeks enjoyed apparent independence and some consideration; but the cruelties exercised by Aboul Nabout on them in 1822 and 3, greatly depressed them, and they are now much cast down; for he not only killed and tormented them, but deprived them of all their wealth, and reduced them to misery. The present pasha, an Albanian, has been, comparatively speaking, extremely mild to them, so that they begin again to breathe a little.

The Jewish-Turks are a sect which I have never heard mentioned before, although they tell me some of them exist at Constantinople. The following information is all I have been able to obtain concerning these people: they are called by the Turks Donmees, or renegadoes, and are divided in three separate classes; viz. Bezestenlithes, Ghoniothes, and Cavalieros; each class is distinct, as they do not intermarry, nor have they any kind of connection one with the other, or with the Turks. It is generally supposed that they still retain many of their Jewish ceremonies and observances, and many think that in secret they are still Jews. In public they affect not to know but the Turkish language, and in their families they often speak the Jewish-Spanish. They have Rabbies, or preachers, in their private worship, and publicly they go to the mosque. Their circumcision takes place, as with the Jews, about eight days after the birth of the child; whilst, if they followed the Turkish custom, that ceremony ought to be delayed several years. With the Turks, before the ceremony of circumcision takes place, the children are dressed very gaudily, and are paraded about the town with music, and a concourse of people; but the Jewish-Turks, on the contrary, have that ceremony performed privately in their houses. It is the firm opinion of many, that they are only Turks externally, in order that they may enjoy the same privileges with them. Of the European and Greek Roman Catholics, there is nothing to be said; the former, who are mostly from France and Italy, have a convent and two priests: the latter are from Scio, who have been brought over to the pale of Rome; they have no church of their own, but frequent that of the Europeans.

Amongst the many who experienced the bounty of our Society, were the people of the village of Appanomia. A deputation of a priest and two laymen came from that place, which is distant from Thessalonica about 12 miles, to beg 8 New Testaments for their village. The cruel state to which that place has been reduced made me easily consent to give those books without taking any money. Appanomia has had the misfortune to be attacked and burnt by the Greek pirates not long ago, and the inhabitants reduced to great misery. Their church books were destroyed on this occasion, and they were left without the Sacred Scriptures until now, when, having heard of my arrival at Thessalonica with New Testaments, they resolved to send me the above deputation to intercede in their behalf, and obtain from me the books necessary for their church and village. Several other villages have been destroyed by the Greek marauders; and at this present moment they have landed at Cassandra, and are committing their accustomed depredations. Mr. Charnaud distributed some New Testaments at the village of Urungik, where his country house is situated; and the next Sunday he found, under a tree, a young man reading the New Testament to his father, mother, brothers, and sisters, and to several other women of the village, who were attentively listening to him, sighing at intervals. He remained half an hour with them, and then went away, not to disturb them from such a profitable amusement. The like was never witnessed before in that place. A poor gardener, who gained his daily bread by selling the produce of his little garden, went to Mr. Charnaud, at this same village, with some cherries, telling him that he had no money, and had brought him fruit for a New Testament: Mr. C. immediately gave him a copy. Christothelo Themetraki, a boy about 17 years old, came to me for a New Testament: his case was really interesting and commiserating. Ever since he saw the New Testament he was entreating his mother, a poor widow, to give him money to purchase one; and his tears at last prevailed on her to part with a piece of gold, of 3 piastres, telling him not to give it all, if possible, because they would be deprived of bread that day. The boy brought the piece of gold, and innocently told this story, begging me not to take all the money, that they might have to buy food that day. I gladly gave him a New Testament; and on inquiry, finding that what he told was nothing but the truth, I did not take his money. I learnt farther, that his mother, a poor widow, sent him daily to school, and could only afford to give two paras a day for his nourishment, about the fourth of a farthing. A person came to buy a New Testament, and on being asked what he wanted to do with it, since he could not read, he answered, "It is a blessing to have such a book in one's house: besides, I have friends that come to see me, and they will read to me out of it:" he was a poor man. I should never finish, were I to relate every little circumstance that daily occurs, and which proves how well the Sacred Scriptures have been received in this town.

EDUCATION OF THE INDIGENT.

It appears by the tenth annual report of the controllers of the public schools recently published, that the system of instruction for the poor children of the city and county of Philadelphia, is in a very prosperous condition. About four thousand pupils are now enjoying the benefits of education in twenty-two schools within the district, and the annual expenses of each child does not exceed four dollars. Since the year 1818, twenty seven thousand two hundred and fourteen children have been taught in the public schools.

The report closes with the following consecutive paragraphs:

"The controllers rejoice to observe that the subject of guarding the morals, and affording instruction to the minds of children employed in manufactories, is now before the general assembly of the state. They have for several years in succession, endeavoured to show the necessity for especial, and efficient legislation in this respect; and though they may have incurred the displeasure of contracted and interested minds, by proclaiming the dangers to which the rising generation are exposed in those establishments, they have never doubted that the wisdom, and benevolence, and power of the legislature would be exerted, for the protection and welfare of that large and dependent portion of the youth of our commonwealth.

"The controllers would again impress upon the minds of the parents of children who are entitled to the privilege of public education, the great duty which they owe to their offspring in causing them to partake of the liberal and efficient means afforded for the instruction of all our indigent youth. To the faithful discharge of this primary obligation, they are most seriously urged, with an assurance that it is the anxious care of those entrusted with the government of this institution, that the pupils shall not only be instructed by competent preceptors in useful literary knowledge, but that they also be taught respect for moral order, and truth, and without any sectarian bias, reverence for the fundamental and enduring principles of Christianity.

"The judicious training of the large number of young persons of both sexes, whom the law intends shall be educated in the First School district of Pennsylvania, is a purpose of high importance. To the individuals themselves, the value of such training cannot easily be estimated, and it would be still more difficult to calculate the happy influence which must be exerted upon the general condition of society by cultivating correct principles in the minds of this numerous description of persons. Virtuous education constitutes the moral strength and beauty of every state, and forms the only sure basis upon which good government can rest. In a government therefore, happily constituted like our own, which exists in the will, and must partake of the character of its citizens, it is of infinite moment to its success and durability—that individual independence should be preserved—that intelligence should be universally diffused—and that the best qualities of the understanding, and the noblest feelings of the heart, should be assiduously cultivated among all classes of the people."

LINES

On seeing a clear spring near a friend's in Hampshire, which supplied all the neighbourhood with water.

Gentle reader, see in me
An emblem of true charity;
That while my bounty I bestow,
I'm neither heard, nor seen to flow;
And I have fresh supplies from heaven
For every cup of water given.

ANCIENT BOOKS.

With the facilities enjoyed in modern times, for the manufacture of books, we can scarcely appreciate the difficulties with which ancient authors must have contended, in their attempts to give the conceptions of genius and the precepts of science a more permanent form than oral annunciation.

It is a subject of curious inquiry to trace the progress of books, from their first rude forms to their present elegant construction; and this examination becomes more important than a mere matter of curiosity, when we attempt to ascertain the genuineness and authenticity of ancient books from their form, materials, and general aspect.

The invention of books, and of hieroglyphic or alphabetical characters, appears to have been of equal antiquity. Their form and materials varied with the skill and local circumstances of different nations; but judging from the etymology of the word book in many languages, it would appear that vegetable substances were first used in their construction. The Latin word liber, the Greek biblos, and the Saxon boc, from which is derived our English book, show that the bark of trees was perhaps the earliest substance used in writing, and their leaves, and even thin boards, were sometimes employed for the same purpose.

The leaves of the mallow and palm, sometimes single, and sometimes wrought into larger surfaces, being easily and cheaply procured, were extensively used for the ordinary purposes of business, letter writing, and probably the instruction of children; but as it required less perishable materials for writings designed to be of a more permanent character, these substances were little employed in the construction of books.

As the leaves of trees were the cheapest, and most ordinary materials for the daily uses of life, so the liber, or inner bark, was probably the most economical for book making, and even now bark books are to be found amongst rude and uncivilized nations. A curious library of long, narrow books, composed of the bark of trees, made very thick, and smeared over with varnish, the ink white, on a black ground, was found a few years ago among the Calmuc Tartars, and copies of the Gospels, in the Malay tongue, written on slips of bark, are sometimes brought to England from the east.

A very ancient and durable material for books was calf or goat skins tanned soft, and dyed red or yellow; the skins were generally connected together, sometimes a hundred feet in length, sufficient to contain a whole book, which then formed one roll, or volume.

These leather books were most used by the Jews, and other Asiatics; copies of the law are found in the synagogues of this kind, and the most ancient manuscripts extant are some copies of the Pentateuch written on rolls of leather. Successive improvements led to the invention of parchment, still considered as the most enduring material for public records. This substance takes its name from the city of Pergamus, where the manufacture first originated, and where it was carried on to a great extent. It is mentioned by Herodotus as a material used in writing long before his time, and the greater part of the manuscripts of higher antiquity than the sixth century, are written upon it.

Parchment became so dear and difficult to be procured during the seventh, and two or three succeeding centuries, that it was customary to erase ancient manuscripts, to make room for other compositions. In this manner many of the finest works of antiquity were entirely lost; such writings as those of Cicero, Livy, and Tacitus, being obliterated, to furnish room for a barbarous monkish jargon of the lives of pretended saints, and the record of counterfeit miracles. In some libraries in Europe, there are a few manuscripts, supposed to have come from Peru, written on a kind of parchment manufactured from the human skin.

Leaves or tablets of lead or ivory are frequently mentioned by ancient authors, as in common use for writing; but amongst the Romans no material seems to have been more frequently employed on ordinary occasions, and for first draughts or copies, than tablets covered with a thin coat of coloured wax. This soft material was written upon by an iron needle, called a style, with a broad flat end, by which erasures could easily be made.

But the article, besides parchment, most in use for such writings as may properly be termed books, previous to the sixth century, was the papyrus or Egyptian paper, from which our modern fabric takes its name. There are now extant manuscripts of as early a date as the fourth century, written on papyrus.

So great was the consumption of this article, that it formed a principle branch of the commerce of the Mediterranean.

The papyrus, or Egyptian reed, from which the paper was made, grew in vast quantities in the stagnant pools, formed by the inundations of the Nile. The plant consists of a single stem, sometimes rising to the height of ten cubits. Every portion of this vegetable was put to some use by the Egyptians. The harder and lower part was formed into various household utensils, the upper into ribs of boats; the pith, which contained a sweet juice, was a common article of food, while the fibres of the stem were manufactured into cloth for ships' sails, ropes, &c. but more especially into paper. The fibrous coats being peeled off, they were laid across one another upon a block, and were moistened with the glutinous juice of the plants, so as to cement the fibres together; when greater solidity was required, a sizing of glue was afterwards smeared over the whole. The paper was then pressed, dried in the sun, beaten with a broad mallet, and polished with a shell; after which it was considered fit for use. The Roman artists made progressive improvements in this manufacture, until the papyrus obtained a high degree of perfection, being formed into sheets of considerable thickness, perfect whiteness, and of entire continuity and smoothness of surface. It was at best, however, so friable, that a page of parchment was often inserted between every five or six pages of the papyrus; great numbers of books thus interleaved, have resisted the accidents and decays of twelve centuries.

After the possession of Egypt by the Saracens had interrupted the commerce of the Mediterranean, the papyrus fell into disuse in Europe.

The beautiful charta bombycina, or cotton paper, sometimes imperfectly called silk paper, such as is still brought to us from China, appears to have been manufactured in the east as early, and perhaps earlier, than the ninth century; in the tenth it came into general use throughout Europe. The substitution of old cotton and linen rags for the raw material, according to our present mode of manufacturing paper, took place about the 13th or 14th century. By this means the quality of this valuable article was improved, and a great reduction in price effected.

With the invention of printing, and the power of increasing our supply of paper, at a very cheap rate, to an unlimited extent, we possess means for instructing, enlightening, and civilizing the human race, which could never have been dreamed of even in the wildest reveries of the ancient philosophers. In a future number we shall give some further particulars with regard to the construction of ancient books. Z.

Never meddle with other folks' business, and less with the public, (in all called to the one by the parties concerned, (in which move cautiously and uprightly,) and required to the other by the Lord, in a testimony for his name and truth; remembering that old, but most true and excellent proverb, Bene qui latuit, bene vixit, "He lives happily that lives hiddenly or privately," for he lives quietly. It is a treasure to them that have it; study it, get it, keep it; too many miss it, that might have it. The world knows not the value of it. It doubles man's life, by giving him twice the time to himself, that a large acquaintance, or much business will give him.—Penn's Advice.

Avoid discontented persons, unless to inform or reprove them. Abhor detraction, the sin of fallen angels, and the worst of fallen men.—Ibid.

STANZAS.

Go, take the morning's wings, and speed thy flight
Beyond the reach of thought; lo! He is there—
Go, wrap thyself in darkness; tenfold night
Will prove no covering—He is every where—
In everlasting blessedness remaining,
Diffus'd through all things, and all things sustaining.

He, who in yonder azure deep of air,
Bade worlds on worlds in dazzling splendour roll,
The abode of myriads, questionless—who share
The love unbounded of the all moving soul,
Whose bounty stills the infant raven's calls,
By whom unheeded not a sparrow falls.

His eye is on thee! His, by whom was given
The glorious mission of redeeming love,
By Jordan's waters, where, from opening Heaven,
On glowing pinion, came the mystic dove;
His eye is on thee! which alike pervades
Virtue's pure path and guilt's polluted shades.

And they, the dwellers in those blessed places,
The heavenly mansions, whether near or far
From us their station in the expanse of space is,
With cloudless vision view us as we are;
Man's darkest deed and thought illum'd lies
In broad exposure to angelic eyes.

And had not power divine for ever barr'd
To sorrow's entrance their abode sublime,
How oft must earth celestial peace have marr'd,
And angel bosoms ach'd for human crime;
How often grovelling man's insane career,
From eyes seraphic drawn the burning tear.

But though divinely shielded from the intrusion,
Of sin's unfailing fruit and follower wo,
When the transgressor wakes from guilt's delusion,
Augmented bliss superior spirits know,
By Truth's own lips has been the assurance given,
O'er such repentant there is joy in Heaven.

When the poor wanderer in a land unblest'd,
Cheerless and waste—the land of sin and shame,
Repentant turn'd, with many a fear depress'd,
To that dear holy home from whence he came,
Did frowns repelling bid the wretch depart?
Did cold endurance chill his breaking heart?

Ah, no! while yet far off, he feebly strove,
With tottering steps, to take his homeward way,
The anxious glances of paternal love,
With smiles of welcome, baid'd the weak essay;
With mercy met him, and his soul's alarms
Were all forgotten in a Father's arms.

Then raise thy head in hope, thou broken hearted,
Tossed with tempests, and dismay'd with fears,
Angels, and spirits of the just departed,
With love and pity, witness all thy tears;
Thy sighs ascend before the eternal throne,
And all the conflicts of thy soul are known.

WHAT DO THE FUTURES SPEAK OF?

In answer to a question in the Greek Grammar.

They speak of never-withering shades,
And bowers of opening joy;
They promise mines of fairy gold,
And bliss without alloy.

They whisper strange enchanting things
Within Hope's greedy ears;
And sure this tuneful voice exceeds
The music of the spheres.

They speak of pleasure to the gay,
And wisdom to the wise;
And sooth the poet's beating heart
With fame that never dies.

In every language, every tongue,
The same kind things they say;
In gentle slumbers speak by night,
In waking dreams by day.

Cassandra's fate reversed is theirs;
She, true, no faith could gain,—
They every passing hour deceive,
Yet are believed again. BARBAULD.

FOR THE FRIEND.

One of the peculiar distinguishing characteristics of the religious Society of Friends, arises from the principles they hold on the subject of gospel ministry. They profess, in the language of Robert Barclay, that "it is left to the free gift of God, to choose any whom he seeth meet thereunto, whether rich or poor, servant or master, young or old, yea, male or female. And such as have this call, verify the gospel by preaching, not in speech only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much fulness." 1 Thess. i. 5. "Moreover, they who have this authority, may, and ought to preach the gospel, though without human commission or literature." In consequence whereof, a large number of their ministers, both men and women, have been poor and illiterate; indeed, the number has been very few that can, with propriety, be called learned. It is probable, that Robert Barclay and William Penn were two of the most noted for their talents and literature that have ever been ministers in the society. Their testimony, therefore, on this subject, is entitled to much weight, having been themselves allied to families of worldly greatness, and received a collegiate education, they wrote from powerful experience. Their works abound with passages expressive of their sentiments on this subject, not necessary to be fully quoted. Robert Barclay, in his Apology, after stating the principles in Proposition x. of the ministry, to be, "As by the light, or gift of God, all true knowledge in things spiritual is received and revealed, so by the same, as it is manifested and received in the heart, by the strength and power thereof, every true minister of the gospel is ordained, prepared, and supplied in the work of the ministry; and by the leading, moving, and drawing hereof, ought every evangelist and Christian pastor, to be led and ordered in his labour and work of the gospel both as to the place where, as to the persons to whom, as to the time wherein he is to minister," gives his evidence to their truth in section 23 of the same proposition thus: "And if in any age since the apostles' days, God hath purposed to show his power by weak instruments, for the battering down of that carnal and heathenish wisdom, and restoring again the ancient simplicity of truth, this is it. For in our day, God hath raised up witnesses for himself, as he did fishermen of old; many, yea, most of whom are labouring and mechanic men, who altogether without that learning, have, by the power and Spirit of God, struck at the very root and ground of Babylon; and in the strength and might of this power, have gathered thousands, by reaching their consciences, into the same power and life, who, as to the outward part, have been far more knowing than they, yet, not able to resist the virtue that proceeded from them. Of which I myself am a true witness; and declare from certain experience, because, my heart hath been often greatly broken and tendered by that virtuous life that proceeded from the powerful ministry of those illiterate men, so that by their very countenance, as well as words, I have felt the evil in me often chained down, and the good reached to, and raised. What shall I say, then, to you, who are lovers of learning and admirers of knowledge! Was not I also a lover and admirer of it, who also sought after it, according to my age and capacity? But it pleased God, in his unutterable love, early to withstand my vain endeavours, while I was yet but eighteen years of age; and make me seriously to consider, (which I wish also may befall others,) that without holiness and regeneration no man can see God; and that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and to depart from iniquity a good understanding; and how much knowledge puffeth up, and leadeth away from that inward quietness, stillness, and humility of mind, where the Lord appears, and his heavenly wisdom is revealed. If ye consider these things, then will ye say with me, that all this learning, wisdom, and knowledge, gathered in this fallen nature, is but as dross and dung, in comparison of the cross of Christ; especially being destitute of that power, life and virtue, which I perceived these excellent (though despised, because illiterate) witnesses of God to be filled with: and therefore seeing that in and among them, I, with many others, have found the heavenly food that gives contentment, let my soul seek after this learning, and wait for it for ever."

And William Penn, in his preface to the journal of George Fox, observes: "And, indeed, it showed, beyond all contradiction, that God sent him, that no arts or parts had any share in the matter or manner of his ministry, and that so many great, excellent, and necessary truths as he came forth to preach to mankind, had, therefore, nothing of man's wit or wisdom to recommend them. So that as to man, he was an original, being no man's copy. And his ministry and writings show they are from one that was not taught of man, nor had learned what he said by study. Nor were they notional or speculative, but sensible and practical truths, tending to conversion and regeneration, and the setting up of the kingdom of God in the hearts of men, and the way of it was his work. So that I have many times been overcome in myself, and been made to say, with my Lord and Master, upon the like occasion, 'I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent of this world, and revealed them to babes;' for many times hath my soul bowed in an humble thankfulness to the Lord, that he did not choose any of the wise and learned of this world to be the first messenger in our age of his blessed truth to men; but that he took one that was not of high degree, or elegant speech, or learned after the way of this world, that his message and work he sent him to do, might come with less suspicion or jealousy of human wisdom and interest, and with more force and clearness upon the consciences of those that sincerely sought the way of truth in the love of it. I say, beholding with the eye of my mind, which the God of heaven had opened in me, the marks of God's finger and hand visibly in this testimony from the clearness of the principle, the power and efficacy of it in the exemplary sobriety, plainness, zeal, steadiness, humility, gravity, punctuality, charity, and circumspect care in the government of church affairs, which shine in his and their life and testimony, that God employed in this work, it greatly confirmed me that it was of God, and engaged my soul in a deep love, fear, reverence, and thankfulness for his love and mercy therein to mankind; in which mind I remain, and shall I hope to the end of my days."

FOR THE FRIEND.

THE ELDERS OF PHILADELPHIA AND ELIAS HICKS.

Elias Hicks, as I have stated, arrived in Philadelphia on the 7th of the 12th month, 1822. It was part of his prospect to pay a religious visit to the families composing Green street monthly meeting. On the evening of his arrival, three members of that meeting, neither elders nor overseers, called on him at his lodgings, and agreed to convene a number of Friends at Green street, to make arrangements for him to proceed immediately with his visit. Leonard Snowden and Joseph Scattergood, two of the elders; were informed, at the close of the morning meeting, that such a conference was to be held in the evening. After objecting to the irregularity of the proceeding, they concluded to attend the meeting, where they found the overseers, eight other Friends, and Elias and his companion. Elias opened his prospect, and proposed that his certificates should be read. This was objected to, as irregular. It has been the uniform practice in this city to submit all such concerns to the judgment of the monthly meeting, and it was therefore contended that it would be proper, in the present instance, to pursue that course. Elias replied, that if there was any such custom here, it was contrary to gospel order, and ought to be disregarded. The objection of the elders was overruled, the certificates were read, and arrangements made for commencing the visit immediately.

He proceeded in it the next morning, and had nearly completed it at the time of the monthly meeting, which occurred on the 19th of that month. At this meeting his certificates were read, and endorsed with expressions of unity. The two elders alluded to, having no unity with his doctrines or conduct, declined receiving a visit from him. By the train of circumstances I have recited, these Friends were placed in a situation with respect to their fellow members of Green street meeting, that was both unpleasant and embarrassing. In the conscientious discharge of their duty, as elders, they had been compelled to protest against doctrines hostile, as they deemed, and as has since been fully proved, to the Christian religion itself. The greater number of their fellow members, on the other hand, was captivated by the eloquence, and seduced by the reasonings of Elias Hicks, and paid him a deference amounting almost to veneration. Between such conflicting opinions there could be no union. The overseers of that meeting acting, it is believed, under the influence of the feelings thus excited, sought frequent occasions for bringing these friends under censure. Two of their number, (one of whom was an elder,) called upon Leonard Snowden and Joseph Scattergood a few weeks after Elias had left the city, and represented to them, that by signing the letter of the elders to that Friend, they had acted contrary to the sense of the monthly meeting, and that they ought to make an acknowledgment to the meeting. They replied, that they believed they had discharged their duty, and could make no acknowledgment of having committed a fault. In about a month, the same Friends called on Leonard Snowden, and renewed the request, insisting upon it, that many members of the meeting would never be satisfied until he did, and intimating that if he persisted in his refusal, the meeting would displace him from his station as elder.

It may be proper here to remark that the rule of discipline respecting the mode of displacing ministers and elders from their station is clear and explicit. Their office does not exempt them from the ordinary proceedings in case they have violated the discipline, and subjected themselves to disownment. But it is obvious that circumstances may often occur disqualifying them for their station, yet not involving their privileges as members. In such cases, the rule of common law and right reason is adopted, and they are to be tried by their peers. They are considered as being under the care of their particular select meeting, which, with the assistance of a committee from the select quarterly meeting, decides upon the case; and if their judgment be unfavourable, the subject is then, and not till then, transmitted by the select meeting to the monthly meeting for its care. Leonard Snowden urged upon the elder and overseer the propriety of observing this course, and was answered, that "that would not do, for it was pretty well understood how it would be determined, if that course were adopted."

At the preparative meeting of ministers and elders, held in the 4th month, 1823, when the third query respecting unity was under consideration, Leonard Snowden informed the meeting that they could not in their present situation, answer that query affirmatively; and it was proposed that a committee be appointed to investigate the cause of the uneasiness. The appointment was warmly resisted, on the ground that the case alluded to was under care of the overseers. As the meeting could come to no decision, it was agreed to apply to the select quarterly meeting for assistance. A committee was appointed by this meeting in the 7th mo. 1823, which attended the select preparative meeting in the 10th and 4th months following, without obtaining from the Friends who were dissatisfied with the two elders a specification of the cause of their uneasiness.

On the 24th of the 5th month, 1824, the two overseers (one of them an elder) again called on Leonard Snowden, and read some written charges against him, which chiefly had reference to the proceedings here related. Those charges he refuted, and maintained the correctness of his conduct, contending that the overseers were acting contrary to discipline.

At the preparative meeting held in the 6th month, the principal overseer in this affair requested, on behalf of his fellow officers, the appointment of a committee to assist them in a case of difficulty. A large committee was appointed, to whom the case of these Friends was opened, and by a majority of whom it was agreed to take the charges immediately forward, but in such a shape as not to affect their rights of membership. On the 28th of that month, Joseph Scattergood was mercifully released, by death, from this scene of persecution.

At the preparative meeting in the 7th month, one of the committee of conference with the overseers reported, that they had attended to their appointment. At the select preparative meeting, which was held on the afternoon of the same day, the committee of the select quarterly meeting attended, and the charge against Leonard Snowden was, for the first time, distinctly stated there, viz. signing the letter to Elias Hicks.

On the next day, the elder and overseer, on whom the burden of this persecution seemed to rest, met Leonard in the street, and told him, that the overseers had agreed to take his case to the monthly meeting the next 5th day, unless he resigned his station of elder, or made an acknowledgment to the meeting. Leonard Snowden could do neither under present circumstances, and the overseer accordingly stated to the monthly meeting, held on the 22d, that the case of difficulty, in which they had requested assistance, had been agreed to be laid before that meeting, but on account of some irregularity it was postponed, in order to lay it first before the preparative meeting.

FOR THE FRIEND.
OHIO AND INDIANA EPISTLE.

The writers of this epistle state, that "that part of the Society who stand opposed" to them, "in many places, though few in number, have assumed the power to disown" the separatists. The sentence fully admits that those who do not unite in the separation are Friends, otherwise they could not be a "part of the Society;" but though this admission is correct, the subsequent part is not quite as much so; for Friends have assumed no power. It is a fact, that in many parts of our yearly meeting, they have been engaged in the faithful maintenance of our christian discipline; and in the regular exercise of the powers vested in them by the constitution of the Society, monthly meetings have dealt with, and issued testimonies against those who have been engaged in promoting the work of division and discord. It matters not how few those are who thus adhere to and maintain the long established discipline of the church, their disownments are none the less valid for the paucity of their numbers, since the rules of discipline are the acknowledged law of the Society; and laws must be supported, so long as they are in force, over those who violate them, or else all good government, whether in civil or religious society, would be at an end. Ten of the persons who signed the epistle under review, have been thus regularly disowned, and have no longer any claim to the privileges of membership in the religious Society of Friends. However unpleasant it may be to them to be thus disunited from the body, they certainly have no just cause for complaint. For in this very epistle they acknowledge having been concerned in various transactions, which are direct violations both of the spirit and letter of our excellent code of discipline; viz. withdrawing from the Society, and from the meetings where they belonged, and attempting in a disorderly manner to attach themselves, without the requisite certificates, to meetings where they neither resided nor belonged, and where, of consequence, they could have no rights; in setting up a meeting, which they call a yearly meeting, without the unity or consent of the Society, and in opposition to it; in issuing epistles to its members without its concurrence, and holding separate caucus meetings in many places, "unauthorized by the society, and unknown to its discipline," with a view to spread disaffection and disunity, and to draw away its members from religious communion. All these are serious offences against "the excellent order which the Society, has been favoured, in a good degree, to maintain;" and direct acts of rebellion against the discipline and constitution, which has hitherto been the outward bond of our union, and has proved, under the divine blessing, as a wall of preservation and defence round about us.

In all the epistles which they have issued, the followers of Elias Hicks admit the excellence of the discipline established among Friends, and have not hesitated to declare that it was instituted in divine wisdom: their departures from it are, therefore, the more inexcusable, and must be attributed to the influence of "the spirit of discord and confession," "which has introduced and is disposed to continue such disorders amongst us."

In their epistle of the 6th month last, speaking of those who "forsake the fundamental principle of our union," and thus "break the bond of gospel fellowship, and, as far as their influence extends, frustrate the design of religious society;" they declare, that "if such, after the use of proper means, cannot be reclaimed, the peace, harmony, and welfare of the body require that they should be separated from our communion." It is obvious, therefore, that the religious Society of Friends, in disowning these seceders, who have so repeatedly and openly violated "our excellent discipline," has acted in strict conformity with the instructions which the separatists themselves have given, in their official printed address to their own meetings. However they may affect to consider the disownments made by Friends of no importance, they must be aware of the fact, that they are as valid and effectual as any which the Society has ever made, and are performed in the regular process prescribed by the discipline. Every individual thus "separated from our communion" has the right of an appeal to the superior meetings, if he believes himself aggrieved, or disowned without discipline. But although the framers of the epistle to Ohio and Indiana pretend to consider the disownments as "not being sanctioned by discipline," yet not one of those who have been so disowned has availed himself of this regular and constitutional mode of redress; an evidence that they are conscious of having transgressed the order of the Society, and that they are rightly dismembered from it.

The contradiction which exists between the different epistles issued by the followers of Elias Hicks, must have struck every attentive and dispassionate reader; but the one to Ohio and Indiana furnishes us with an instance as palpable as any we have before noticed.

The epistle from their "general meeting" in the 5th mo. commences with stating that "the wing of ancient goodness being sensibly extended over the several sittings of this meeting, we have been enabled weightily to consider the subjects that came before us. After solemn deliberation, and a free interchange of sentiment, it was, with much unanimity, agreed to recommend the following views and propositions for your serious consideration." Among "the propositions" thus solemnly introduced and enjoined upon the attention of their friends, is the one we have just quoted, in which they declare that "the peace, and harmony, and welfare of the body require that such should be separated from the communion" as do not unite with their views. The paragraph which contains this important "proposition" is inserted on the fourth page of the epistle to Ohio and Indiana; but the quotation stops short when it comes to this sentence, and entirely omits it, for reasons which will presently appear. It seems that at the time of the sixth month meeting, "the weighty consideration" and solemn deliberations" of the followers of Elias Hicks, resulted in a determination to disown the Society of Friends; and this conclusion was officially conveyed to their "quarterly and monthly meetings" in the epistle then issued. But with all their professions of "ardent desires that their movements may be under the guidance of Him who only can lead in safety," their course seems to be extremely variable and uncertain; changing with every change of circumstance, and regulated by no better rule than that of gratifying the feelings of the multitude, so as to allure greater numbers to their standard. Since the meeting in the 6th month many of the separatists have been regularly disowned by Friends, as we have already noticed; and as was to be expected, a great outcry has been raised against the unkindness and cruelty of these disownments.

The epistle to Ohio and Indiana falls in with the popular clamour, and for the very purpose of making an impression on the minds of persons at a distance, that the seceders are exercising great moderation and charity in not disowning Friends, "recommends a view" directly contrary to that of the sixth month. "A care prevails with Friends (separatists,) say they, not to retaliate disownment for disownment; but leaving them (Friends) to Him who judgeth righteously, we are endeavouring to support our Christian discipline among ourselves," &c. &c. Thus we see, that in the short space of eight months their official documents, loaded with the most serious and awful pretences to divine direction, solemn deliberation, weighty consideration, &c. &c. recommend two different and contradictory practices in relation to the very same subject; a circumstance of itself sufficient to satisfy any unprejudiced mind, that the high professions which they make are hollow and deceitful.

If "a care prevails with them not to disown Friends, but leave them to Him who judgeth righteously," what becomes of "the peace, and harmony, and welfare of the body," which they positively declared but a little while ago, require that "such should be separated from their communion?" If their assertions are true, they are "condemned out of their own mouths," for purposely neglecting those measures which "the peace, and harmony, and welfare of the body" imperiously demand. On the other hand, if they are not true, the followers of Elias Hicks stand convicted of publishing to the world, in the name of their new society, flat contradictions and falsehoods, and "recommending them to the serious consideration" of the brethren.

The separatists are continually boasting of their numbers, and calling themselves "the great body of Friends," "the greater part of the Society," "nineteen twentieths of our numbers," &c. &c. as if they considered the strength and reputation of a religious body to rest solely on the principle of numbers. But it will ever be found to be the fact that "the multitude run to do evil;" that "the great body" of people are those who "neither fear God, nor regard man, any further than the arm of civil power compels them; that numbers, instead of indicating the justice or righteousness of a cause, are oftener a proof that there is something in the object of pursuit peculiarly agreeable to the corrupt inclinations and licentious appetites of a fallen and degenerate race. But boasters generally overrate themselves, and we are well assured, that the pompous display of numbers made by the new sect far outstrips the truth. If, however, they are "the great body," "nineteen twentieths of the Society," how happens it that they are brought to the acknowledgment that "there appeared no way to regain the harmony and tranquillity of the body, but by withdrawing themselves?" "Nineteen twentieths" withdraw from one twentieth! "the great body" from "the few!" and this too, when they tell us that they have a discipline which "is a wall of defence on the right hand and on the left, and protecting all, even the weakest of the flock." If "the great body" are so wonderfully "crowned with the divine blessing," and so peculiarly the objects of "divine favour and regard," and the Society of Friends have really committed the grievous disorders of which the separatists so bitterly accuse them, why did not the "nineteen twentieths" "faithfully administer, in the spirit of forbearance and love," that "excellent discipline" and "blessed order of the gospel," which they tell us "will ever be found sufficient for the government of the church?"

The truth is, and with all their professions to the contrary they are fully aware of it, the followers of Elias Hicks are not the Society of Friends, either as regards doctrines or discipline, but have openly separated from it—they know that they have departed widely from the ancient and acknowledged principles of the body; and so far from maintaining its discipline, they have repeatedly violated it, and broken up, so far as they could, the very constitution of the Society. Hence, any attempt on their part to deal with and disown Friends, must be perfectly nugatory; or, as one of their leaders remarked, "mere child's play; disowning people who never belonged to them." "Such disownments" would indeed "be of no effect," and to this cause, rather than to any moderation or forbearance of theirs, is to be attributed the circumstance of their not disowning us.

What befell for want of a Latch.

M. Say, a celebrated French writer on political economy, has the following story: "Being in the country, I had an example of one of those small losses which a family is exposed to through negligence. From the want of a latch of small value, the wicket of a barn yard (looking to the fields) was often left open; every one who went through drew the door to, but having no means to fasten it, it remained flapping; the poultry escaped, and were lost. One day, a fine pig got out and ran into the wood, and immediately all the world was after it; the gardener—the cook—the dairy maid—all ran to recover the swine. The gardener got sight of him first, and jumped over a ditch to stop him; he sprained his ankle, and was confined a fortnight to the house. The cook, on her return, found all the linen she had left to dry by the fire, burned; and the dairy maid, having run off before she tied up the cows, one of them broke the leg of a colt in the stable. The gardener's lost time was worth twenty crowns, valuing his pain at nothing; the linen burned and the cloth spoiled were worth as much more. Here is a loss of forty, crowns, and much pain, trouble, vexation, and inconvenience, for want of a latch, which would not cost three pence, and this loss, through careless neglect, falls on a family little able to support it."

Love silence, even in the mind; for thoughts are to that, as words to the body, troublesome. Much speaking, as much thinking, spends—and in many thoughts, as well as words, there is sin. True silence is the rest of the mind, and is to the spirit, what sleep is to the body, nourishment and refreshment. It is a great virtue; it covers folly, keeps secrets, avoids disputes, and prevents sin.—Penn's Advice to his Children.

Nothing forms so truly great and dignified a character as "the meekness and gentleness of Christ."—Jane Taylor.

FOR THE FRIEND. ANCIENT BOOKS. (Concluded.)

The instruments used in writing were as various as the form and materials of ancient books. When brazen, leaden, or waxed tablets were employed, a needle, called a style, was used, the upper end of which being smooth and flat, served to make any erasures which occasion required.

Styles were, at first, most frequently formed of iron or brass, but angry disputants having sometimes fatally used these pointed weapons, they were prohibited, and the metallic styles were superseded by those of ivory, bone, or wood.

For the purpose of writing with ink a calamus was employed, formed most commonly of an Egyptian reed, from which the instrument took its name. Persons of distinction often wrote with a calamus of silver. Though the use of quills seems to have been early known, yet the reed for a long time was preferred. In the figures which adorn many ancient manuscripts, a writing desk is represented, with a scalpel for trimming the pen, compasses for measuring the distances of the lines, and scissors for cutting the paper.

The ink of the ancient manuscripts seems to have resembled a pigment more than the thin liquid used in modern writing; and though less fluent and less adapted to rapid and continuous movements of the pen, was much more durable than the modern article. The soot of lamps, and the coal of ivory and fine woods powdered, mixed with gums, and diluted with acids, were the principal ingredients in the compound. In ornamenting works of celebrity, the ancients spared no labour or expense. Many of the manuscripts now extant, contain numerous pictorial ornaments, consisting of flowers, cyphers, and even historical compositions. For these ornamental purposes, and sometimes for the whole text of a book, red, purple, blue, and gold and silver inks were employed; and such was the high perfection which the ancients attained in the preparation of these substances, that books are now to be found in many of the European libraries with colouring and gilding almost as perfect and fresh, after the lapse of centuries, as they were at the time of their first execution.

The most ancient Greek manuscripts extant show, that writing, in early times, must have been a very slow and tedious process. The letters being all capitals, of a square and stiff character, were probably formed as distinctly and separately as they would have been if engraved on wood or stone. After several minor improvements, the capital, or uncial character, gave place to a more easy and expeditious form of letter.

The upright and square forms were changed to curves and slopes, which retained a considerable resemblance to the original letter, though capable of being used with much greater freedom and facility.

Those who copied books for gain, taking advantage of the discovery of this running character, were not content with joining the letters of each word, but combined them together into a species of short hand. The books of the tenth century abound with contractions, abbreviations, and symbols.

With all the facilities, however, which could be given to manuscripts, it is easy to believe that books must have been scarce and dear; accordingly we find that the possession of literary treasure was, for centuries, principally confined to persons of considerable opulence, or to religious and literary institutions.

So great was the value of books, that the present of a single volume to a monastery, entitled the donor to a daily mass for his soul, and oftentimes to complete priestly absolution for his sins, the book being offered with great solemnity upon the altar of the chapel. The bishop of Winchester, in 1299, borrowing a very valuable copy of the Bible, gave a bond for the return of it, drawn up with much form and solemnity;—a practice which we should not much dislike to see revived in modern times, as many a goodly private library, which now suffers from inveterate book borrowers, might, under the wholesome regulation imposed upon the bishop, escape these depredations.

Many of the ancient books appear to have been formed of square leaves, stitched together somewhat after the present fashion, and covered with linen, silk, or leather. When formed of dyed skins, or of parchment, they were frequently rolled up in scrolls. One side of the skins only being written upon, they were joined together sometimes to the length of several yards, and rolled upon a cylinder. To each end of this cylinder was affixed a ball made of wood or horn, and often ornamented with silver, gold, or precious stones; on the outside was generally written the title. In the oriental countries it was, and we believe is still customary, to roll up their books in the manner just described, and envelop them in an elegant and costly covering, with a syllabus of the contents of the work inscribed upon it. The Greek father, Chrysostom, has made a very beautiful illustration of the text—"In the volume of the book it is written of me," by supposing that the word translated volume, in reality signified the wrapper or envelope, upon which the general title of the sacred volume was written; and that the words, "the Messiah cometh," were inscribed upon the book of the law and prophets, as being the sum and substance of the whole.

This opinion, we have no doubt, is well founded, as a more appropriate title could not possibly have been inscribed upon the prophetic writings; the very design of which was to point to the introduction of a higher and more enduring dispensation, by the coming and sufferings of Jesus Christ, our blessed Lord and Saviour.

The history of ancient books, and their transmission to modern times, is one of great interest when connected with Biblical study and criticism, and much very interesting matter in reference to this part of the subject might be given, which our present narrow limits forbid.

To those who feel any inclination to pursue the subject further, we would recommend that excellent work entitled "Horne's Introduction to the study of the Scriptures," as well for its references to other authentic sources of information, as for the instructive matter which is contained in its own pages.

FOR THE FRIEND.

Having amused myself with making a few extracts from the eighth and ninth numbers of the Gardener's Magazine, a work replete with curious and valuable information, I have thought they would form an agreeable variety for the literary department of "The Friend." A taste for gardening is spreading in this country, and there are few more innocent and healthful indulgences. The temper of mind which the regulated cultivation of natural history, and more especially of botany, tends to form, is one of cheerfulness, contentment, and piety. Yet, it is melancholy to reflect, how often men have turned a deaf ear to the instruction of the book of nature. Among no class of learned men has infidelity found more numerous advocates, than among the mere naturalists. Devoting their lives to the details of their science—to exploring the inexhaustible forms of the material world, they have too often let the moral lesson which they might have been taught escape. The mere study of classification is barren of all moral truth; and amidst the most glorious displays of Almighty beneficence, it is possible for purblind science to perceive nothing more noble than the properties of matter, and the relations of form and colour. I am not about to write a sermon, or a treatise on education; but the train of thought to which the above reflections lead, may show the theoretical errors of those systems of education which have latterly become fashionable, and which confine the training of the youth to the cultivation of the senses, which attempt by the study of mere physics to give to the expanding intellect, that strength and stature, that grace and manliness, which are imparted by the diligent and joint application to ethical and metaphysical, to classical and mathematical studies. Yet I would not be understood as wishing to depreciate the value of natural history as a superadded science. To one whose principles are built upon the fixed basis of moral truth, the study of natural science will prove a source of inexhaustible delight, leading his mind continually to new views of the goodness and wisdom of the Creator, and teaching him continually lessons of love and kindness to all around and beneath him. The genuine effect of true learning upon the heart is the farthest possible from that of the spirit of infidelity, to which so many of the exclusive votaries of natural history have enslaved themselves. I had no intention, in penning a preface to the extracts which follow, of entering into a discussion of these high matters, but my pen has followed the train of my thoughts, and I am not unwilling to express my sentiments respecting a branch of study, the value of which, great as it unquestionably is, has been much overrated.

HORTICULTURAL VARIETIES.

On prolonging the season of hardy fruits. By J. FORBES.

By covering currant and gooseberry bushes with bunting or matting, he preserves the fruit in good preservation till after Christmas. A covering of bunting he supposes to be the most efficacious, and says that he has successfully retarded by its use, peaches, plums, apricots, and cherries, without injuring their flavour, to a late period of the season, covering the tree just when it begins to ripen. Another correspondent states, that having tied a paper bag round a fine bunch of grapes which were ripe by the end of the 8th month, and leaving it on the vine, he cut the bunch on the first of the 3d month following, in a perfectly good and highly flavoured state.

The art of ornamenting, showing, preserving, and packing cucumbers, grapes, plums, and other fruits, whose principal beauty consists in their delicate bloom. By Robert Gaucen.

"We have all read with delight 'the butterfly's ball' and 'cock robin's wedding,' but who ever heard before of the cucumber's toilet? The former pleased us in the nursery, to make the latter is the grave business of hard toiling men. Madame Cucumber is first to be made straight by being put in corsets—she is then to be delicately painted, not with rouge, but magnesia, and as a smooth skin, in her code of fashion, is the greatest of blemishes, she is covered with artificial prickles, and her head surmounted with a faded flower. This, though it seems like jesting, is no joke, though it is an art of which we poor cis-atlantic rustics are as yet ignorant. 'Among florists and growers of prize fruits, manual decoration is of equal importance in many cases with successful growth; the petals of the carnation require to be dressed on a card; the cucumber straitened, and the plum powdered with artificial bloom.' To secure a delicate bloom to the cucumber, it must be protected by two pieces of glass, one beneath and one above, from the damp of the soil and the drip of the lights. To procure great length, small girth, and the straightness of a gun barrel, which are the points of beauty in a cucumber, it is placed between two pieces of wood, which are drawn together at night, and serve as reflectors of solar heat in the day. By this means the fruit can be lengthened from eight or ten to ten or twelve inches. Before cutting the fruit, it must be kept between these strips for at least twenty-four hours to render it perfectly straight. If the bloom is injured by the process, it is put in a blooming box, an ingenious contrivance, which the fashionables might imitate to advantage, and is there delicately dusted with magnesia. The next process is to supply the prickles, which are apt to be too loosely scattered on fine fruit to please the eye of connoisseurs. For this purpose a kind of Talio-cotian process is performed, the prickles being taken from other fruit, and neatly fastened by means of gum water; so distributing them over the surface as to imitate nature. To render the cucumber perfectly beautiful the decayed blossom must appear still adhering to the summit; if this be wanting, a wise gardener will supply its place by one taken from another fruit. When all this delicate manipulation is performed, and three cucumbers (a leash, as the knowing ones term it) of equal length, size, arrangement of prickle, and bloom, as perfect a match, in short, as possible, are obtained, the happy proprietor may hold up his head at a flower and fruit show; and after the F. R. S.'s and the right honourables, who preside at these festivals, have deliberated the matter with becoming gravity, he may receive the service of plate, or the silver tankard, which is to reward his patriotic exertions. All trades have their fashions. The London fruiterers restore the bloom of their yellow grapes by fumigating them with sulphur, and dust their plums with "powder blue" to renovate their beauty. The green grocers of Petersburg practise arts which remind us of Chinese ingenuity and patience. Among other schemes for supplying the markets, they buy up the ends of asparagus that has been used at the tables of the great, carve a new summit, colour it, add a bloom, make up the ends so prepared in bundles, with a few fresh stalks outside, and sell the whole as genuine asparagus.

Telfaria Pedata.—An extraordinary climbing plant, from the eastern coast of Africa. The fruit is three feet long, and eight or ten inches in diameter, full of seeds as large as chestnuts, which are as excellent and agreeable as almonds, and when pressed yield an abundance of oil, equal to that of the finest olives. Perennial; on the margins of forests, enveloping the trees with its branches. Plants have flowered in the stove at Bury Hill. Mr. Telfair has sent seeds to the Isle of Bourbon, New Holland, Otaheite, and New Zealand, and will thus have the honour of giving a most useful vegetable to mankind at large, as well as a name to a new and very beautiful plant.

Moss Roses.—A few leagues from Evora, (Portugal,) in a north-west direction, is a small village called Alcovas de Roses, from the quantities of beautiful moss roses growing wild about it hedges in every direction. They are as numerous as the blackberries in our own hedge-rows.

Covent Garden Market.—The first peas from the open ground were produced on the 17th of May, and sold for three guineas (fourteen dollars) a quart. The same day the best new potatoes sold for 2s. (45 cents) and 2s. 6d. (55 cents) per pound. Strawberries, from the 17th to the 30th of May, varied from 1s. 6d. (33 cents) to 2s. 6d. (55 cents) per ounce. The first strawberries from the open garden came to market on the 31st of May.

"The ingenious valet of the cucumbers above named, has invented another scheme equally amusing and curious; and resembling somewhat the device of the learned doctor Martinus Scriblerus for relieving "consumptive or asthmatic persons, by bringing fresh air out of the country to town by pipes of the nature of the recipients of air pumps." This is no less than creating an artificial climate around each particular bunch of fruit, by directing upon it a stream of heated air. A large hollow iron globe is heated by means of large lenses or mirrors by the solar rays. Tubes proceed from the globe to those parts of the plants which require warmth, and the globe being open at each end, a current of heated air continually passes through the tubes, and is said to answer the desired purpose."

No fruit improves more by cultivation than the gooseberry. At the shows in England they are often seen to weigh more than a Troy ounce.

Chelsea Botanic Garden, July 9th.—There are now in flower here three hundred sorts of wheat, viz. fifteen species, with their varieties; forty sorts of oats, and eighteen of barley."

"The tulip bed of ——— Strong at Shepherd's bush, is said to contain more choice and valuable sorts than any in the neighbourhood of London. The spare roots were sold this season for about £500. One poor looking man gave £18 (80 dollars.) for one bulb!"

Conveyance of Sound.—The wide spread sail of a ship, rendered concave by a gentle breeze, is also a good collector of sound. It happened once on board a ship sailing along the coast of Brazil, 100 miles from land, that the persons walking on deck, when passing a particular spot, always heard most distinctly the sound of bells, varying as in human rejoicings. All on board listened and were convinced, but the phenomenon was mysterious and inexplicable. Months afterwards, by comparing notes, it was ascertained, that at the time of observation, the bells of St. Salvador, on the Brazilian coast, had been ringing on the occasion of a festival; the sound, therefore, favoured by a gentle wind, had travelled over 100 miles of smooth water, and had been brought to a focus by the sail in the particular situation on the deck where it was listened to. It appears from this, that a machine might be constructed, having the same relation to sound that a telescope has to light.

SCRAPS,

From my Port Folio.

Thomson's hymn at the conclusion of his poem of the Seasons, is a popular production much read by the young, and familiar to most readers. It was formerly a favourite with me, but of late has not pleased me so well; much of it I think might have been advantageously omitted, and for ought that appears, it might have been written before the Christian dispensation had been heard of; and although this is a subject of too sacred and awful a nature perhaps to be more dwelt upon in a poetical way, yet in a work professing to celebrate the goodness of the Divine Being, to omit all allusion to the most signal instance thereof, seems rather amiss. The following lines were occasioned by a late perusal of it.

But can I muse in silence? can a Being,
Though fallen, and unworthy, and encompass'd
With evil, self-induced, but yet the object,
Almighty Father! of thy care and love,
Endow'd by thee with a reflecting mind,
And power to utter what that mind conceives—
Can he muse on thy goodness, and be mute?

Though glorious thy creation—this fair world,
And countless worlds around, array'd in beauty,
Harmoniously their several tracks pursuing
Through regions of unmeasur'd space, evincing
Infinite wisdom and Almighty power;
So great and glorious all! that well might David,
When pondering their immensity, and feeling
The utter nothingness of man, exclaim,
Lord! what is he, that thou art mindful of him;
The son of man, that thou should'st visit him?
And though thy throne, high o'er the Heaven of Heavens,

In glory inconceivable, be placed,
Yet art thou mindful of the poor in spirit—
The contrite one, that trembleth at thy word.

And these stupenduous monuments of power,
Walking in brightness, shall decay and vanish;
For matter, howsoever sublime in form,
Must yield obedience to the laws of nature,
By thee ordain'd, and be dissolved and perish.

Not so the spirit thou hast breath'd in man!
The undying principle of life—the power
Through endless ages to enjoy, or suffer,
The immortality which thou hast given,
Is of more value than a thousand worlds;
Yea, infinitely precious in thy sight!

So infinitely precious, as to lead thee,
Even Thee, the Eternal One! from realms of light,

To assume the nature of thy poor lost creatures;
Descend to walk on earth—a man of sorrows—
And die, to rescue from eternal ruin
The guilty, hopeless being thou hast made.

Yes, I must muse in silence; vain are words:
There is no power in language to express
The deep emotion of the adoring spirit,
When contemplating such unbounded love!

Ice.—The remarkable winter which we have had has produced a curious state of things. We are told, says the Boston Palladium, that the supplies of ice for Martinique, St. Thomas, and Havana have been shipped; and also for all the southern part of the United States, New Orleans, Charleston, Savannah, and as far south as North Carolina. But north of Wilmington, including all the towns and cities as far as Providence, the supplies have almost totally failed. The supplies for Charleston and New Orleans are said to be redundant, which have already gone.

"— The pleasures of their simple day
Beyond their native valley seldom stray;
Nought round its darling precincts can they find,
But brings some past enjoyment to the mind;
While hope, that ceaseless leans on pleasure's urn,
Keeps her wild wreath, and whispers their return."

Wordsworth.

We will not stop to detail the adventures of the Vandois during their exile, nor will our limits permit us to follow them in their unsuccessful attempts to recover their possessions. The only results of these ill-timed efforts were the loss of the protection granted to them by the canton of Berne, and their consequent removal into the territories of the protestant princes of Germany—and here, could they have been contented to renounce their country, they might have enjoyed their religious rights without molestation. But the ties which bound them to their valleys were too strong to be easily broken, and an opportunity at length offered for their return, which was eagerly embraced by the fugitives. In the summer of 1689, they secretly assembled, to the number of 800 men, on the shores of the lake of Geneva, which they crossed under the command of one of their pastors, to commence a journey of 200 miles over a mountainous country occupied by an immensely superior force, for the purpose of "expelling the usurpers of their hearths, and recovering the possession to themselves." The sufferings of this little band of unprovided exiles in crossing the rudest mountains of Savoy, whose defiles were filled with their enemies, were such as none but a race of mountaineers could have endured. Ignorant of the passes of the Alps, they were compelled to trust to the unwilling guidance of the peasants by whom they were perpetually led astray among rocks and precipices, whose sides were concealed by dense fogs. They had thus passed over a large portion of those wild regions which separated them from their country with little opposition and in singular security, when, on the eighth day of their journey, they were encountered by an army of 2500 regular troops, whom they attacked without hesitation, routed with great loss, and unwearied by a forced march and a desperate battle, immediately commenced, by moonlight, one of the steepest and most painful ascents which they had yet attempted. Here their perseverance was to be rewarded, for, when day dawned, they beheld, in the distance, the summits of their native hills, and, with one accord, they knelt down, and poured out their feelings in prayer and thanksgiving to the God of their fathers. They descended into the valleys, climbed the intervening heights, dispersed another detachment of their enemies, and one more occupied their paternal seats. The triumph of the Vandois was, however, far from being accomplished: surrounded by the combined forces of France and Savoy, they could only hope to maintain a partisan warfare until the approach of winter should drive their enemies from the field. "They were felt every where, yet to be found no where: they were constantly divided, and ever uniting; they bivouacked among the snows and rocks for fear of their enemies, and their enemies deserted the villages for fear of them." At length they entrenched themselves on a lofty mountain which "rises between two torrents, whose dark and rocky channels unite in a narrow angle at the foot of it," and to which there was but one approach, and that very abrupt. Early in the spring this position was attacked, at first unsuccessfully, by the French general, but repeated assaults compelled the defendants to yield one position after another, until at length the place was no longer tenable, and the last moments of the ill-fated Vandois seemed to have arrived. Preparations were made for an overwhelming attack; "mules were brought up laden with gibbets and halters, and the whole country invited to witness the execution of the last of the Vandois. At day break the French sounded the charge—not a shot was returned; the only remaining post was carried, but not a Vandois was to be found." This little band was first discovered retreating over a neighbouring mountain, having effected their escape by sliding down a precipice hitherto deemed impracticable. Sudden reverses at length compelled the duke of Savoy to make peace with his unoffending subjects, and even to become himself an exile and a fugitive among those whom he had so lately driven from their native land. The Vandois were, for a time, confirmed in the possession of their property; but scarcely had their sovereign recovered, by their aid, the throne of his ancestors, when a considerable number were again compelled to seek a refuge among their protestant brethren, under circumstances of the greatest cruelty and treachery. No other event of interest seems to have occurred until the reign of Napoleon, by whom the Vandois were raised to a perfect equality of civil rights with the catholics. But under the new regime they became subjects of the king of Sardinia, and are, to this day, exposed to restrictions scarcely less burdensome than those to which their fathers were subjected during the middle ages. Of these, one of the most injurious is the regulation which confines them to certain narrow limits containing but little arable land, scarcely accessible but at the most imminent risk, and from which their increasing population can, with the utmost difficulty, gain a most scanty subsistence. "It is no uncommon circumstance," says Ackland, "among the most romantic rocks to meet with a little crop of barley that seems as if transported there by enchantment. A spot level enough to retain the soil, and a lofty crag to protect it from the wind, supply sufficient stimulus for their exertion: and many acres of hay are cut, which cannot be carried down to the hamlet until snow enough has fallen to level the intervening obstacles." The Vandois are excluded from all offices; are allowed to practise in no liberal profession; are prohibited from rebuilding their churches, and even compelled to erect screens before them, to remove from the eyes of the catholics a sight so offensive. Under these difficulties, it is delightful to find that they retain their ancient simplicity of character; their purity of morals, and the soundness of their faith.

Scrupulous honesty, sobriety and temperance, industry, without the inordinate love of gain, unbounded hospitality, charity, which seeks its object even among its enemies, universal kindness and fellow feeling; such are the fruits of that faith, which has found in the valleys of Piedmont, humble, but dauntless assertors. To the Editor of the Friend.

The revolutions of empire, and the changes which time has effected in the condition of nations, are calculated to awaken "melancholy reflections on the mutability of human grandeur." In the wise ordering of Providence, the seeds of dissolution are implanted with the germ of existence; they grow with our growth, and strengthen with our strength. As it is with man individually, so it is with nations collectively; history is but the records of changes in governments; the exertions of some to rise into dominion, the struggles of others to preserve their existence, and the downfall of each in succession, to gratify the ambition of a rising and more powerful rival, which may rule for its allotted period, then moulder away, or be crushed into pieces, leaving its ruins as the only memento of its former existence. All exhibit the instability of human institutions, and prove the hope of rearing, from mutable materials, and by human wisdom or ingenuity, a political fabric, which shall be proof against the encroachments and vicissitudes of time, to be as delusive as the dreams of the alchemist, who vainly sought to eliminate from inanimate matter an elixir, which should confer upon its possessor an immortality of youth, beauty, and health.

It is not necessary, however, to look to other countries to discover the relics of governments, which have submitted to the laws of dissolution; nor are the pages of history the only depositories, where we may seek for evidence of the existence of nations which "were, but are not." The attention of the traveller, as he passes through the now thickly settled states of the west, is often arrested by the remains of rude encampments, or the receptacles for the dead, which are scattered even beyond the Mississippi, and are the only remaining, and now nearly obliterated records of a nation, or nations, which, in ages long since past and forgotten, held their sway over this extended continent. These spots were, in all probability, the scenes of the last struggle between the former inhabitants and their ruthless invaders; they fled to the fortifications, which they had erected for their defence, and here either submitted to the yoke of servitude, or, what is more probable, were immolated as victims, to gratify the vengeance of their barbarous conquerors. Of the origin of these nations, it is now vain even to conjecture; their very name is blotted out for ever; and of all they may once have been, there can only be sufficient gleaned to justify a supposition, that they had advanced in civilization far beyond those who immediately succeeded them. Compared with them, the dynasties of Europe are but the creation of yesterday; and contrasted with the total destruction and oblivion in which they are involved, the empire of Rome is not yet "gone, nor the republics of Greece left" a desolation and a waste. Rome is indeed stripped of her territories and terrors, but fragments of that once mighty empire are yet found scattered upon the shores, where she first encountered the raging flood of barbarism, which ultimately overwhelmed her; and many relics of her former grandeur still clothe her "seven eternal hills" with dignity and beauty. The glory of Greece has long since departed, and her sons submitted to the yoke of a nation, now in its turn, "struggling for its very existence;" but sufficient remains to illustrate what she once was, and amply to reward the amateur and the scholar for visiting her shores; philosophy still delights to wander there, as to the scenes of her childhood; and around her mouldering temples and desolated cities, as at the tomb of her beauty, art yet lingers to weep; but as respects the original government of America, the very tradition of their existence is lost in the multitude of years which have rolled over the graves of those who died in their defence, and their sepulchres stand insulated and alone, of all that their genius may have planned, or their ingenuity executed.

And the uncivilized extirpators of that long forgotten race, where are they? Our forefathers, who sought, in the wilds of America, an asylum from persecution, or a retreat from the turmoil of their native land, were received with open arms by a people numerous as the leaves of the forest, rude and unpolished as the children of nature, but sagacious in council, and brave in the field. Where are they now? Have their wisdom and their valour repelled the encroachments of their enemies, or has gratitude withheld our hands from aggression? Alas! no—they too are gone; their council fires have been quenched in the blood of their tribes, and the hatchet lies buried where the arm that wielded it is mouldering in the dust.

A few wretched and degenerate descendants now wander, as outcasts and aliens, in a land where their fathers were once lords of the soil. Grief has quenched that fiery eye, and want subdued that noble front and bearing, which once characterized the sons of the forest. In a mind not dead to the sympathies of nature, it must excite a train of melancholy and painful reflections, to gaze upon a few aged and venerable chiefs who yet linger around the spots hallowed by the bones of their ancestors; and it requires no effort of the imagination to read, in their manly but mournful countenances, that the thoughts of other and happier days are preying upon their spirits. These forests and those fields have been the theatre of all their pleasures, and all their hopes; here they passed the joyous hours of youth, and here anticipated an old age, cherished by their friends, and honoured by their nation. Here they first met, as strangers, and sheltered, as friends, those very men who have rewarded their kindness by despoiling them of their home and their country. The anticipations of youth have proved delusive; the expectations of manhood have never been realized; and old age has come upon them, when not one prop is left to prevent the weight of sorrow and of years from overwhelming them with infirmity and despair.

Let us, as a nation, learn wisdom from the calamities of others; lest our injustice to the many who have gone, and our ingratitude to the few who are left, may call down upon our posterity a just retribution for the injuries we have inflicted upon the defenceless and uncivilized Indian, and hasten the arrival of that period, when, to use the words of a native author, "the wide spread ruins of our cloud-capped towers, of our solemn temples, and of our magnificent cities," shall, like the works of which we have treated, become, in their turn, the mere subject of curious research or of idle conjecture. FOR THE FRIEND.

Infidels more credulous than Believers in the Scriptures.

Nothing is more frequent, than the charge of superstition and credulity, which is brought by modern unbelievers against Christians, for giving assent to moral evidence of such force as to amount to a moral demonstration. Yet the fact is, that the charge of credulity attaches with unanswerable force to those very rejectors of divine revelation. For they admit that a few illiterate Jews, devoted to external circumstances, and to a national religion, conquered their prejudices, and published an universal religion, which was free from the numerous rites and ceremonies of their nation; that they taught religious and moral doctrines surpassing the wisdom of the brightest heathens—subdued the power and policy of the Jews and Gentiles—speedily propagated their tenets among many nations—and conquered the pride of learning, without divine assistance. The opposers of revelation admit, that many persons united in propagating a forgery, which produced them no advantage; and that not one of them was induced, either by promises or by threats, to betray a plot, or to disown a testimony, which exposed them to inconveniences. A man may endure inconveniences for his country, to obtain wealth or power for himself, or in defence of a false religion which he believes to be true; but unbelievers cannot point out a single individual who exposed himself to insult, imprisonment, tortures, or death, which produced none of those conveniences. According to the creed which they profess, impostors were attached to virtue, and voluntarily endured every evil, in order to propagate opinions that were beneficial to society, but detrimental to themselves; that bad men reformed the religion and manners of all nations, or that good men attempted it by fraud and imposture. They admit that a few ignorant fishermen were able to make proselytes, in opposition to power and prejudice, to eloquence and learning; that crafty men chose for their hero a crucified malefactor, and suffered every evil in order to establish the religion of an impostor, who deluded them by false promises, if he did not rise from the dead. It is much easier to believe the facts recorded in the New Testament, than to suppose them false, and believe the absurd consequences that must follow from such a supposition. It is more credible that God should work a miracle for the establishment of a useful system of religion, than that the first Christians should act against every principle that is natural to men. It is as contrary to nature that men should prefer shame, affliction, and death, to esteem, comfort, and life, in support of a falsehood, as that the dead should be raised, or ponderous bodies hang unsupported in the air. All the mysteries of the gospel shall be clearly and satisfactorily explained, when the unbeliever can show how these, or any other things, could have been accomplished without supernatural assistance. How little credit, then, is due to those pretenders to wisdom, who are obliged to admit things more incredible than those which they reject or disbelieve! Though they affect to resemble the ancient sages in wisdom and goodness, yet are they inferior to them in both these respects. The wisest heathen sages acknowledge their own ignorance, and the imperfection of their faculties; their pretended successors are self-sufficient and disclaim all assistance. The former laboured to discover arguments for the comfortable hope of a future state; the latter to erase all apprehensions of it. The former paid great deference to things accounted sacred, while the latter turn every serious thing into jest and ridicule, and openly advocate immorality of every kind. The heathen philosophers spared even false religion for its political benefits; while the modern unbelievers attack the gospel, which is not only capable of doing much good, but has also produced the greatest blessings, moral, social, and political, in every nation that has embraced it. They who will not, by the arguments and proofs already exhibited, be convinced of the truth and certainty of the Christian religion, and be persuaded to make it the rule and guide of all their actions, would not be convinced (so far as to influence their practice and reform their lives) by any other evidence whatever; not even though one should rise from the dead on purpose to endeavour to convince them. HORNE.

Rabbits in England.—The proprietors of some of the sandy soils of England, stock them with rabbits; and these rabbit pastures are called warrens. The extent of warrens varies from 100 to 3000 acres. They are enclosed with walls of stone or turf. The varieties employed as stock are the common gray, and silver gray breeds. In severe weather in winter they are fed with hay, turnips, and oats, &c. There are twenty warrens in the East Riding of Yorkshire, which contain together 10,000 acres. One warren at Brandon, in Suffolk, returns 40,000 rabbits in a year; 20 rabbits per acre is the usual produce; the carcass defrays the rent and taxes, and the skin is profit. One gentleman in Berkshire raises rabbits of a pure white, the skins of which sell high. Many of the silver gray skins are dressed as furs, and exported to China, to be worn by the mandarins.

Indians.—The whole number of the four largest tribes within the United States is stated at 54,000. The Creeks 20,000; the Cherokees 9,000; Choctaws 21,000; and the Chickasaws 3,625. It appears from more recent information, that the number is probably much greater, and is rapidly increasing.—N.Y. Cour.

GOSPEL MINISTRY.

The two following selections are strikingly illustrative of the truth of the principles expressed in the foregoing part of this article. The first is extracted from "An account of the Life and Travels of John Churchman, a minister of the gospel in the Society of Friends, late of Nottingham, Chester county, Pennsylvania," who performed a religious visit to Friends in England, Ireland, and Holland, from the year 1750 to 1754, and exhibits the efficacy of submission in a humble individual to the call of divine wisdom, and the effects of opposition in another to the requiring of duty.

The second is taken from a "Collection of Memorials concerning divers deceased Ministers and others of the People called Quakers, in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and parts adjacent, from nearly the first settlement thereof to the year 1787." This work contains 162 memorials, nearly all of which are testimonies to the sufficiency of the divine light to constitute "a holy, spiritual, pure, and living ministry, where the ministers are both called, qualified, and ordered, actuated, and influenced, in all the steps of their ministry, by the Spirit of God."

"Having often remembered a remarkable account given me when in England, by our ancient, worthy friend, John Richardson, which, as it made some impression on my mind, I committed to writing, and now reviving, think it is worthy to be preserved, being nearly as follows, though I was not particular in regard to the time of the occurrence, viz.

"Peter Gardner, a Friend, who lived in Essex, had a concern to visit Friends in Scotland; but, being low in circumstances, and having a wife and several children, was under discouragement about it. The Lord in mercy condescended to remove his doubts, by letting him know he would be with him, and though he had no horse to ride, and was but a weakly man, yet he would give him strength to perform the journey, and sustain him so that he should not want for what was sufficient. And having faith, he laid his concern before the monthly meeting he belonged to, with innocent weight; and Friends concurring with him therein, he took his journey along the east side of the nation, through Norfolk, Lincolnshire, and Yorkshire, and coming to a week day meeting at Bridlington, where John Richardson then dwelt, he lodged at his house. In the evening, the doors being shut, Peter asked him if any Friend lived that way, (pointing with his finger.) John told him he pointed towards the sea, which was not far from thence; he said, he believed he must go and see somebody that lived that way in the morning; John asked him if he should go with him. He said, he believed it would not be best, and so went to bed.

"In the morning, when John's wife had prepared breakfast, he thought he would go and see if the Friend was well, but found the bed empty, and that he was gone, at which John Richardson wondered; but soon after Peter came in, to whom John said, 'Thou hast taken a morning walk, come to breakfast. And that before they had done eating, a friend from the quay, or harbour, (the way Peter Gardner pointed to over night,) came in, and said, 'I wonder at thee, John, to send this man with such a message to my house,' and related as follows, viz. That he came to him, as he was standing at the fish-market place, looking on the sea, to observe the wind. That he asked him if he would walk into his house. To which Peter answered, that he came for that purpose, (this was in the twilight of the morning,) that when he went into the house, he inquired whether his wife was well, to which the man answered, that she was sick in bed, and invited him to go in and see her; he said, he came so to do. Then being conducted into the chamber, where the sick woman was, he sat down by her; and after a short time told her, the will and resignation of her mind was accepted instead of the deed, and that she was excused from the journey which had been before her, and should die in peace with God and man. Then turning to the man (her husband) he said, 'Thy wife had a concern to visit the churches in another country beyond the sea, but thou wouldst not give her leave; so she shall be taken from thee; and behold, the Lord's hand is against thee, and thou shalt be blasted in whatsoever thou doest: and reduced to want thy bread. So the man seemed angry with John Richardson, who said to him, 'Be still, and weigh the matter; for I knew not of the Friend's going to thy house, but thought he was in bed, and did not inform him about thee nor thy wife,' at which he went away. So Peter pursued his journey towards Scotland, John Richardson and another Friend going with him to Scarborough on horseback, (for he would not let them go on foot with him,) he kept before them full as fast as they chose to ride; and when they had gone about half way, he gained ground of them, and John said he was filled with admiration, for he seemed to go with more slight and ease, he thought, than ever he had seen any man before; and riding fast to overtake him, he thought he beheld a small white cloud, as it were, compassing his head; when he overtook him, John said to him, 'Thou doest travel very fast; Peter replied, my master told me, before I left home, that he would give me hind's feet, and he hath performed his promise to me.

"When they came in sight of Scarborough, Peter said, take me to a Friend's house, if there is any there; John replied, I will take thee to the place where I lodge, and if thou art not easy there, I will go until we find a place, if it may be; so John Richardson took him to his lodgings, and just as they entered the door, they heard some one go up stairs, and anon the woman Friend of the house coming down with a neighbour of hers, invited them to sit down; and in a short time Peter said, Here is light and darkness, good and bad in this house. The woman, after she had got them some refreshment, came and asked John, 'Who hast thou brought here?' 'A man of God,' he replied. Having a meeting at Scarborough the next day, John Richardson staid with him, and said he had good service; he also went with him to several Friends' houses there, and he frequently spake his sense of the state of the families; but as they were near entering one house, Peter stopped and said, My Master is not there, I will not go in; so they turned away.

"Next morning, at parting, John Richardson asked him, how he was prepared for money, telling him the journey was long; to whom Peter answered, I have enough; my Master told me I should not want; and now a bit of bread, and some water from a brook, refreshes me as much as a set meal at a table; but John insisted to see how much money he had, which was but two half crowns; and upon which John took a handful of small pieces out of his pocket, and forced Peter to take them, telling him it was as free to him as his own, for so the Lord had put it into his heart; thus they parted, John and the other Friend returning home.

"In about two weeks afterwards, the man's wife (before mentioned) died, as Peter had foretold; at that time, the same man had three ships at sea, his son was master of one, a second son was on board another, and in their voyages they were all wrecked or foundered, and their cargoes chiefly lost; his two sons and several of the other hands being drowned; the man soon after broke, and could not pay his debts, but came to want bread before he died, though he had been in good circumstances, if not very rich.

"John Richardson further said, that after some time he heard Peter Gardner was dead, in Cumberland, on his return from Scotland, and being attached to him in near affection, he went to inquire how he ended.

"John Bowstead, a noted Friend near Carlisle, gave him an account, that Peter had been through Scotland, and came to Carlisle, and the small pox being there, he took the infection very suddenly, and lay ill with it. So J. Bowstead went just as the pox was coming out on him, and took him to his house; they never came out kindly, but swelled him very much, so that he was blind, and died about the seventh day, was quite sensible to the last, and knew the states of those who came to see him. He had enough to pay his funeral charges."

OHIO AND INDIANA EPISTLE.

The parade which is made in the epistle to Ohio and Indiana, as in all their others, of their "high and holy profession," "rendering good for evil," "committing their cause to him who judgeth righteously," "strictly regarding justice and equity in all their conduct," &c. &c. together with the professions of experiencing so much love and condescension, and comfort and favour, are a mere cloak, designed to conceal their outrageous conduct toward Friends; in which, so far from committing their cause to him who judgeth righteously, they have taken it into their own hands; and most manfully contended, vi et armis, for possession of property to which they had no just claim, and to the exclusion of the rightful owners. These scenes of outrage and oppression rise up in loud condemnation against all those smooth pretences, and will stand as a lasting monument of the inconsistency between the conduct and professions of the seceders. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

The same rending and dividing spirit which has desolated some of the fairest portions of the Society in this land, made its appearance at a very early period after Friends were first gathered to be a people, and assumed the same specious and goodly professions as it now does. John Steele, an eminent and powerful minister of the gospel, bore a noble testimony against its hypocrisy and deceit; in which he says, "The doctrine of that spirit is so smooth, that many cannot see a hole in it, but its nature is to divide Friends asunder, like stray sheep." Language more accurately descriptive of the doctrine and conduct of the separatists at the present day, could scarcely have been used. Under the garb of great plainness, an exterior appearance of sanctity and humility, glossed over with high professions of gospel love and concern for the cause of truth, many are going from meeting to meeting and from house to house, "leading captive the silly," and by good words and fair speeches are deceiving the simple. We have seen and known the hypocrisy and sophistry of some of these, who have privily insinuated themselves into families, under pretence of religious concern, won the esteem and affections of unsuspecting persons by flattery and attention, and then have used every artifice and persuasion to draw them away from Friends; to poison their minds with prejudices and discontent, until they have completely destroyed their peace and happiness, broken up the harmony and comfort of domestic life, and spread a cloud of gloom and sadness over scenes where, but a little while ago, contentment, affection, and peaceful enjoyment reigned. We are far from exaggerating; we speak the words of truth and soberness, and there are many whose bitter and sorrowful experience will fully confirm the accuracy of the picture we have drawn.

When we see men who have thus been spreading their disorganizing and desolating principles in the neighbourhoods where they live, and breathing forth a pestiferous influence upon the social circles in which they have been wont to mingle, until they have poisoned all within their reach; when we see such men roaming abroad in search of new prey, and endeavouring to extend their ravages into distant regions, assuming at the same time the meek and sacred character of ministers and messengers of the gospel of peace, and taking into their mouths the most awful and responsible professions which language can express, we freely acknowledge, that we shrink back with horror and dread, as from the most inveterate and dangerous enemies to the happiness, the welfare, and the harmony, both of civil and religious society. "The words of their mouths are smoother than butter, but war is in their hearts: their words are softer than oil, yet are they drawn swords." Their mein is goodly indeed, and their professions plausible, yet these are but the gilding which render the bait more alluring to the prey. Well may we exclaim with the patriarch, "Oh, my soul, come not thou into their secret, and unto their assembly, mine honour, be not thou united."

We are thankful in being able to say, that notwithstanding the contemptuous manner in which the separatists speak of Friends, they are not "the feeble few" which their epistles would represent them. Many, it is true, have seceded, but the Society is still a numerous body; and its meetings are maintained with dignity and weight, especially in those places where the followers of Elias Hicks have entirely withdrawn. The separation, painful as many of the circumstances attendant upon it have been, we fully believe to be a means, under the divine blessing, of "preserving our religious Society from anarchy and confusion," and relieving it from a heavy load of superficial profession, and tarnished or blighted character, which had long been accumulating upon it, and which there appeared to be little hope of shaking off. But the secession of the followers of Elias Hicks has happily provided a way; and they have taken with them the disorder, the anarchy, and the confusion, which, during several years past, they had introduced, and seemed disposed to continue, in our religious meetings, to the disgrace of the Christian name.

In the enjoyment of that serene and peaceful quiet, which now reigns in our religious assemblies, and the retrospect of what these opportunities so lately were, our minds are humbled in reverent gratitude for the favour; and however small the number who convene may be, it matters not; inasmuch as we are at times permitted to witness the heart-tendering presence of Him who promised to be with the "two or three" that were gathered in his name, and quietly to "sit under our vine and under our fig tree, where none shall make us afraid."

The enemy and the destroyer is abroad in search of his prey; not in the terrifying character of a roaring lion, but under the specious and alluring transformation of "an angel of light," and "no marvel if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness." Never, we believe, was it more necessary for the members of our religious Society to dwell upon the watch, to "be sober and vigilant," and to "mark them that cause divisions and offences, contrary to the doctrine which they have learned, and to avoid them; for they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own selves, and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple." LUTHER.

FOR THE FRIEND.

THE ELDERS OF PHILADELPHIA AND ELIAS HICKS.

At the next preparative meeting of Green street, the elder and overseers, so often mentioned in this narrative, informed the meeting that "Leonard Snowden had been visited for joining with others out of gospel order, and at other times accusing an approved minister of holding and disseminating principles and doctrines very different from those held by our religious Society, without substantial foundation, contrary to our united judgment previously expressed, thereby defaming his character, and manifesting disunity with the meeting." This charge was, at the suggestion of the Friend who introduced it, condensed and altered as follows: "The overseers have visited Leonard Snowden on his manifesting such a degree of disunity with the monthly meeting, that it is our sense he has lost his service as an elder."

This charge was (not without opposition) agreed to be carried to the monthly meeting. At the next monthly meeting, held on the 19th of the 8th mo. 1824, the charge was introduced, and copied on minute with this addition, "he is therefore released." It was done, notwithstanding the meeting was distinctly informed that the case was under care of the select meeting; it was done, without appointing a committee to visit him, an indispensable part of every proceeding of meetings against individuals; without appointing a committee to inform him of their decision; without furnishing him with a copy of the minute made in his case. In the mean time, the committee appointed by the select quarterly meeting had reported attention to their appointment, and that they were not ready to make a full report respecting the difficulty which had occurred. At the meeting in the tenth month following, the committee reported, that having come at last to a knowledge of the cause of disunity in Green street select preparative meeting, they were prepared to extend suitable care and advice in the case, when the monthly meeting in a summary manner interfered, and displaced Leonard Snowden from the station of an elder. Upon this representation, the select quarterly meeting agreed to lay its aggrieved situation before the quarterly meeting for discipline, which was accordingly done.

The conduct of Green street monthly meeting was wrong in all its parts. By the course which it pursued, it encroached upon the duties delegated by the discipline to the select meeting. That meeting could not witness such an encroachment without remonstrating against it to the quarterly meeting to which Green street was subordinate. Its remonstrance has been falsely called an interference with the business of a meeting for discipline, whereas it was the resistance of an interference with its own privileges. It is of little moment, in ecclesiastical as in civil affairs, where the hedge erected for common defence is broken down. It is not a protection, if every part be not kept inviolate; and unless the infallibility of the members of Green street be maintained, the conviction, whether right or wrong, of the select quarterly meeting, that its privileges had been invaded, rendered an appeal necessary. The honest belief of its members that they were aggrieved, is its sufficient justification for the course they pursued.

I have said that the conduct of Green street meeting, in this affair, was wrong in all its parts. Had it been exercising no usurped power, the manner of its proceeding, which I have recited, was in violation of all acknowledged rules of discipline. No matter how perfect the right, nor how just the occasion for making that minute, Leonard Snowden was aggrieved by the manner in which it was done, and had an undoubted right to appeal from the decision. The refusal of the monthly meeting to inform him of its conclusion respecting him, clearly acquitted him of any necessity of informing it, that he meant to appeal. The situation in which he was thus placed was altogether unprecedented. He was put under the ban of the monthly meeting; his name was recorded on its minutes, as an offender, for a vague and unspecified cause; the clerk refused his nomination upon committees, and the whole conduct of the leading members, both in and out of meeting, was hostile and persecuting. He accordingly drew up a statement of the proceedings of the monthly meeting in his case, which was laid before the quarterly meeting, held 11th mo. 1st, 1824. The select quarterly meeting communicated to the same meeting a relation of the manner in which Green street meeting had taken upon itself to exercise certain duties delegated by the discipline to the meeting of ministers and elders. It is evident, from what I have said, that the two cases stood upon different grounds; that if the quarterly meeting should decide that the select meeting had misunderstood the discipline, and that Green street meeting had the right to displace Leonard Snowden, it might still have decided that the manner of doing it was unconstitutional. The propriety, therefore, of separately considering the two papers was obvious. But at the very threshold of the business, difficulties arose, (insurmountable in the then state of society,) which prevented the quarterly meeting from acting upon the subject. An opposition commenced, on the part of the members of Green street, and those individuals who have since seceded, of the most violent, determined, embittered, and angry character. It was in vain to urge, that all which was asked was an investigation into the truth of the allegations thus made; that if the course pursued by Green street meeting were as correct as its members asserted, they had nothing to fear; that to reject the representation of the select meeting, and the appeal of Leonard Snowden, without a hearing, was to take part against them. It was declared, on the other hand, that the remonstrance of the select meeting was a tyrannical and unconstitutional interference with the monthly meeting; Leonard Snowden was described as an ambitious man, mortified at the loss of his station; the most partial and unfair representations of the proceedings at Green street were persisted in; desperate efforts were used to inflame the passions of their partizans; the rack, the gibbet, the fagot, dungeons and chains, the pope and the inquisition, were summoned to give energy to their declamation; every effort, in short, of a violent and bitter spirit was used to force the meeting to reject with contempt the communication of the elders and the appeal of Leonard Snowden. After long stemming this torrent of violence, the meeting directed the two papers to be inserted on minute. For seven successive quarters, this scene of violence and outrage was renewed in the attempt to erase those documents from the minutes, and at one time to displace the clerk, whose firmness had hitherto foiled them.

The discussion, or, rather, the contest, whether these communications should be referred to a committee for examination, or be erased from the minutes, became, in fact, a trial of the strength of the seceders in Philadelphia quarterly meeting. The principal upon which the question as to the conduct of Leonard Snowden turned, was that upon which the separation had been founded; the incompatibility of the doctrines of Elias Hicks with those of the Society of Friends. The followers of this deluded man would never have consented to try such a question but by their own judges. Accordingly, as their hopes of succeeding in the quarterly meeting faded, they rested their expectations upon their strength in the yearly meeting. At the quarterly meeting in the fifth month, 1826, as there appeared to be no probability of coming to a decision, it was agreed to ask the advice of the yearly meeting, in a case of difficulty, and a committee was appointed to represent the case to a committee of that body. All things were now verging to a crisis. Friends had taken their stand, in many places, against the unsound doctrines that were spreading. Several questions of great interest were to be agitated in the yearly meeting. It was apparent to all, that the fate of the new opinions turned upon the events of that meeting. Their advocates were, therefore, determined to hazard a bold and desperate game. The clerk of the yearly meeting had served acceptably in that station for several years; he was impartial, yet firm and inflexible in what he conceived to be right. But he was not the man of their party, and with him at the desk, they could scarcely hope to succeed in their designs. The measures which they pursued to procure a majority of representatives, by doubling those from quarterly meetings where they held the reins, have been elsewhere related. They failed in this final struggle, and withdrew from the Society.

It may be satisfactory to my readers to learn, that Philadelphia quarterly meeting appointed a committee in the fifth month last, to examine the appeal of Leonard Snowden, who reported that they could find no grounds for the proceedings against him.

The charge brought against him by the overseers was, "that he had manifested such a degree of disunity with the monthly meeting, that it is our sense, he has lost his service as an elder." In using the term unity to express religious fellowship, unity with the great body of the religious Society of Friends, in past as well as present time, is the full and comprehensive meaning of the phrase. It means an adherence, in belief and practice, to that inward spiritual faith, to that acknowledged doctrine and discipline, which form the substance of a Quaker's religion. A charge of disunity, like that preferred against Leonard Snowden, depends, for its validity, upon the absence of this conformity. Where such a want of conformity exists, whether in meetings or individuals, the disunity is with them. A single individual adhering to the primitive faith, and thereby placing himself in opposition to an unsound meeting, does not in the slightest degree subject himself to the charge of disunity, as that term is used in the discipline.

I have thus endeavoured to present the readers of the Friend with a detailed narrative of these important events, which form an era, as I have already observed, in the history of our religious Society; an era, from which impartial observers will, it may be hoped, be able to date the regeneration of the Society, and a more enlarged and exemplary career of usefulness. Whoever, in after time, shall explore the past condition of this people, will find in these transactions the confirmation of a truth, which reason and experience alike disclose—that the greatest troubles to which religious communities are liable, are brought upon them by their popular preachers; and that whatever society wishes to protect itself from the encroachments of priestly ambition, or the assaults of fanatical madness, must provide as a barrier, a body of men of mature and ripened intellect; neither exposed, in the exercise of their functions, to the intoxicating influence of popular applause, nor to the deceitful workings of a heated mind.

Posterity will do justice to the motives and the conduct of the men who thus braved the storm of popular prejudice, and threw themselves, as it were, into the very front of the battle. To no part of the history will it turn with more admiration, than to the meek firmness of that feeble old man, of whom it may be said, in the language of the great poet,

"Unmoved,
Unshaken, unseduced, unterrified,
His loyalty he kept, his love, his zeal;
Nor number, nor example, with him wrought,
To swerve from truth, or change his constant mind,
Though single."

The Asiatic Journal announces that Dr. Richmond, an army surgeon, in India, has, within eight months, restored to sight nearly eight hundred blind persons. He calculates that there are in the British East India possessions, upwards of half a million of people with cataracts, &c. who may be restored to sight by an operation as simple as that of blood-letting.

SELECTED FOR THE FRIEND.

"What think ye of Christ?" Matt. xxii. 42.

What think ye of Christ? is the text
To try both your state and your scheme;
You cannot be right in the rest,
Unless you think rightly of him.
As Jesus appears in your view,
As he is beloved or not,
So God is disposed to you,
And mercy or wrath is your lot.

Some take him a creature to be,
A man, or an angel at most;
Sure these have not feelings like me,
Nor know themselves wretched and lost;—
So guilty, so helpless am I,
I durst not confide in his blood,
Nor on his protection rely,
Unless I were sure he is God.

Some call him a Saviour in word,
But mix their own works with his plan,
And hope he his help will afford,
When they have done all that they can:
If doings prove rather too light,
(A little they own they may fail,)
They purpose to make up full weight
By casting his name in the scale.

Some style him the pearl of great price,
And say he's the fountain of joys;
Yet feed upon folly and vice,
And cleave to the world and its toys;
Like Judas, the Saviour they kiss,
And while they salute him, betray;
Ah! what will profession like this
Avail in his terrible day?

If ask'd what of Jesus I think?
Though still my best thoughts are but poor,
I say, he's my meat and my drink,
My life, and my strength, and my store,
My shepherd, my husband, my friend,
My Saviour from sin and from thrall,
My hope from beginning to end,
My portion, my Lord, and my all.

Dog-Mill.—A very ingenious mechanic, M. Mathias, of this city, has in operation in King street, a mill for sawing timber for sashes and window blinds, driven not by steam power, nor water, nor cattle power, but by dog-power. Four dogs belong to the establishment. They are worked two at a time for about fifteen minutes, when the team is taken off; and a relay of the two other dogs put to labour. They travel on the circumference of the inside of a wheel, of about 12 or 15 feet in diameter, which gives motion to the machinery which drives a circular saw with great velocity. It requires some days, and some art to break a dog in. It is really amusing to observe the sagacity of these animals. The cost of keeping four dogs is estimated at only 6d. per day.—Troy Sentinel.

It should never be forgotten, that though life has its venial trifles, yet they cease to be innocent when they encroach upon its important concerns; the mind that is often employed about little things, will be rendered unfit for any serious exertion; and though temporary relaxations may recruit its strength, habitual vacancy will destroy it.—Mackenzie.

Speak not of religion, neither use the name of God in a familiar manner.—Penn's Advice to his Children.

Our feelings were so forcibly arrested by a perusal of the annexed account, that we have not hesitated in believing it would be interesting to our readers generally. What struck us as most singular, is, that a character of so much true nobility, such genuine and elevated morality, as is assigned in the narrative to the unfortunate prince Abdahl Rahhahman, should not sooner and more efficiently have engaged the sympathy of a professedly Christian community. How strange that their sense of justice, generosity, and magnanimity, could for so long a period lie dormant, when a knowledge of the facts here detailed, must have been familiar to the neighbourhood. Of the Dr. C. mentioned we know nothing but what is derived from the letter. He may have been a worthy and benevolent man, but surely it must have been a sickly sensibility, that with a recollection of the kindness and hospitality he had received at the hands of the generous Moor, he could be content to remit, for a moment, until completely successful, his exertions to rescue from slavery, and restore to his kindred and his country, his friend and benefactor. The resignation of the prince to his state of degradation, seems an enigma, upon any other principle, than that, though nominally a heathen, he had, nevertheless, in himself realized the universality of that grace, which was set to be a light to the Gentiles, and God's salvation to the ends of the earth.

THE UNFORTUNATE MOOR.

A gentleman in Natchez has communicated the following account of an individual who is now offered as an emigrant to the colony of Liberia. The Society has every disposition to aid the unfortunate man, and it is hoped that he may take a passage in the next expedition.

Natchez, (Miss.) Dec. 13, 1827.

DEAR SIR,

I address you in behalf of an unfortunate man, a native of Africa, who has been held in slavery, in this state, for thirty-nine years. A letter has been addressed to the department of state concerning this person, under the hope that the general government might consider him a fit subject for their interposition. As yet, however, I believe nothing has been done. Believing he might be of incalculable importance to the colony at Liberia, I have no hesitation in offering you the suggestions of my own mind.

The person to whom I allude, we familiarly call Prince. His real name is Abduhl Rahhahman. He was born in 1762, at Tombuctoo, where his uncle, Abu-Abraham, was at that time king. The father of Prince was sent out as governor to Footah Jallo, which was at that time a colony of, or in some manner tributary to Tombuctoo. This country afterwards became independent of the mother country, and Alman Abraham was made king, Prince, after completing his education, entered the army. He very soon rose to distinction, and at the age of twenty-six, was appointed to the command of an army of about two thousand men, to be employed against the Hebohs, a tribe of negroes at the north of Footah Jallo. He marched into their country, and succeeded in putting them to flight, and laid waste their towns. Believing his object accomplished, he commenced his retreat. The Hebohs, however, rallied, and by a circuitous route and rapid marches, ambushed themselves in a narrow defile of the mountain through which Prince was to pass. He fell into the snare, and, with almost his entire army, was made prisoner, and sold to the Mandingoes, and by them put on board a slave ship then upon the coast.

Prince has been the property of Col. James F. of this place, during his whole captivity. During that time, Col. F. states he has never known him intoxicated, (he makes no use of ardent spirits,)—never detected him in dishonesty or falsehood; nor has he known him guilty of a mean action; and though born and raised in affluence, he has submitted to his fate without a murmur, and has been an industrious and faithful servant.

The story of this man's life is eventful and interesting. Did my conviction of the truth depend exclusively on my confidence in the fidelity of his own narrative, I could scarcely entertain a shadow of doubt. Fortunately, however, the most incredulous may be satisfied.

Dr. C. a highly distinguished physician of this place, now deceased, knew Prince intimately at Teemboo, in Footah Jallo. He was taken by Prince to his own house, where, during a long and painful illness of the disease peculiar to that climate, he was treated with kindness and humanity. They were recognised by each other in this country, and Prince now relates their first meeting here as deeply affecting. Exertions were made on the part of Dr. C. to emancipate him, and enable him to return to his native country. From causes altogether inexplicable to me, it was never effected.

That Prince is a Moor, there can be but little doubt. He is six feet in height; and though sixty-five years of age, he has the vigour of the meridian of life. When he arrived in this country, his hair hung in flowing ringlets far below his shoulders. Much against his will, his master compelled him to submit to the shears; and this ornament, which the Moor would part with in his own country only with his life, since that time he has entirely neglected. It has become coarse, and in some degree curly. His skin, also, by long service in the sun, and the privations of bondage, has been materially changed; and his whole appearance indicates the Foolah rather than the Moor. But Prince states explicitly, and with an air of pride, that not a drop of negro blood runs in his veins. He places the negro in a scale of being infinitely below the Moor. His prejudices, however, have been so far overcome as to allow him to marry; and he now has a numerous offspring.

At my own request, Prince often visits me. He is extremely modest, polite, and intelligent. I have frequently examined him in the geography of his own and contiguous countries—their political condition, forms of government, manners and customs, religion, &c. &c. His knowledge is accurate to the minutest degree, so far as I have compared it with the best authorities. He possesses a large stock of valuable information of the countries south of the Great Desert. North of that he has never travelled.

Prince was educated, and perhaps is still, nominally at least, a Mahomedan. I have conversed with him much upon this subject, and find him friendly disposed toward the Christian religion. He is extremely anxious for an Arabic Testament. He has heard it read in English, and admires its precepts. His principal objections are, that Christians do not follow them. His reasoning on this subject is pertinent, and, to our shame, is almost unanswerable. I can only remind him of the fallibility of man, and, from his own position, endeavour to show him the necessity of the great atonement, and the mercy of God, through Christ, to erring man.

The father of Prince died soon after the capture of his son. His brother Almam Abduhl Gahdric succeeded to the throne, and, I believe, is the present reigning monarch. Prince states that he himself is entitled to the throne from this circumstance. His brother is of the half blood; his mother being an African. This circumstance, it appears, provided there is no disparity in moral qualities, creates a preference. But he has no wish to enter again the bustle of public life. Many years of servitude have entirely subdued his ambition for power. He will be happy—he speaks to me upon this subject with a countenance beaming with joy—if he can return to his native country, live the friend of the white man, and die in the land of his fathers.

I would here mention that Col. F. is ready to give him up without an equivalent. I have also explained to Prince the object of the establishment at Liberia. He speaks with gratitude of the benevolent design; and taking into view the short distance between that place and his own country, he feels assured he can be of very great service to that colony.

I now commend him to the favourable consideration of your society. I cannot persuade myself but that you will seize with avidity an instrument that appears so completely adapted to your wants. Is it impossible—is it improbable that Abduhl Rahhahman may become the chief pioneer of civilization to unenlightened Africa—that, armed with the Bible, he may be the foremost of that band of pilgrims who shall roll back the mighty waves of darkness and superstition, and plant the cross of the Redeemer upon the furthestmost mountains of Kong! Wishing, Rev. Sir, the humane society, of which you are the able organ, all the success that so noble a cause merits, and commending it to the guidance of Him who doeth all things well, I remain, with the highest respect, &c.

THE FAREWELL OF WINTER.

Farewell—for I see that the blue-eyed spring,

Bedecked with flowers of every hue,
And waiting to earth on a zephyr's wing,
Is coming—and I must bid adieu.
She is coming to change my reign of gloom,
And to scatter abroad light, sunshine, and bloom;
The earth has been withered beneath my sway—
She is coming to take its fetters away.

The limbs of the trees dry and naked are seen;
The rivers are bound in an icy chain;
The trees shall be clothed in a robe of green,
And the waters shall flow in their gladness again.
My voice has been heard in the whistling blast,
Which toss'd the proud oak to the earth as it pass'd;
That boisterous wind has ceased to blow,
The breezes of spring shall gladden ye now.

At the sound of my loud and fearful cry,
The birds of the forest had drooped the wing;
They are fluttering now in gladness by,
And welcome with music the coming of spring.
The timid flowers were chilled by my breath,
And their delicate leaves had withered in death;
But the bright eye of spring has cheered them again,
And like beautiful gems they enamel the plain.

And man, too, rejoices to hear my farewell,
And leaves the gay fire which has cheered him so long,
And hark, on the breezes how merrily swell
The ploughman's blithe shout, and the labourer's song.
He forgets all the joys to which winter gave birth,
The fire-side circle, and bright blazing hearth,
And he thinks but of green sloping meadows and bowers,
Of calm sunny days, and of fresh blooming flowers.

Excuse faults in others, own them in yourself, and forgive them against yourself, as you would have your heavenly Father and Judge forgive you. Read Prov. xvii. 9. and Matt. vi. 14, 15. Christ returns and dwells upon that passage of his prayer above all the rest, forgiveness, the hardest lesson to man, that of all other creatures most needs it.—Penn's Advice to his Children.

THE INDIAN CHIEF.

The following authentic story, the incidents of which are taken from Southey's "Chronological History of the West Indies," affords a pleasing illustration of the influence of a religious education, though of a very imperfect character, in controlling the evil propensities and fierce passions of our nature, even under circumstances calculated to rouse them into vehement action. It is interesting, also, as presenting a gleam of prosperity in the fortunes of that unhappy race, which formerly inhabited the islands discovered by Columbus, but has long since disappeared before the barbarous cruelty and grinding avarice of the Spanish settlers.

It was in the island of Hispaniola, in the early part of the sixteenth century, while the work of extermination was going on, that a young Indian chief of the name of Enrique, who had always been friendly, or at least submissive to the Spaniards, was driven, by injurious treatment, into revolt. His ancestors had reigned in a mountainous district of the island: but they were unable to maintain their independence; and their little domain had shared the common fate. His father and grandfather had been cruelly butchered; and those of his people who had escaped the sword, had been taken from their native hills to labour in the fields, or search for gold in the mines. It was the good fortune of Enrique himself, while yet a boy, to fall into the hands of those who felt deeply for the sufferings of his countrymen, and took every opportunity to moderate the evils which it was not in their power to prevent. He was educated by the Franciscans in the Catholic faith, and under the particular care of Remigio, a priest from Picardy, appears to have been imbued not only with attachment to the ceremonies and dogmas of the church, but with really pious sentiments. Though naturally high spirited, and indignant at the wrongs of his persecuted race, he grew up to manhood without any serious collision with the Spaniards, married, and settled among them, and, had no personal cause of offence been offered, would probably have remained a peaceable if not contended subject. But the charms of his wife, Donna Mencia, attracted the dishonourable notice of a petty despot, named Valeucuela, who attempted her seduction, and at the same time treated

Enrique with indignities intolerable to a man of spirit. The Indian applied for redress to the royal lieutenant; but his complaints were treated with contempt. An appeal to still higher authority met with no better success. The only result of his efforts to obtain the protection of the laws, was increased ill usage from the tyrant in whose power he was placed. His life was in danger; and his only safety was in flight. Collecting, therefore, a number of his countrymen, and procuring a supply of arms, he sought refuge in his native mountains. Valeucuela, with twelve Spaniards, pursued and came up with the fugitives: but his party was defeated, and they who survived the contest were glad to avail themselves of the mercy of the chief, which permitted their escape. "Go," said Enrique, "and never return to us; for we are resolved to labour for you no longer." An expedition of eighty men was now sent against him by the government of the island. Enrique, who was aware of their approach, attacked them by surprise, slew several and wounded most of the rest; but he thirsted not for their blood; and having secured his own safety and that of his followers, forbade the flight of his enemies to be molested. The fame of this action produced a great accession to his party, and he was soon at the head of 300 Indians. His increased strength was not attended with presumption. Acting always on the defensive, he was able to defeat every attempt to surprise or vanquish him, and never pushed a victory further than was necessary for present safety. On one occasion, a considerable body of Spanish troops having been repulsed with great slaughter, more than seventy of the fugitives sought shelter in a cavern. In the absence of Enrique, the Indians, who had traced them to their covert, collected before its entrance a pile of dry wood, which they designed to set on fire, and thus either suffocate them, should they maintain their position, or cause them to perish in the flames, should they attempt to escape. They were about to accomplish their object, when the chief arrived, and commanded them to desist. He caused the obstruction to be removed, and having deprived the Spaniards of their arms, dismissed them in safety.

After several vain attempts to suppress the insurrection by force, the government resolved to try the effect of conciliatory measures. The Franciscan who had educated Enrique was sent to him, in the hope that by his persuasion, supported by proper assurances of good treatment, the chief might be induced to relinquish his present independent but precarious mode of life, and again acknowledge the authority of the Spaniards. Remigio, upon his arrival, was treated rather roughly, being surrounded and stripped by the Indians, who could not believe that one of his race would come among them with any other than hostile views, and were disposed to consider him rather as a spy than a friend. Enrique, however, learning that the stranger was a Franciscan, hastened to see him; received his embrace with kindness and respect; and expressed deep regret for the indignities he had received. To his entreaties that the insurgents might lay aside their arms, and be reconciled to the government, he replied, that there was nothing he more desired than peace; but that his father, his grandfather, and all the nobles of his country, had been murdered; and to escape a similar fate, he had himself fled to the mountains; that though disposed to do no injury to others, he would defend himself against every attack, and was determined never to return to slavery; finally, that he did not wish ever again to see a Spaniard, and only requested to be left without molestation to the enjoyment of his liberty. Having thus spoken, he kissed the father's hand, and disappeared. Remigio returned safely to St. Domingo.

GLEANNINGS.

Hurricanes appear to have an electric origin. At the moment when the electric spark unites a quantity of oxygen gas with a quantity of hydrogen, to procure a rain storm, in all probability a considerable mass of hydrogen is consumed, and thus occasions a sudden fall of rain or hail, by which means a very large vacuum is formed, and the ambient air rushes into it with astonishing rapidity, and sometimes in the most opposite directions. The Antilles, the Isle of France, and the Isle of Reunion, the kingdoms of Siam and China, are the countries in which hurricanes most frequently exercise their ravages. The hurricanes of Europe are not, in any way, to be compared with those of countries farther south; generally speaking, the former are nothing more than whirlwinds, occasioned by the meeting of two opposite currents. But in a real hurricane, all the elements seem to have combined and armed themselves for the destruction of nature. The lightnings cross each other; the thunder roars without interval; rain falls down in torrents. The velocity of the wind far exceeds that of a cannon ball, or of the powder which impels it; growing corn, vines, sugar canes, forests, and houses, every thing is swept away; one might imagine the ground it had passed over was cleared and levelled. It begins in various ways; sometimes we have one little black cloud appearing on the summit of a mountain; at the instant when it seems to settle on the peak, it rushes down the declivity—unrolls itself, dilates, and covers the whole horizon. At other times, the tempest advances in the shape of a fire-coloured cloud, showing itself suddenly in a calm and serene sky.

Lighting the Streets.—What a striking contrast between the appearance of the brilliant illuminated streets at this time, compared with the days of Henry V. It is recorded, that in 1417, Sir Henry Barton, mayor of London, ordained "lanterns with lights to bee hanged out on winter evenings, between Hallowtide and Candlemasse." Paris was first lighted by an order issued in 1524; and in the beginning of the 16th century, the streets being infested with robbers, the inhabitants were ordered to keep lights burning in the windows of all such houses as fronted the streets. In 1668, when some regulations were made for improving the streets of London, the inhabitants were reminded to hang out their lanterns at the usual time; and in 1690, an order was issued to hang out a light or lamp, every night as soon as it was dark, from Michaelmas to Christmas. By an act of the common council, in 1716, all houses fronting any street, land, or passage, were required to hang out every night, one or more lights, to burn from six to eleven o'clock, under the penalty of one shilling. In 1736, the lord mayor and common council applied to parliament for an act to enable them to erect lamps; and in 1744, they obtained further powers for lighting the city. Birmingham was first lighted by lamps in 1733, so then in this improvement it preceded the metropolis.—Beckman's History of Inventions.

The Great and Little Kammeni, or Burnt Islands, are situated in the Grecian Archipelago, and derive their name from their calcined appearance. The first was called by the ancients Kiera; and the other, which suddenly rose above the sea in the year 1473, was distinguished by the name of the Mieri Kammeni. On the 23d of May, 1707, a new islet appeared about a league from Santorin, between these islands. On the 18th, there had been felt at Santorin, two slight shocks of an earthquake. Some Greeks belonging to Santorin having seen the first points of the growing island, imagined they might be the remains of some shipwreck. When they discovered that they were black calcined rocks, they returned quite alarmed, and published every where what they had seen. Though the fright was general at Santorin, some of the inhabitants resolved to visit the spot. Having landed, curiosity drew them from rock to rock; they found every where a sort of white stone which might be cut like bread, and fresh oysters adhering to the rocks; a circumstance very uncommon at Santorin. While amusing themselves with eating oysters, they suddenly felt the rock move and tremble under their feet: terror soon induced them to abandon their repast, and row away as hard as they could pull. The shock was the motion of the island rising out of the sea—it gained nearly twenty feet in height, and twice as much in breadth. One day a rock of remarkable size and figure issued from the sea forty or fifty paces from the middle island, and disappeared again at the expiration of four days. These commotions shook the Little Kammeni, opened a long fissure in its summit, and the sea several times changed its colour; first a dazzling green, then of reddish hue, and last a pale yellow, and constantly emitting a great stench. On the 16th of July, smoke was first seen issuing from another chain of black rocks, which suddenly rose at the distance of sixty yards from a part of the sea where no bottom had been found, forming a distinct island. These were called White and Black Islands. Additions were daily made to them by rocks rising out of the sea, till they were much enlarged, and in about a month became united into one. The smoke greatly increased, and when it was calm, ascended so high, that it was seen from other distant islands, having a fiery appearance at night for about twenty feet above the rocks. So great a degree of putrefaction spread through all Santorin, that the inhabitants were obliged to burn perfumes, and to kindle fires in the streets. The infection lasted a day and a half. A very fresh south-west wind dispelled it; but in driving away one evil, it introduced another. It carried this burning smoke over a great part of the best vineyards of Santorin, the grapes of which were almost ripe, and which, in one night, were all scorched. It was likewise remarked, that wherever this smoke was carried, it blackened silver and copper, and occasioned the inhabitants violent headach, accompanied with great nausea. At that time, the White Island sunk all at once upwards of ten feet.

On the 31st of July, the sea cast forth smoke, and boiled up in two places, from thirty to sixty yards from Black Island; its surface appeared like oil over a fire, and many dead fish were found. The following night a hollow noise was heard like the report of several cannons fired at a distance, and almost immediately two long sheets of fire issued from the crater, which ascended very high, and were directly extinguished. On the 1st of August the noise was repeated, followed by a bluish-black smoke, which rose to a prodigious elevation in the form of a column. On the morning of the 22d the island had risen much higher than the preceding days; a chain of rocks of nearly fifty feet had increased its breadth, and the sea was covered with a reddish foam which emitted an intolerable stench. On the 5th of September, the fire opened a passage at the extremity of Black Island; thence there arose from the great crater as it were three of the largest sky-rockets of the most brilliant and beautiful fire. On the succeeding night, after peals of subterraneous thunder, large fiery bodies were thrown out, sparking with a million of lights; they ascended to a great height, and falling in showers of stars upon the island, it appeared quite illuminated. On the 18th, the island was considerably enlarged by an earthquake; the number of fires was increased, and the claps of thunder were so violent, that the houses of Scaro, the capital of Santorin, were shaken. Through thick volumes of smoke, which appeared like a mountain, loud noises of an infinite number of huge burning stones were heard, whizzing through the air like cannon balls, which fell on the island, and into the sea, with a terrible crash, that made the people shudder. On the 21st, the Little Kammeni being quite illuminated, after one of those furious shocks, three flashes of lightning were emitted, which seemed to fill the horizon. At that instant, the new island was so shaken, that one half of the great crater fell in, and prodigious masses of stone were driven to the distance of more than two miles. On the 15th of July, 1708, some of the inhabitants of Santorin, wishing to have a nearer view of the new island, provided themselves with a boat well caulked, and proceeded to that side of it where the sea did not boil up, but where it smoked very much. Scarcely had they reached the smoke, when they felt a suffocating heat, and putting their hands into the water found it scalding hot, though five hundred yards from shore. Being unable to land at that place, they proceeded to the most distant point from the crater, and went ashore on the Great Kammeni, when they had an opportunity of examining the length of the island, which appeared to be one mile at its greatest breadth, about five miles in circumference, and about two hundred feet at its greatest height above the sea. They then proceeded to White Island, and at one hundred yards from it cast the lead, but found no bottom with a line of ninety-five fathoms. While they were deliberating whether they should advance further, the great crater began to play with its usual terrific violence; the wind carried clouds of ashes and smoke over the boat, and they concluded it safest to retreat; on arriving at Santorin, they found the great heat of the water had melted nearly all the pitch off the seams of the boat, which began to open on all sides. Great quantities of pumice stone were thrown out of these volcanoes, which, floating on the sea, several harbours in the Archipelago were nearly choked up with them during the violent eruptions we have been describing, so that vessels could not get out till a passage was cleared by means of poles.—Encyclop.

[To be continued.]

Amongst the bandages of an Egyptian mummy in the Philosophical Hall at Leeds, a small piece of red leather has been found, stamped with hieroglyphic characters, which determine the date of this interesting monument of antiquity. They are the royal legend of Yemesses V. the Amenophis, Memphitis of the Greek writers, the father of the great Sesostrius, and the last monarch of Manetho's 18th dynasty of the kings of Egypt. He ascended the throne of the Pharaohs in the year 1483, A. C. The individual, therefore, whose remains are still in so perfect a state of preservation, was the contemporary of Moses, and officiated as incense bearer and scribe to the shrine of the god Mandon, at Thebes, in Upper Egypt, more than 3300 years ago.—London Paper.

The youth who hopes th' Olympic prize to gain,
All arts must try, and every toil sustain.

FRANCIS.

By JOHNSON.

It is observed by Bacon, that "reading makes a full man, conversation a ready man, and writing an exact man."

As Bacon attained to degrees of knowledge scarcely ever reached by any other man, the directions which he gives for study have certainly a just claim to our regard; for who can teach an art with so great authority, as he that has practised it with undisputed success?

Under the protection of so great a name, I shall, therefore, venture to inculcate to my ingenious contemporaries, the necessity of reading, the fitness of consulting other understandings than their own, and of considering the sentiments and opinions of those who, however neglected in the present age, had in their own times, and many of them a long time afterwards, such reputation for knowledge and acuteness as will scarcely ever be attained by those that despise them.

An opinion has of late been, I know not how, propagated among us, that libraries are filled only with useless lumber; that men of parts stand in no need of assistance; and that to spend life in poring upon books, is only to imbibe prejudices, to obstruct and embarrass the powers of nature, to cultivate memory at the expense of judgment, and to bury reason under a chaos of indigested learning.

Such is the talk of many who think themselves wise, and of some who are thought wise by others; of whom part probably believe their own tenets, and part may be justly suspected of endeavouring to shelter their ignorance in multitudes, and of wishing to destroy that reputation which they have no hopes to share. It will, I believe, be found invariably true, that learning was never decried by any learned man; and what credit can be given to those who venture to condemn that which they do not know?

If reason has the power ascribed to it by its advocates, if so much is to be discovered by attention and meditation, it is hard to believe, that so many millions, equally participating of the bounties of nature with ourselves, have been for ages upon ages meditating in vain: if the wits of the present time expect the regard of posterity, which will then inherit the reason which is now thought superior to instruction, surely they may allow themselves to be instructed by the reason of former generations. When, therefore, an author declares, that he has been able to learn nothing from the writings of his predecessors, and such a declaration has been lately made, nothing but a degree of arrogance, unpardonable in the greatest human understanding, can hinder him from perceiving that he is raising prejudices against his own performance; for with what hope of success can he attempt that in which greater abilities have hitherto miscarried? or with what peculiar force does he suppose himself invigorated, that difficulties hitherto invincible should give way before him?

Of those whom Providence has qualified to make any additions to human knowledge, the number is extremely small; and what can be added by each single mind, even of this superior class, is very little; the greatest part of mankind must owe all their knowledge, and all must owe far the larger part of it, to the information of others. To understand the works of celebrated authors, to comprehend their systems, and retain their reasonings, is a task more than equal to common intellects; and he is by no means to be accounted useless or idle, who has stored his mind with acquired knowledge, and can detail it occasionally to others who have less leisure or weaker abilities.

Persius has justly observed, that knowledge is nothing to him who is not known by others to possess it: to the scholar himself it is nothing with respect either to honour or advantage, for the world cannot reward those qualities which are concealed from it; with respect to others it is nothing, because it affords no help to ignorance or error.

It is with justice, therefore, that in an accomplished character, Horace unites just sentiments with the power of expressing them; and he that has once accumulated learning, is next to consider, how he shall most widely diffuse and most agreeably impart it.

A ready man is made by conversation. He that buries himself among his manuscripts, "besprent," as Pope expresses it, "with learned dust," and wears out his days and nights in perpetual research and solitary meditation, is too apt to lose in his elocution what he adds to his wisdom, and when he comes into the world, to appear overloaded with his own notions, like a man armed with weapons which he cannot wield. He has no facility of inculcating his speculations, of adapting himself to the various degrees of intellect which the accidents of conversation will present; but will talk to most unintelligibly, and to all unpleasantly.

I was once present at the lectures of a profound philosopher, a man really skilled in the science which he professed, who having occasion to explain the terms opacum and pellucidum, told us, after some hesitation, that opacum was, as one might say, opaque, and that pellucidum signified pellucid. Such was the dexterity with which this learned reader facilitated to his auditors the intricacies of science; and so true is it, that a man may know what he cannot teach.

Boerhaave complains, that the writers who have treated of chemistry before him, are useless to the greater part of students, because they presuppose their readers to have such degrees of skill as are not often to be found. Into the same error, are all men apt to fall, who have familiarized any subject to themselves in solitude: they discourse as if they thought every other man had been employed in the same inquiries; and expect that short hints and obscure allusions will produce in others the same train of ideas which they excite in themselves.

Nor is this the only inconvenience which the man of study suffers from a recluse life. When he meets with an opinion that pleases him, he catches it up with eagerness; looks only after such arguments as tend to his confirmation; or spares himself the trouble of discussion, and adopts it with very little proof; indulges it long without suspicion, and in time unites it to the general body of his knowledge, and treasures it up among incontestable truths: but when he comes into the world among men, who, arguing upon dissimilar principles, have been led to different conclusions, and being placed in various situations, view the same object on many sides; he finds his darling position attacked, and himself in no condition to defend it: having thought always in one train, he is in the state of a man, who, having fenced with the same master, is perplexed and amazed by a new posture of his antagonist; he is entangled in unexpected difficulties, he is harassed by sudden objections, he is unprovided with solutions or replies; his surprise impedes his natural powers of reasoning, his thoughts are scattered and confounded, and he gratifies the pride of airy petulance with an easy victory.

It is difficult to imagine with what obstinacy truths which one mind perceives almost by intuition, will be rejected by another; and how many artifices must be practised to procure admission for the most evident propositions into understandings frightened by their novelty, or hardened against them by accidental prejudice; it can scarcely be conceived, how frequently, in these extemporaneous controversies, the dull will be subtle, and the acute absurd; how often stupidity will elude the force of argument, by involving itself in its own gloom; and mistaken ingenuity will weave artful fallacies, which reason can scarcely find means to disentangle.

In these encounters the learning of the recluse usually fails him: nothing but long habit and frequent experiments can confer the power of changing a position into various forms, presenting it in different points of view, connecting it with known and granted truths, fortifying it with intelligible arguments, and illustrating it by apt similitudes; and he, therefore, that has collected his knowledge in solitude, must learn its application by mixing with mankind.

But while the various opportunities of conversation invite us to try every mode of argument, and every art of recommending our sentiments, we are frequently betrayed to the use of such as are not in themselves strictly defensible: a man heated in talk, and eager of victory, takes advantage of the mistakes or ignorance of his adversary, lays hold of concessions to which he knows he has no right, and urges proofs likely to prevail in his opponent, though he knows himself they have no force: thus the severity of reason is relaxed, many topics are accumulated, but without just arrangement or distinction; we learn to satisfy ourselves with such ratiocination as silences others, and seldom recall to a close examination, that discourse which has gratified our vanity with victory and applause.

Some caution, therefore, must be used, lest copiousness and facility be made less valuable by inaccuracy and confusion. To fix the thoughts by writing, and subject them to frequent examinations and reviews, is the best method of enabling the mind to detect its own sophisms, and keep it on guard against the fallacies which it practises on others: in conversation we naturally diffuse our thoughts, and in writing we contract them; method is the excellence of writing, and unconstraint the grace of conversation.

To read, write, and converse in due proportions, is therefore the business of a man of letters. For all these there is not often equal opportunity; excellence, therefore, is not often attainable; and most men fail in one or other of the ends proposed, and are full without readiness, or ready without exactness. Some deficiency must be forgiven all, because all are men; and more must be allowed to pass uncensured in the greater part of the world, because none can confer upon himself abilities, and few have the choice of situations proper for the improvement of those which nature has bestowed: it is, however, reasonable, to have perfection in our eye; that we may always advance towards it, though we know it never can be reached.

From the last London Quarterly Review for January of the present year, we derive the copy of verses below, from the pen of Bishop Heber. The reviewers speak of it as "of exquisite merit," and say they, "we know few dead poets, and no living one, who might not be proud to own it."

AN EVENING WALK IN BENGAL.

"Our task is done! on Gunga's breast
The sun is sinking down to rest;
And, moored beneath the tamarind bough,
Our bark has found its harbour now.
With furled sail, and painted side,
Behold the tiny frigate ride.
Upon her deck, 'mid charcoal gleams,
The Moslems' savoury supper steams,
While all apart, beneath the wood,
The Hindoo cooks his simpler food.

"Come walk with me the jungle through;
If yonder hunter told us true,
Far off, in desert dank and rude,
The tiger holds his solitude;
Nor (taught by recent harm to shun
The thunders of the English gun,)
A dreadful guest but rarely seen,
Returns to scare the village green.
Come boldly on! no venom'd snake
Can shelter in so cool a brake.
Child of the sun! he loves to lie
'Mid Nature's embers, parched and dry,
Where o'er some tower, in ruin laid,
The peepul spreads its haunted shade;
Or round a tomb his scales to wreath,
Fit warder in the gate of death!
Come on! Yet pause! behold us now
Beneath the bamboo's arched bough,
Where, gemming oft that sacred gloom,
Glow the geranium's scarlet bloom,
And winds our path through many a bower
Of fragrant tree and giant flower;
The ceiba's crimson pomp display'd
O'er the broad plantain's humbler shade,
And dusk anana's prickly blade:

While o'er the brake, so wild and fair,
The betel waves his crest in air.
With pendent train and rushing wings,
Aloft the gorgeous peacock springs;
And he, the bird of hundred dyes,
Whose plumes the dames of Ava prize.
So rich a shade, so green a sod,
Our English fairies never trod;
Yet who in Indian bow'r has stood,
But thought on England's 'good green wood?'
And bless'd, beneath the palmy shade,
Her hazel and her hawthorn glade,
And breath'd a pray'r, (how oft in vain!)
To gaze upon her oaks again!

"A truce to thought! the jackall's cry
Resounds like sylvan revelry;
And through the trees, yon falling ray
Will scantily serve to guide our way.
Yet mark! as fade the upper skies,
Each thicket opens ten thousand eyes.
Before, beside us, and above,
The fire-fly lights his lamp of love,
Retreating, chasing, sinking, soaring,
The darkness of the copse exploring!
While to this cooler air confest,
The broad Dhatura bares her breast,
Of fragrant scent and virgin white,
A pearl around the locks of night!
Still as we pass, in softened hum,
Along the breezy alleys come
The village song, the horn, the drum.
Still as we pass, from bush and briar,
The shrill cigala strikes his lyre;
And, what is she whose liquid strain
Thrills through yon copse of sugar-cane?
I know that soul-entrancing swell!
It is—it must be—Philomel!

"Enough, enough, the rustling trees
Announce a shower upon the breeze,—
The flashes of the summer sky
Assume a deeper, ruddier dye;
Yon lamp that trembles on the stream,
From forth our cabin sheds its beam;
And we must early sleep, to find
Betimes the morning's healthy wind.
But oh! with thankful hearts confess
Ev'n here there may be happiness;
And He, the bounteous Sire, has given
His peace on earth—his hope of heaven!"

FOR THE FRIEND.

HISTORICAL SOCIETY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

There are few readers of history who have not regretted the want of accurate details respecting the private character, manners, and transactions of different nations, and different ages. Ancient history, it has been remarked, consists of a list of monarchs, and a record of their battles, with very little of that statistical, local, or practical information, which would make us acquainted with the true constitution and character of human society at those periods.

Though excuses are to be found for the defects of antecedent annals, surely none can be offered for any neglect which may now occur in transmitting to posterity minute and graphic delineations of the people and manners of the present age. With the art of printing, and the present general spread of knowledge and letters, we owe it to coming ages, to register and transmit all that may afford them interest, caution, or instruction.

As few records will be more highly prized by posterity than those which detail the discovery, settlement, and gradual improvement of the great American continent, I have been gratified to observe, that Historical Societies have been formed in many of the United States, for the purpose of collecting the details of the beginning and advance of our great and growing nation; much of the traditional lore of our early times has been lost, and the delay of a few years more would have shrouded in mist and obscurity, the first years of our colonial existence.

The Historical Society of the state of Pennsylvania, which was formed in Philadelphia a few years since, has already published three half volumes of its transactions, containing many valuable papers relative to the history of the state. My present object is to give a brief view of the contents of the last half volume of the society's memoirs, and to invite the patronage of the members of the Society of Friends, both in Pennsylvania and elsewhere, to this and the succeeding publications of the same institution. The founding of Pennsylvania, the conduct and character of the first settlers, their sufferings, privations, intercourse with the aborigines, mode of civil and religious association, are all subjects of deep interest to their posterity, and especially to their successors in religious profession. A large portion of the three half volumes of transactions, to which I have alluded, are devoted to an exhibition of the character and actions of our ancient Friends, and cannot fail of being read with profit and instruction by every person who wishes a true knowledge of what "manner of men" our ancestors really were. But notwithstanding such claims upon our patronage, I believe that out of Philadelphia these memoirs have had little or no circulation.

The last number was published in the latter part of 1827; the first article is an anniversary address delivered before the society by Roberts Vaux; some extracts from which, explanatory of its character and object, I believe appeared in the earlier numbers of the Friend. This interesting discourse is, in fact, a condensed, though succinct account of the Indian History of Pennsylvania, from the days of William Penn to the year 1760. The justice, humanity, and Christian benevolence of early Friends towards the natives of the soil, are depicted in strong and lively colours, whilst the no less striking generosity, gratitude, and hospitality of the sons of the forest, are portrayed with the same graphic truth and effect.

The second article in the volume, with an introductory essay by Dr. B. H. Coates, is a document of a very rare and unique kind, being a copy from the autograph of an Indian who has written a minute and accurate account of a mission in which he was employed by the government of the United States, to negotiate peace with the western Indians previous to St. Clair's expedition in 1793. A narrative of Indian diplomacy, embracing various treaties, speeches, and ceremonies, from the pen of a native, possesses a deep and singular interest, and in the present case, will amply repay a careful perusal.

The third article is an account of a very curious religious society of Germans, which existed in the interior of Pennsylvania for many years; their customs and religious tenets were novel and extraordinary. But like all other institutions where fanaticism is mistaken for religion, it had but a brief day of existence, and has become totally extinct.

An account of the discovery of the Lehigh coal, and a minute history of the settlement of Byberry, from which last, extracts have appeared in the Friend, and a historical anecdote respecting the founder of Harrisburg, the seat of our state government, form the three succeeding articles.

The next matter in the volume possesses much interest, being a copy (with the ancient orthography preserved) of the instructions of William Penn to the commissioners for settling his colony, given in 1681. The wisdom, prudence, and religious feeling of our illustrious founder are strikingly portrayed in this short but important document.

The volume is closed by two letters of William Penn, one addressed to the king of England, dated at Philadelphia, 1683; and the other dated at the same place and same year, to the Earl of Sunderland, giving some account of his new town, the soil, climate, vegetable and animal productions of the colony.

I have thus given a very hasty and imperfect sketch of this interesting volume of memoirs, but if it may be the means of drawing the attention of the readers of the Friend to this and the other volumes of the Historical Society, I shall have accomplished my wish and design. Z.

FOR THE FRIEND. THE NATIVITY.

From yonder beauteous realms of light,
Concealed from mortal view
They came: ten thousand cherubs bright,
O'er Bethlehem's valley flew.

The night was dark, and silence dread
Had hush'd the world to rest;
In sleep each eyelid fast was laid,
With peaceful slumber prest.

All but the watching swains—to them
The turf a pillow lent;
They stretch'd them on the dew-damp earth,
Their flocks were safely pent.

When, lo! a clearer morn than ere
Had hush'd o'er Bethlehem's sky,
Stopt midnight in her black career,
Made sullen darkness fly.

Around and round, an airy throng
Of angels fair appear'd;
Balanc'd on golden clouds they hung—
The shepherds saw, and fear'd,

When soft, descending from on high,
In morning blushes clad,
The angel of the Lord drew nigh,
And comforting, thus said:

"No omen dire of Heaven's red wrath,
No armed bolts we bear;
We are not messengers of death,
Why then need shepherds fear?"

"But Mercy's tidings, errand blest,
From Mercy's clime we bring;
Rise, shepherds, to yon village haste,
Salute your infant king.

"In Bethlehem's town, a peaceful place,
On this auspicious morn,
Of David's night forgotten race,
The Saviour, Christ, is born.

"His robes a swaddling band you'll see,
A manger mean, his throne;
How low, O man! how low for thee,
Has God himself stoop'd down."

Thus Gabriel spake: the angelic crowd,
On golden harps high strung,
As ocean's solemn murmurs loud,
This new Hosanna sung.

"Glory to God most high be given,
Peace reign o'er sea and earth;
Good will to man, the heir of Heaven,
Terrestrial though his birth."

When I saw the death of your good father announced in the papers yesterday, I was penetrated with the liveliest sorrow. The remembrance of all the kind feelings and good actions which I had witnessed in him, came fresh upon me, and I placed myself for a moment in your situation, and felt what it would be to lose a father. Yet why should we mourn? He has descended to the grave in the midst of his strength and usefulness. We know that "it is well with him," and we may be equally confident, under the government of infinite wisdom and goodness, that it is well for us. Apart from every consideration of a higher nature, there are comforts attending the event, to which you ought not, and cannot be insensible. You are spared the pain of witnessing the decays of old age; of having your last associations connected with weakness and imbecility; of being obliged to direct, where you were accustomed to obey; and of having your respect and veneration of a parent weakened by pity, and even by the necessary exertions of filial piety. He has descended to the grave with a spotless name, and followed by the regrets of the many whom he was benefiting by his exertions and his example. We could not wish him to have lived till he had ceased to be useful, and was forgotten even by his former friends. He has lived to see you returned in safety, to see your course in life distinctly marked out, and to witness your entrance upon an honourable career of usefulness and improvement. And though all his wishes respecting you were not yet accomplished, yet when could he have left you with less anxiety or higher hopes?

But it is not for us to limit our views to our comforts or to our prosperity. It is our happiness to know that every thing has relation to something hereafter. Your father has been taken away, that you may feel more entirely your dependence upon God alone. He has discharged his duties to you, and to society, and has now left you to supply his place. My dear friend, if that place is well supplied, if those new duties are rightly performed, are you not taking a higher station, as a moral agent; are you not earning for yourself a brighter reward? Is it not the goodness of God, which is placing you in a situation of greater responsibility, and giving you an opportunity of greater moral improvement? Is it not the goodness of God which is adding one more attraction to the invisible world? and is giving you a new motive for devoting yourself to his service? Can you ever think of "the spirits of the just made perfect," or of "the church of the first born," without thinking of both your parents, and without feeling that you, too, must be there? And is it not the goodness of God which is giving you, in early manhood, such strong ties to Heaven? To have had parents whom we can look back upon with unmingled respect and veneration, is no common privilege, and one not lightly to be valued. I am sure you feel it as I do, and you will feel happy too, that they are now removed from sin, and danger, and temptation; that their trials are ended, and that they have "finished their course with joy." I pray to God to make you worthy of them.—Haven.

Extract of a Letter dated Charleston, March 14, 1828.

The public ice-house of this town is now well supplied, and two vessels have recently arrived from Boston loaded with ice. Such has been the state of the weather, that the market of Charleston had had a constant supply of green peas, asparagus, and tomatoes, and at this time there is a great abundance of new Irish potatoes.

O what a tangled web we weave,
When first we practise to deceive!

SCOTT.

GOSPEL MINISTRY.

A testimony from the monthly meeting of Philadelphia, concerning Thomas Brown.

"He was born in Barking, in the county of Essex, Great Britain, on the 1st of the ninth month, 1696; came, whilst young, with his parents, into this province, and lived some time in this city, from whence he removed with them to Plumstead, in Bucks county, where he first appeared in the ministry; some years after which he settled in this city.

"His gift in the ministry was living, deep, and very edifying; and in the exercise thereof, he was remarkable for an awful care not to appear without clear and renewed evidence of the motion of life for that service; and though not a man of literature, was often led into sublime matter, which was convincing and persuasive in setting forth the dignity and excellence of the Christian religion, yet was very attentive that those heights should not detain him beyond his proper gift, but to close in and with the life which made his ministry always acceptable to the living and judicious. Although he was not led to visit the churches in distant parts, yet was sometimes concerned to attend some of the neighbouring meetings, of two of which he has preserved some minutes, which being a lively description of his concern of mind for the promotion of the cause of truth, it is thought well to subjoin them here in his own words.

"1756, 8th mo. 9th. I went to Concord quarterly meeting, but found no cause to espouse the cause of God in a public manner that day. The next day went to the youths' meeting at Kennet, which was to great satisfaction; my soul was so bended towards the people, that I could scarcely leave them, being engaged in a stream of the ministry, to extol the divinity of that religion that is breathed from heaven, and which arrays the soul of its possessors with degrees of the divinity of Christ, and entitles them to an eternal inheritance; and also introduces a language intelligible only to the converted souls which have access to a celestial fountain, which is no less than a foretaste of eternal joy, to support them in their journey towards the regions above, where religion has room to breathe in its divine excellences in their soul; here it is instructed in the melody of that harmonious song of the redeemed, where the morning stars sing together, and the sons of God shout for joy.

"1756, the 29th of the 8th mo. I visited Gwynedd meeting, where, in waiting in nothingness before God, without seeking or striving to awake my beloved before the time, by degrees my soul became invested with that concern that the gospel introduces, with an opening in these words: I think it may conduce to my peace to stand up, and engage in a cause dignified with immortality and crowned with eternal life. The subject raised higher and brighter, until my soul was transported on the mount of God in degree, and beheld his glory; where I was favoured to treat on the exalted station of the redeemed church, which stands on the election of grace, where my soul rejoiced with transcendent joy, and adored God. Returned home in peace."

"His conduct and conversation was innocent and edifying, being much weaned from the world and the spirit of it. He was careful not to engage in worldly concerns so as to encumber his mind, and draw it off from that religious contemplation, in which was his chief delight; which happy state of mind he maintained to the last, as evidently appeared to those friends who were with him towards his conclusion; to some of whom he expressed himself in the following manner, viz.

"I am free and easy, and don't know but I may recover; but if I should, I expect to see many a gloomy day; but, nevertheless, I am willing to live longer, if I might be a means of exalting religion, that the gift bestowed on me might shine brighter than it hath ever yet done, or else I had abundance better go now; for I think I have shone but glimmeringly to what I might have done, had I been still more faithful; though I cannot charge myself with a presumptuous temper, nor wilful disobedience, but I can say, it has often happened with me, as with the poor man at the pool of Bethesda, whilst I was making ready, another has stepped in. I am sensible that my gift has been different from some of my brethren. I have not been led so much into little things, but I am far from judging them."

"I have often to pass through the valley of the shadow of death, and have experienced the possibility of a soul's subsisting the full space of forty days without receiving anything, only living by faith and not by sight, provided they keep upon the foundation of conviction and conviction, and not turn aside, to take a prospect of the world, and desire to draw their comfort from visibles; they will be supported by an invisible yet invincible power; for he will be sure to appear, and when he doth appear at times, doth rend the veil from the top to the bottom, with an invitation, as Samuel used to say, (meaning Samuel Fothergill,) 'Come up hither, and behold the bride, the Lamb's wife.' Then the soul will have to enjoy, and see things beyond expressing; my tongue can do little or nothing at setting it forth. The soul will be filled with holy admiration, and say, 'Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?'"

"Although the soul has at times to behold the glory, splendour, and magnitude of the true church, or spouse of Christ, yet those extraordinary sights are but seldom, not often; though I have had at times to espouse the cause of God, yet there are times that the soul is so veiled and surrounded with temptations, and fiery trials, and all out of sight, that I have wondered that I was made choice of; but I have experienced, that they that would reign with Christ must suffer with him. I never expect to get beyond it, while I am clothed with this clog of mortality."

"People may have a regular outside, and be diligent in attending meetings, and yet know little or nothing of it; for formality and externals are nothing; religion is an internal subject, subsisting between Christ and the soul; I do not confine it to our name, but amongst the different names there are, that my soul is nearly united to, who are in a good degree, I do believe, in possession of that religion which is revealed from heaven; and I am in the faith, that there will be them raised up, that will shine as bright stars, and religion will grow and prosper, and the holy flame rise to a greater height than it hath ever yet done. I can say with the holy apostle, 'I have nothing to boast of, save my infirmities;' yet thus much I venture to say, that if I die now, I die a lover of God and religion. And after expressing a compassionate sympathy with the poor afflicted churches up and down, concluded with saying, 'Be of good cheer, little flock, for greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world.'"

"In the sixty-first year of his age, he was seized with an apoplectic disorder, which, gradually increasing, deprived him of life on the 21st of the sixth month, 1757, and was interred in this city the next day."

ELISHA BATES AND THE BEREAN.

In my last number, in addition to the continuation of the defence of the "Doctrines of Friends," against the original "Reviews" of the Berean, I noticed a reply in that paper to my first number. As this controversy with the Berean was not sought for by me, but urged upon me by a course of persevering misrepresentation, for more than twelve months together, so, in the present state of things, I feel no disposition to shrink from a fair and full examination of this opposition, which has been raised against the doctrines of Friends.

I have no doubt, that many have read the Berean with full confidence in the correctness of his statements, and thus have been led to adopt very erroneous ideas on subjects which have of late agitated the Society. It is time that these mistaken views, which have been presented by the Berean, should be corrected. These writers complain of my charging them with "unfairness," "misrepresentation," &c. I regret that occasion has been given for the charge; but as such has been the course abundantly pursued in their reviews, justice demands that it should be made manifest. In this exposure of unfair opponents, there can be nothing personal on my part; because the writers of these reviews, and even the editor of the paper in which they are published, having, perhaps for sufficient causes, concealed their names from the public, the censure which justly attaches to the articles themselves, cannot be applied, by the public, to individuals, as their authors. It rests simply on the wrong that is done—the exposure is of misrepresentations and unsound principles, and not of persons—to the former, that is, unfair statements and unsound principles, no countenance can possibly be due—towards those who have presented them to the notice of the public, I feel a degree of tenderness and pity. And while, as individuals, they are shielded from public censure by the concealment with which they have guarded themselves, I sincerely desire that they may carefully examine the ground they have taken, and finally be brought to acknowledge the truth as it is in Jesus.

The Doctrines of Friends Defended.

In my last, I brought a number of quotations from the works of the most eminent writers of the Society, on the doctrine commonly called the Trinity, in order to show that the quotations I had made in the pamphlet of Extracts, were fully in accordance with a large body of evidence, which the standard works of the Society afford. The reader will have observed, that I did not explain or construe the quotations which I have presented to his notice. A small degree of impartial reflection must have convinced him that they do not coincide either with Trinitarians or Unitarians. They reject the terms of DISTINCT AND SEPARATE PERSONS. And yet the reader is requested to take notice, that William Penn says: "Concerning the Father, the Word, and the Spirit, because we have been very cautious of expressing our belief of this GREAT MYSTERY, especially in such school terms as are unscriptural, if not unsound, we have, by those who desire to lessen our Christian reputation, been represented as deniers of the Trinity at large; whereas, we ever held, and as constantly maintained," &c. as already quoted. And George Whitehead says, "We question not, but sincerely believe the relative properties of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, according to Holy Scripture testimony." And R. Barclay says: "I freely acknowledge, according to the Scripture, THAT THE SPIRIT OF GOD PROCEEDS FROM THE FATHER AND THE SON, AND IS GOD." I have never, in any writing that I have published, used any language of my own, so pointedly and clearly opposed to the ideas propagated by the Berean, as these passages. And yet neither they nor I ever questioned, but firmly believed the divine Unity—that there is but one God. And here is the great mystery which W. Penn acknowledged after much observation and experience—which theologians have attempted in vain to explain, which infidels of all classes have considered as "foolishness," and which must for ever continue to "be hid from the wise and prudent," for the world by wisdom cannot know God.

The notice which the Berean took of the volume of Doctrines, began with strictures on an article first published in the National Gazette. One object of these strictures seemed to be, to hold out the idea that the work in question had not received that sanction in the Society which the discipline requires in such cases. In page 115, it was stated that the "meeting for sufferings had virtually violated the trust reposed in it," in sanctioning "the work of an individual as the creed of the Society." The whole, I consider an attempt to make a wrong impression on the minds of those who are not well acquainted with the regulations of the Society, in relation to the examination of books.

The writer certainly knew that the meeting for sufferings was fully invested, by discipline, with the power and discretion it exercised in the case. And he may now know, if he did not know it when he wrote the article in question, that work was examined at the time of the yearly meeting, 1824, when the meeting for sufferings was at its largest size; and the following year, after the doctrines had been in circulation several months, and thus the members of the Society had had an opportunity to be acquainted with its particular character, the proceedings of the meeting for sufferings, recording particularly the examination and approval of the work, were read in the yearly meeting at large—and the proceedings of that meeting were approved, without one single objection being expressed in the yearly meeting.

After two articles of this character, which appear to be editorial, the writer assumed the signature of "An enemy to creeds." And in this character he commenced in a manner which militates directly against himself.

"That a difference of opinion," says he, "existed among our primitive Friends on certain points, which the author [of the Doctrines] deems material, there is too much evidence afforded by their writings to admit of a doubt. But this difference then did not break, nor even in the least slacken the cord of their religious union. For they were too well grounded in all the essentials of Christianity; there was too much practical righteousness and holiness amongst them, to admit of a contention respecting opinions, the nature of which could be tested by experience, or the immediate operation or unfoldings of divine truth on their own minds; and adopting this as their primary rule of faith and practice, they were preserved from those violent collisions which had, for more than a thousand years, divided the Christian church."

This passage contains a direct vindication of the writings it was intended to condemn; as it clearly admits that they contain the sentiments of some of our "primitive Friends," and on those points which I deem material. Or why did the writer make this declaration of a difference of opinion amongst them, unless that, while he was unable to deny, and therefore reluctantly conceded, that the quotations I had made from their writings were evidence of their holding the sentiments expressed, he wished to have it believed that his opinions also were supported by the writings of other individuals of the same rank in the Society? Then, if my writings are supported by the authority of primitive Friends, as "there is too much evidence in their writings to admit of a doubt" that this is the case, he has certainly placed himself on the ground of opposition to "primitive Friends," by the course he has taken. Indeed, his entering into direct and personal controversy with the Doctrines of Friends argues, according to his own premises, a defect of practical righteousness and holiness. Nor does the inconsistency of his procedure in this controversy rest merely on his own position, which, he might perhaps say, was "inadvertently" laid down, but the example of early Friends is decidedly against him. We find those eminent worthies frequently engaged in controversy with open adversaries and anonymous writers, but never, no, never with their fellow members, who wrote and published doctrinal treatises, according to the order of the Society.

Francis Bugg, George Keith, William Rodgers, and perhaps some others, who had been members of the Society, wrote, and sometimes openly, against the regularly sanctioned works of Friends, but I believe the Berean will look in vain for examples to suit his own case, except among writers of this class.

Perhaps the case of William Rodgers may tend a little more fully to elucidate the subject. He was a merchant of Bristol, possessing an active but unruly disposition. When the Society were about adopting a system of church government, Rodgers was one who opposed that measure, on the plea, that as every one had received a measure of divine light, they should be left to the government of that alone, without being accountable to one another. And when Robert Barclay wrote his Anarchy of the Ranters, which was examined and approved by the second day's meeting in London, W. Rodgers wrote objections to that treatise, and circulated them in manuscript, in different parts of the nation. It was long, however, before he attained to the standing of the Berean. On an interview with R. Barclay, he gave a written acknowledgment of the impropriety of his conduct. The second day's meeting in London also issued a testimony against W. Rodgers, in which they say, that in circulating his manuscript "without so much as first giving either the said R. Barclay in particular, or the second day's meeting in the general, an account of his scruples or dissatisfactions," he has acted "contrary to all rules of brotherly love, Christian fellowship, gospel order, and exemplary practice of the church, to the defamation of the said R. Barclay, the great derogation of the Christian authority of the said meeting, and the general disservice of truth, especially being sent unto persons who are at present disaffected to the unity of the body of Friends."

This judgment of the meeting was signed by Charles Marshall, John Osgood, W. Penn, Thomas Elwood John Burnyeat, Stephen Crisp, and twenty-seven others. (See Barclay's works, p. 249.)

Rodgers, however, did not continue on the ground of repentance and amendment, but returned to his old work of writing against R. Barclay, and the work he had published with the unity of Friends.

But it may not only be observed, that our early Friends were not engaged in controversy against any of the doctrinal treatises, which were written by members, and published agreeably to the order of the Society, but they were not divided among themselves on those points, to support which I have made extracts from their writings.

The Berean has repeatedly represented them as so divided. But if he wishes to be believed, let him state what was the difference, and who they were that differed. Till he does this, the assertion may be regarded as destitute of foundation, and unworthy of further notice. And even if he could do this, he would still prove himself in the wrong.

FOR THE FRIEND. FRAGMENTS.—No. 4.

Thomas Wilson attended a meeting in London, at which a great concourse of people assembled, and amongst them two persons of rank in the world, who sat very attentively while a Friend was speaking, and seemed to approve what was delivered. When Thomas stood up, who was bald, and of a mean appearance, they despised him, and one said to the other, "Come, my lord, let us go, for what can this old fool say?" "No," said the other, "let us stay, for this is Jeremiah the prophet, let us hear him." So as Thomas went on, the life and power of truth arose and spread over the meeting in great dominion, which tendered one of them in a very remarkable manner; the tears flowed plentifully, which he strove in vain to hide. After Thomas took his seat, he stood up, and desired he might be forgiven of him, and of the Almighty, for despising the greatest of his instruments under heaven, or in his creation.

John Churchman records the following conversation, as related to him by John Kelden, which passed between a knight of the shire and one of his tenants, a member of our religious Society.

Landlord. So, John, you are busy.

Tenant. Yes; my landlord loves to see his tenants busy.

Landlord. But, John, where were you, that you were not at your quarterly meeting at York, the other day? I saw most of your staunch Friends there, but you I missed.

Tenant. Why, thou knowest I have a curious landlord, who loves to see his tenants thrive, and pay their rent duly, and I had a good deal in hand that kept me at home.

Landlord. Kept you at home? You will neither thrive, nor pay the better, for neglecting your duty, John.

Tenant. Then I perceive my landlord was at quarterly meeting. How didst thou like it?

Landlord. Like it! I was at one meeting, and saw what made my heart ache.

Tenant. What was that?

Landlord. Why, the dress of your young folks; the men with their wigs, and the young women with their finery, in imitation of fashions. And I thought I would try another meeting. So next day I went again, and then I concluded there was little difference, but the bare name, between us whom you call the world's people and some of you; for you are imitating us in the love and fashions of the world as fast as you can. So that I said in my heart, these people do want a Fox, a Penn, and a Barclay among them; and so turned from his tenant.

Christopher Story. Notwithstanding the endeavours of our persecutors, yet truth prospered, and there were many added to the church, insomuch that our dwelling houses were too small to keep our meetings in; so we saw it needful to build a meeting house, and purchased wood for that purpose; but the priest, with some others, petitioned the bench of justices in the time of sessions, not to permit us to build a meeting house; for they alleged, if we built a new chapel, they might pull down the old church; for by this time people's eyes were so much opened, that though the parish was five miles in length, yet sometimes not above five besides the priest and clerk were there. Three clerks were convinced, one after another, and came among Friends; and one of them, being so conscientious, told the priest, he could not say "Amen" to him, for he saw the priest himself was short; the priest replied, he might say "Amen," but all that would not do, so he left him.

William Reckitt. 1759. The quarterly meeting of ministers and elders began at Buckingham, on fourth day, 30th of the 5th month, which I attended, and also, on fifth day, a meeting for worship and discipline, and I thought different sentiments were getting in amongst them. If great care is not taken to keep to truth's teachings, and the unerring guidance of it, which will subdue and keep down all unruly spirits, there will be great trouble and uneasiness, if not separation in many places. For I saw an evil spirit of dissension was got into the church, and in the ways of its workings it appeared in divers shapes, in order to draw after it the hearts of the simple, and such as, like itself, are unstable; for it is an unstable spirit, and by this it may be known, and such as are led into its ways and own its workings. For they will be restless, not easy under the cross; but will cast off the yoke of Christ, and go from his teachings, meekness, and humility, into a haughty, proud spirit, which is rough, full of hatred and envy, despiseth counsel and will not bear reproof. This spirit, I thought I perceived working in the mystery of iniquity; but its time is not yet fully come to bring forth its monstrous births. The Lord's mercy is very great to his people, for this seed of the serpent hath hitherto been crushed, and put by in its puttings forth, and the true seed, though through hard labour and travail, hath been brought forth into dominion, to the praise of Israel's God. "I was at their monthly meeting at Buckingham, on second day, in which, through the prevalence and owning of truth, which came over the minds of the people, things were carried on well, both in the time of divine worship, and in transacting of the affairs of the church; for the power of truth kept down all restless and unruly spirits, which at times are putting up their heads in opposition to the testimony thereof, and are for trampling all discipline under foot." The applicability of this prophetic record to the events now passing within the limits of this yearly meeting, must be obvious to every one. This "monstrous birth" has been produced, and its character very fully developed, within the quarter of which this Friend writes. The libertine, infidel principles which have been so plentifully disseminated both privately and publicly, have yielded their natural fruits. Resistance to the discipline, which originated in divine wisdom, and the rejection of the characteristic doctrines of the Christian religion, have terminated in "separation" from the Society of Friends, and open violation of decorum and the just rights of the members.

Robert Jacob, of Wymondham, being chosen constable, was summoned before the justices, and refusing to take an oath to qualify him for that office, was committed to prison. He was so old and infirm that he could not dress nor undress himself without help, and some Friends was obliged to lodge with him in prison, to help him in and out of bed. He was afterwards imprisoned for tithes, and died a prisoner, being 80 years of age.

George Fox, speaking of his travels in America, says, "We went to Narraganset, about twenty miles from Rhode Island, and the governor went with us. We had a meeting at a justice's, where Friends never had any before; the meeting was very large, for the country generally came in, and people from Connecticut, and other parts round about. There were four justices of peace. Most of these people had never heard Friends before; but they were mightily affected, and a great desire there is after the truth amongst them. So that meeting was of very good service, blessed be the Lord for ever!" "At another place, I heard some of the magistrates said among themselves, "if they had money enough, they would hire me to be their minister;" this was where they did not well understand us or our principles. But when I heard of it, I said, It is time for me to be gone; for if their eye was so much to me, or any of us, they would not come to their own teacher. For this they, namely, hiring ministers, had spoiled many, by hindering them from improving their own talents; whereas, our labour is to bring every one to their own teacher in themselves." 1 John ii. 27. George Fox was no "sect master." He had no desire to draw people to himself, that he might be exalted, and considered a great "popular preacher." He made himself of no reputation amongst men. He trampled the love of fame under foot, and disinterestedly sought the everlasting welfare of others, not their flatteries any more than their wealth. Popular preachers may declaim with noisy vehemence against hirelings, while they love to be well paid with the applause of men, and to gather multitudes to their own standard and cause, rather than to promote the name and kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. Not so with G. Fox. He laboured to bring all to Christ, who shed his blood and died for them, and to exalt him as their Saviour and Redeemer.

FOR THE FRIEND.

In our remarks prefixed to the dialogue between Dr. Samuel Johnson and Mary Knowles (inserted in a late number of the Friend,) we disclaimed every disposition adverse to the fair fame of that great man; his writings abound with evidences of a mind deeply imbued with genuine piety; and it is with unfeigned satisfaction that we introduce to our readers the following corroborative attestation, that he died a true believer—a humble suppliant at the cross.

From the Christian Observer for January, 1828.

THE LAST HOURS OF DR. JOHNSON.

To the Editor of the Christian Observer.

Having observed in your publication a paper on "True and False Repose in Death," taken from Mr. Wilks's Christian Essays, in which the author has commented upon the last days of that great ornament of our national literature, Dr. Johnson, I wish, before the tradition is lost, most fully to corroborate his statements, on the testimony of my late revered father, who knew Dr. Johnson intimately, and always spoke of him as having become truly, before his death, "a child of God, by faith in Christ Jesus." Indeed, for several years, my father had observed in him not only an increasing knowledge of the way of salvation, freely through the merits and atonement of the Redeemer, a subject on which he delighted to hear my honoured parent expatiate in his truly affectionate and pastoral manner, but also a growing humility and piety, which showed that he had himself personally "laid hold of this hope set before him in the gospel," and found pardon and peace to his soul.

I regret that I did not collect, at the time, any memoranda of my father's frequent interviews with this eminent man, as they would have served to show that "the great Dr. Johnson," as he was emphatically called, did not, in his closing years, live, and certainly did not die, a formalist or a pharisee, trusting either wholly or in part to his own merits; but that his "conversion" to God, to use his own expression, though "late"—yet not so late, I feel assured, as his last illness—was true, and that he died a penitent sinner at the foot of that cross from which no sincere penitent was ever rejected.

Dr. Johnson, during the latter part of his last illness, had sent his servant Franky, as he familiarly called him, every day to our house, to know when my father, who was absent from London, would come back, with a request that he would attend him, and I wrote frequently to urge him to hasten his return for that purpose. The moment he arrived, he went to the doctor's house, but found him speechless, though quite sensible. My father spoke to him; most affectionately directed him to the only Saviour, and to dependence on his merits and atonement alone, and reminded him of the only source of true repose in life or death. The doctor showed, by pressing his hand, and other signs, that he well understood, and thankfully received the address. He expired the next morning, and my father always regretted not having been able to attend him according to his wish; but he did not, he could not doubt his having found mercy through faith in the infinite merits of his Saviour, in whose sacrifice he alone confided for pardon and acceptance with God.—Your affectionate friend and servant,

CHRISTIAN IGNATIUS LA TROBE.

AMERICAN COLONY AT LIBERIA.

Copy of a letter from Capt. Nicholson, of the United States Navy, to Hon. H. Clay.

WASHINGTON, March 17, 1828.

Sir,—Having visited the colony of Liberia on my return to the United States, from a cruise in the Mediterranean, I cheerfully comply with your request, by presenting to you such views of its present condition and probable growth, as occurred to me in the course of that visit.

The soil in the possession of the colonists is rich, and will produce a superabundance for the support of the colony, as well as for external commerce. Sugar, cotton, coffee, rice, and various trees and plants yielding valuable dyes, and medicinal gums, can be cultivated with success.

The population is now 1200, and is healthy and thriving. The children born in the country are fine looking, and I presume can be raised as easily as those of the natives. All the colonists, with whom I had any communication, (and with nearly the whole I did communicate in person, or by my officers,) expressed their decided wish to remain in their present situation, rather than to return again to the United States. I cannot give you better evidence of the prosperity of the colony than by mentioning that eight of my crew, (coloured mechanics,) after going on shore two several days, applied for, and received their discharge, in order to remain as permanent settlers.

These men had been absent from their country upwards of three years, and had, amongst them, nearly two thousand dollars, in clothes and money. Had they not been thoroughly convinced that their happiness and prosperity would be better promoted by remaining among their free brethren in Liberia, they would not have determined on so momentous a step as quitting the United States, perhaps for ever, where they all had left friends and relatives.

The appearance of all the colonists, those of Monrovia as well as those of Caldwell, indicated more than contentment. Their manners were those of freemen, who experienced the blessings of liberty, and appreciated the boon. Many of them had, by trade, accumulated a competency, if the possession of from three to five thousand dollars may be called so. As a proof of the growing importance of the commerce of the country, more than 100 hogheads of tobacco had been used during the last year, and the demand was increasing. Ivory and camwood are now the prominent articles received in exchange for foreign imports; other dye woods, and many medicinal gums and roots, will be hereafter brought in, as they are already known to exist in the interior.

I take this occasion to suggest the propriety of permitting any of the colonists to purchase an additional number of acres of land from the agent. By permitting this, the more enterprising will be enabled to turn their attention to the culture of the coffee tree, which grows spontaneously in the vicinity of Monrovia. In fact, the soil will produce every thing, which a tropical climate will allow to arrive at maturity.

From the good order and military discipline which appear to prevail among the colonists, I am induced to believe they could repel any attack which could be made upon them by any native force. They have arms, and having associated themselves in volunteer companies, have acquired the knowledge of using them with effect, against any probable force which might be brought to bear upon them, by undisciplined and scattered tribes in their vicinity. It is true, they have no harbours for large vessels, as all their rivers are obstructed by bars. This is not of much consequence to their coasting trade, as they have many harbours and inlets, which are accessible to small vessels. Large vessels have also one advantage, that most of the heavy winds are off the coast, which gives them a lee and a smooth sea. Off Cape Mesurado there is a good anchorage, and on the pitch of the Cape they have planted a battery, which will protect any vessel that may need it, from piratical depredations.

I would respectfully suggest, for your consideration, the propriety of making the principal agent of the colony "Commercial Agent," as cases have occurred on the coast, when such an appointment might have proved the means of rescuing American property from the hands of foreigners, who have maintained possession of it in consequence of there being no legalized American agent on the coast.

The importance of this colony, as regards the native tribes of the coast, is, in my estimation, great. They already begin to perceive that it is civilization and the blessings of religion which give superiority to man over his fellow man. They had supposed it was the white skin; but now they see, in their neighbourhood, men of their own colour, enjoying all those advantages hitherto deemed peculiar to the former. This has elicited a spirit of inquiry, which must tend to their benefit. The philanthropist may anticipate the day, when our language and religion will spread over this now benighted land. The slave trade will cease as the colony progresses and extends its settlements. The very spot, where now exists a free people, was a depot for the reception of manacled slaves. This fact alone is entitled to consideration, and ought to arouse the zeal of the friends of humanity every where.

Our large cities complain of the number of free blacks, who have, by their petty crimes, filled their penitentiaries. Would not the colony be benefited by the labour of these men, and the community relieved by their transportation? I certainly think the colony sufficiently strong, both morally and physically, to prevent any injury for their admission. I do not pretend to point out the mode or character in which they ought to be received. This I leave to those who are more able to judge on the subject. I see that the colony is now in want of numbers to clear and cultivate a country, which will amply repay them for the labour.

I take leave to mention, that the climate is much like that of all similar latitudes; and, as the land is rich, and most of it still in woods, we must expect that bilious fevers will sometimes prevail; but I do not think it more unhealthy, to the coloured people, than our extreme southern coast; and as the soil of Liberia becomes cleared and cultivated, I have no doubt it will be found as healthy as any other southern latitude. It was, I believe, never intended that the white man should inhabit this region of the globe; at least we know that the diseases of this climate are more fatal to him, than to the man of colour. They luxuriate in the intense heat, while a white man sinks under its exhausting influence.

I confess, sir, that since I have visited this colony, I have felt a strong interest in its prosperity, and hope that it will thrive under the auspices of a society, among whom are some of our most distinguished citizens.

If what I have communicated shall prove instrumental, in the slightest degree, to sustain you in the cause of humanity, and of this degraded race, I shall rejoice that my duty called me to witness the growing prosperity of the colony of Liberia.

With sentiments of high respect, I have the honour to be your obedient servant,

JNO. B. NICHOLSON,

Late Commander of the U. S. Ship Ontario.

The Hon. HENRY CLAY,

Vice President of the Colonization Society.

When persons have been trained up in a constant and sincere regard to their religious and social duties, sensibility in time anticipates the suggestions of reason, and passion faintly resists the dictates of conscience: the general course of life is almost mechanically exact; our best volitions are formed without anxious deliberations; and our best deeds are performed without painful efforts.—Parr.

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH, 20, 1828.

Cultivation of the Grape.—As the season for planting grape vines is at hand, we have selected the following descriptions of some native varieties of this agreeable fruit, which we venture to recommend to the particular attention of our country friends. Foreign grapes rarely succeed beyond the shelter of our cities, and, in general, require more attention than their uncertain produce is worth; the kinds here recommended demand but little beyond an annual pruning, and a trellis to climb upon.

The Isabella Grape.—This is a native of Dorchester, in South Carolina, from whence it was brought to Long Island a few years since. The fruit is a dark purple, of a good size, oval form, juicy, and very sweet; and is deemed, by some persons, superior to most foreign grapes. The vine grows most luxuriantly, and requires no covering or protection during the winter, and produces more abundant crops than any other yet cultivated in this country. A single vine has been known to yield eight bushels of fruit annually, for several successive seasons. It ripens in the ninth month.

The Orwigsburg Grape.—This is a white grape, sweet, with a thin skin, and of moderate size; it is hardy, yields abundantly, and is highly esteemed, even by connoisseurs. It ripens in the ninth month, and takes its name from Orwigsburg, in Pennsylvania, where it was first noticed.

The Elsinborough Grape.—A large juicy grape, of a blue colour. The vine is hardy, and a good bearer, and ripens its fruit in the ninth month. It was first noticed in the neighbourhood of Elsinborough, New Jersey, and thence derived its name.

The Alexander Grape.—This grape was first discovered in the neighbourhood of Philadelphia, and is unquestionably a native, although it has been sometimes called the Constantia and Cape of Good Hope grape. The fruit is round, black, very sweet, and contains rather a tough pulp, with a flavour somewhat musky, and slightly resembling the common fox grape; the bunches small and numerous. The vine is hardy, and requires no shelter.

The Scuppernon Grape.—This is a native of North Carolina, where it is extensively cultivated, and used for making wine, which is said to be of a good quality. It is also hardy and a good bearer, but the fruit is said not to be very pleasant to most palates.

For the information of those who may desire to be supplied with any of the above varieties of the grape, it may not be amiss to say, that they may be obtained, with many other kinds, of Caleb R. Smith, successor to Daniel Smith, at his extensive nursery, near Burlington, New Jersey; where also is for sale, an assortment of fruit trees, which, for care in the selection, is not, perhaps, surpassed in the United States.

From the present time to about the tenth of next month, is the season for grafting on the native or wild vine. J. Adlum, in his memoir on the cultivation of the vine, &c. recommends the practice, and says it may be performed either by cleft or whip grafting, according to the thickness of the plant, by using cuttings well preserved in the ordinary way. A friend of ours, Samuel Webb, of this city, who has had experience in it, speaks in high terms of its utility, but insists upon the operation being performed at the root, or, rather, in immediate proximity to it; that it is less liable to miss by that means; besides, that it obviates the difficulty of shoots putting out below and overgrowing the graft. Most of the varieties, whether foreign or domestic, will succeed in this mode.

By the Algonquin, from Liverpool, we have received the last number of the London Quarterly Review, the Christian Observer for January, and the London Magazine for January and February. Their contents have enabled us to add something to the variety of our present number, and will furnish additional matter for future use.

In the article on our first page of to-day, "The Indian Chief," we were pleased to recognise the autograph of a favourite correspondent. The well told incidents in the life of the magnanimous, humane, yet spirited Enrique, are well calculated to engage the sympathies of our readers.

The alteration which we have ventured to make in one stanza of the piece headed "The Nativity," will, we hope, meet the approbation of the writer, with whom we would solicit a further intercourse.

We have been repeatedly urged, by a number of our subscribers, to republish the series of essays, which, in the course of the past summer and autumn, appeared in a weekly paper of this city, called "The Saturday Evening Post." Containing, as they do, a clear and able exposition of the real grounds of difference between the Society of Friends and the new sect, which has risen up out of those differences, and written under circumstances more favourable to a full elucidation of the points at issue, than can be expected to attend any future attempt, we have concluded to comply with the solicitation, and to commence with the first in order the ensuing week. They will be printed under the inspection of the author, with due regard to a correct revision, and accompanied with notes, where it may be needful to a better understanding of their scope and tendency.

FOR THE FRIEND.

We have seen several accounts in the newspapers relative to examinations of some of the children of the Pennsylvania Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, at Annapolis, Washington, and Baltimore, where they have been recently conducted by their teachers, for the purpose of extending that institution's sphere of usefulness; we have selected parts of the examinations for the gratification of our readers.

As an instance of his acquaintance with Grecian history, Darlington gave, at the request of a gentleman, the following sketch of Leonidas. "He was the most celebrated king of Sparta, who distinguished himself, by opposing the innumerable armies of Xerxes, with a handful of intrepid soldiers, at the straits of Thermopylæ. Leonidas and his 300 men fell 480 years before the Christian era."

In modern history, the same individual wrote of Franklin: "He is the most well-known philosopher to every American reader. The invention of the lightning rod is ascribed to him. He died in Philadelphia at the advanced age of 84 years, A. D. 1790."

Gratitude was described by Conrad to be "A return of thanks for benefits received."

Sager was interrogated by natural signs, as follows: "How long do you expect to live?" Ans. "I do not know, but God does, he only knows the appointed time." "When you die, will you exist hereafter?" Ans. "Always, always." "Where?" "I do not know—God knows."

The following questions were propounded to each of the pupils:

What has interested you most since your arrival in Baltimore?

By Darlington—"A visit to the venerable Charles Carroll of Carrollton."

By Conrad—"Nothing has interested me most, all my life. I am only pleased with every object I see, when it has much curiosity."

By Sager—"I do not like to choose."

G. held the following dialogue with Sager: "What business do you intend to follow?" Ans. "I intend to follow to be a farmer, or a cabinet maker, when I leave school." "Are you not desirous to hear music?" Ans. "I wish to a great deal, but I am deaf and dumb."

"Is it proper to envy those who possess the faculty of hearing?" Ans. "No."

"Why are you made deaf and dumb?" Ans. "I do not know, God thinks himself about it, he alone knows."

But the following answers of one of the pupils are truly striking and beautiful.

Ques. What is hope? Ans. The blossom of happiness.

DIED, on Wednesday last, 16th inst., in the 80th year of his age, CHARLES LLOYD, Esq., banker, of this town, a member of the Society of Friends. His long and active life was marked by great intelligence in business, unaffected piety, and zealous exertions to promote the welfare of his fellow creatures. How often has his simple, yet impressive eloquence, been heard amongst us, pleading the cause of the oppressed African, advocating the diffusion of the Holy Scriptures, and promoting the education of the people. For the prosperity of the general hospital he always manifested deep interest, and aided it by his personal exertions; as treasurer, he kept the accounts with his own hand, during a period of fifty years. In public subscriptions he set a generous example, and in private charity he was most bountiful and kind. Cheerfulness and piety were mingled in his character, with a simplicity truly patriarchal. Strict and conscientious in his own conduct, he manifested a Christian and benevolent spirit in regard to others; and whilst he endeavoured to act up to the principles of the society in which he was educated, he felt unbounded love and charity, and prayed for the prosperity of all denominations of Christians. To a very numerous family he was a most affectionate father, counsellor, and friend, setting them an example of a religious life and conversation, and reaping, during seasons of great trial and affliction, the divine consolations of his Lord and Master. Hopeful unto the end, he showed his mournful friends with what peace a Christian can die.

THE INDIAN CHIEF.

The mountainous tract in which Enrique and his followers found refuge, was seventy leagues long, and more than twenty broad. It was sterile and desolate; inaccessible to horses and cattle; abounding with craggy and precipitous rocks, deep glens, and enormous caverns; affording innumerable places of concealment and defence; and in every respect calculated for the security of its occupants against a very great superiority of force. The Indians subsisted partly on the produce of secluded patches of ground cultivated by their women and children; partly on the flesh of the wild boar and other game which they chased with hounds. When these resources failed them, as, from their unsettled life and constant state of warfare, often necessarily happened, the Spanish settlements on the skirts of the mountains were made to supply their wants. They eluded the parties sent against them, if too strong for opposition, by a constant change of residence, moving from one place to another with such secrecy and despatch, and so perfectly concealing the vestiges of their march, that during a pursuit of many months it was often impossible to discover the slightest trace of them. When they chose to show themselves, it was generally from the summit of the lofty rocks, the ascent of which required two or three days, and was accomplished by their pursuers, only that they might discover the fugitives upon some more distant and less attainable pinnacle. Enrique himself lived in the most inaccessible places; with the exception of those immediately around him, few of his own partizans knew where he was to be found; so that they could neither betray him through treachery, nor be compelled, if taken by the enemy, to point out the place of his abode.

Many Indians were excited by the success of Enrique to imitate his example; but being without his humanity or his talents, they were unwilling to restrain their followers within the same limits of self-defence, and were unable to provide so effectually for their protection. In consequence of their depredations, many villages in the neighbourhood of the mountains were deserted; and the murders and other crimes of which they were guilty, spread terror among the inhabitants even of the larger towns. It is true that their imprudence generally led to their discovery and destruction; but new leaders arose in their place to run the same course and share the same fate; and it was well understood that so long as Enrique should be able to maintain himself in defiance of the government, the evil would continue. As a proof, however, of his own disapproval of their conduct, it may be mentioned, that he exerted his influence, as far as it could avail, to bring them within proper order. A small band had rendered itself notorious by the number of its robberies and murders. Enrique sent a message to its leader, at the distance of one hundred leagues, requesting him to desist from his depredations, and prevailed upon him, greatly to the advantage of the Spanish population, to become one of his own captains.

After the failure of the embassy of Remigio, the efforts of the Spaniards were redoubled; but always with the same result. Small parties were insufficient to make any impression; and large bodies of troops, from the scarcity of provisions in the highlands, and the impossibility of conveying baggage through so rough a country, could not be supported long enough to penetrate to the haunts of the Indians. Two commanders, each with 300 men, were successively foiled; and a third, with a smaller number, was for two years in or near the mountainous region, entering it by various routes, and traversing it in almost every direction, without gaining any material advantage. The contest had lasted about nine years, when a captain, named San Miguel, who had come out a boy with Columbus, and was well acquainted with Indian warfare, was appointed to lead a small army against Enrique. After a fatiguing march of several days among the hills, he came at length in sight of the Indians. The two parties were posted on opposite sides of a deep ravine, through which a rapid and unfordable stream flowed five hundred fathoms beneath them; so that, though sufficiently near for a conference, they were as effectually separated for all the purposes for protection to the weaker body, as though a day's march intervened. An opportunity was now afforded of coming to a good understanding. San Miguel proposed that they should make an amicable adjustment of their differences. Enrique cheerfully expressed his assent, observing that he had long wished for peace, but that it rested with the Spaniards, and not with him. The following terms were then offered:—that he and his partizans should be permitted to live in any part of the island they might prefer, entirely independent of the Spanish authority, provided they should abstain from all hostilities, and give up a quantity of gold which had fallen into their hands. The terms were accepted, the gold returned, and peace concluded. Enrique, however, was too well acquainted with the treachery of his enemies to trust himself in their power. He continued to reside among the mountains, and for a long time was not seen by the Spaniards.

The conditions of the peace were not well observed. It is probable that the wish to recover the gold had been the chief cause of the favourable terms offered by San Miguel; and this object being accomplished, little scruple was made in violating a treaty which had the sanction only of the general, and was too offensive to the Spanish pride to be deemed binding on the government. Hostilities were, therefore, resumed. Though Enrique himself remained quiet, parties of revolted Indians were constantly annoying the settlements; and repeated expeditions were ineffectually sent against them. The trouble of the country at length arrived at such a height as to call for the interference of the king of Spain: and as it was believed that if Enrique could be induced to exhibit confidence in the Spaniards, and to combine his own influence with theirs in suppressing the disorders, quietness might be restored, it was resolved to pledge the royal faith for his safety and honourable treatment.

Indian illustration of Christ's advent and propitiatory Sacrifice.

Among the converts to the Christian faith in one of our Indian tribes, was one whom they distinguished by the title of "the good Peter," and who, with a truly apostolic spirit, used to preach the gospel to his poor benighted brethren. He one day addressed them in language to this effect: "My brothers, the Great Spirit loves all his creatures: he loved them so much that he sent his own Son to bring them home to him: but his Son was so bright (brighter, my brothers, than yonder sun,) that we could not look at him; therefore he wrapt himself in a mantle of flesh (wrapping his blanket around him) that he might live with us, and that we might see him. The good Saviour has shown us the way to his Father, and lest we should lose the path, he has marked it with his blood."

I cannot shut my eyes to the frightful devastations of war, be it just or unjust, be it necessary or unnecessary. I cannot deafen my ears to the loud and piercing lamentations of my fellow creatures, be they sufferers in this or any other civilized countries. In truth, to those intelligent, dispassionate, and benevolent friends of mankind, who turn away from senseless clamour to solid fact; who ascend from prejudices to principles; who consecrate that which is sound in philosophy by that which is pure in religion; who measure the properties of things by their effects, and the merit of agents, not by their professions, however plausible, nor by their rank, however elevated, but by their actions alone: to all such persons, it may now and then be difficult to reconcile appearances with realities, commands of legitimate authority with the scruples of sober reason, the prudential regulations of human governments with the righteous and awful dispensations of Divine Providence.—Parr.

GEMS FROM THE ANTIQUE.

The art of engraving on stone was probably derived from India, was extensively practised in Egypt, and seems to have been cultivated among the Israelites. It is recorded, that of the stones on the high priest's breastplate, on which the names of the twelve tribes were cut, one was a diamond, the hardest of fossils. But it was among the Greeks that this elegant art was perfected; and their gems are distinguished equally by grace and correctness in the execution, and by vigour and taste in the design. Indeed the practice of engraving on stone naturally arose from that "longing after immortality," which is the characteristic of genius. With us, men endeavour to secure their thoughts from the effect of time by multiplying copies; among the ancients this result was sought by consigning them to the most indestructible materials. Thus the annalists of Egypt engraved their narratives on the rude rock, and the poets of Greece committed their beautiful fancies to the purest gems. Of these many are still preserved in the cabinets of Europe, and offer, to use the eloquent language of Croley, "an endless treasure of the brilliant thoughts and buried wisdom, the forgotten skill, and the vanished beauty of a time, when the mind and form of man reached their perfection." A little volume was some time since published in England, containing engravings of some of these gems, with poetical illustrations by the writer whom I have quoted, and who has since become better known here by his work on the Apocalypse. Of these illustrations, two or three have been selected, which seem to me eminently beautiful, and to be, at least, free from any sentiment which would be misplaced on the pages of "The Friend."

GENIUS BOUND.

A beautiful winged figure; the hands fettered, and the attitude expressive of constraint and dejection.

Glorious spirit! at whose birth
Joy might fill the conscious earth:
Yet her joy be dashed with fear,
As at untold dangers near:
A comet rising on her gloom,
Or to light her, or consume!

Beauty is upon thy brow!
Such sad beauty as the bow,
Child of shower and sunbeam, wears,
Waked, and vanishing, in tears:
Yet to its splendid moment given
Colours only lit by heaven.

Thou canst take the lightning's wings,
And see the deep forbidden things;
With thy starry sandal tread
On the ocean's treasure bed;
Or make the rolling clouds thy throne;
Height and depth to thee are one!

Prophet spirit! thou canst sweep
Where the unborn nations sleep;
Or, from the ancient ages' shroud
To judgment call their accepted crowd;
Earth has to thee nor birth, nor tomb—
Nor past, nor present, nor to come.

Yet here thou sit'st, while earth and heaven
Are to thy radiant empire given.
Alas! I see the manacle!
And all thy soul has felt the steel;
Thy wing of fire, thy beauty, vain—
For Genius dies beneath the chain.

THE SHELTER FOR COLOURED ORPHANS.

The man whose virtues are more felt than seen,
Must drop indeed the hope of public praise,
But he may boast what few that win it can.

COWPER.

It is a remark which is too old to surprise by its novelty, but not so antiquated as to be unworthy of remembrance, that those who would effectually promote the reformation of society, must begin with the youth. If the morning of life is permitted to pass away unimproved, the habits of thought and action, formed during that interesting period, must present a very stubborn barrier to advancement in usefulness and virtue during the subsequent stages.

Tacitus, that eminent master of life and manners, attributes the virtues of the ancient Romans to the care that was bestowed upon the youth. To cultivate the infant mind, was then the glory of the female character. Women, of the most illustrious families, superintended the education of their offspring.* In all ages and countries, the character of the population must greatly depend upon maternal care. Never, says an able writer, was a great man known to be the son of a silly woman, and seldom, he might have added, of a careless one.

The philanthropic Benezet did not overlook the importance of education, in his efforts to meliorate the condition of the coloured race. The school to which he devoted so many years of his useful life, and to which he appropriated the principal part of his posthumous estate, is a lasting memorial of his solicitude for the welfare of this neglected class, and of his opinions respecting the means of promoting that welfare.

There is still a portion of the coloured race, who are peculiarly exposed to the evils of neglected education and familiarity with vicious example. Those who lose their parents during the dependent period of infancy, even if left in possession of wealth, and surrounded with family connections fully competent to provide for all their physical wants, are justly considered as objects of commiseration. With us the name of an orphan, like that of a stranger among the Greeks, is at once a passport to sympathy. But how seldom are our warmest sympathies awakened in behalf of those who appear destined to move in a sphere widely different from our own. The coloured child, whom nature or oppression has deprived of its natural protectors, is not unfrequently left to work its way through the world with little of that sympathetic care which we accord to those of our own complexion. But this destitute class has recently engaged the sympathy, and awakened the exertions of a part of our population. A number of unassuming females, chiefly, if not exclusively, members of the religious Society of Friends, have associated for the purpose of providing a "shelter for coloured orphans," from the merciless blast of moral and physical ills.

This interesting association, during the five years which have elapsed since its formation, has kept the noiseless tenor of its way, amidst difficulty and discouragements, that might have checked a hardier band. Intent on the accomplishment of their benevolent designs, and with slender funds, collected chiefly by their own exertions, these maternal philanthropists have brought into successful operation a system worthy of imitation, and deserving of extensive patronage. The enterprise merits a more specific description.

The plan appears to have originated about the year 1814, with a pious woman,† who is since removed beyond the reach of censure or applause. She at that time communicated her prospect to some others of her sex, and made some efforts towards the promotion of an establishment for the reception of the class of orphans above described: but not finding her philanthropic designs sufficiently encouraged, the prospect was suspended for a time.

The solicitude for the objects of her meditated bounty, does not appear to have been relinquished. About the year 1820, she was conversing with a female friend respecting the probable issue of a disease which appeared to have fixed upon her frame, and which soon afterwards consigned her to the house appointed for all living, when this subject was brought into view. The Friend expressing a belief, that in case her own life was spared, the work would be attempted, the former immediately made a small appropriation to be applied in aid of the institution, in case it should be formed within a limited time after her decease.

In the first month of 1822, a more effectual effort was made, to form an establishment for the purpose originally contemplated. About twenty* female friends, having convened to deliberate on the subject, agreed to attempt an establishment, on a scale adapted to the smallness of the number likely to be at first entrusted to their care. Measures were adopted in that and the succeeding month, for the regular organization of the company; for the collection of funds to meet the necessary disbursements; for obtaining suitable persons to take the immediate charge of the orphans; and for bringing within the reach of their bounty, such children as were the proper objects of it.

The design was to accept of coloured orphans between eighteen months and eight years of age; to provide for their education and support during their continuance in the Shelter; and at proper ages, to bind them out, with suitable masters and mistresses, where they might receive the needful preparation to provide for themselves. It was soon discovered that children, of the description to be provided for, were sometimes withheld from partaking of their bounty, by the fears and jealousies of connexions. Those who were very ill qualified to provide for the moral or physical wants of their orphan relatives, were not always willing to entrust their helpless charge to strangers, whose motives of action they were unable to appreciate. From this cause, combined perhaps with some others, the association were left to begin their operations with a solitary incumbent.

A coloured man and his wife, of respectable character, were engaged to take charge, under the direction of a committee of the association, of the orphans who might be admitted into the Shelter. The house in which they resided was fitted up for the purpose, and furnished with the needful accommodations. The first orphan was admitted into the Shelter on the 7th of 3d month, 1822. But this incipient institution was soon deprived of the services of the matron whom they had engaged. Humble as was her station in life, and short the period assigned to her services in this concern, her sudden decease made a very sensible impression on the minds of her employers. In their notice of the event, they have given a very short but expressive testimony to the worth of Rosanna Jackson.

In the fourth month a constitution was adopted, the preamble to which is given, as illustrative of the feelings by which the promoters of this institution were actuated.

"If any apology be necessary for introducing to the notice of the humane this obscure class of dependents upon public bounty, we trust that apology may be founded upon a sense of justice due to a people who have endured the oppressive burden of slavery for many generations, sustaining, in the estimate of public opinion, the odium of a characteristic deficiency of mental capacity, and practical default of moral principle: the unhappy result of the combined influence of long continued ignorance, poverty, neglect, and evil example.

"The ruling motive of the association is to provide a place of refuge for such of the offspring of this people, who, being orphans, have a double claim upon charitable munificence; a claim which must be allowed in itself to be equally valid from whatever cause they are deprived of parental protection; whether their natural guardians have been removed by the inevitable stroke of death, or in the more deplorable event which sometimes occurs, that the bonds of affection are violated, and parents severed from their children by the relentless hand of avarice and cruelty."

In the tenth month, the association having a prospect of several additional incumbents, removed their furniture to a house in Noble street, which they rented for the purpose, at ninety dollars a year; and settled a family there, ready for the reception of such coloured orphans as might be entrusted to their direction and care. Written rules were provided for the government of the family, in which strict attention was enjoined to the physical comfort of the children; and care to establish regular moral habits.

The proceedings of this association, in the organization and subsequent management of this interesting institution, evince a degree of devotion to the cause in which they were engaged, and of judgment to conduct the concern with propriety, highly deserving of the confidence and support of the wealthy and humane.

In the eighth month, 1824, a new location of the Shelter was effected. The family was removed to No. 166, Cherry street, where it still continues.

From the account of receipts and expenditures, which are exhibited in the annual statement of the treasurer's account, it is easily inferred that the funds have been well economised; yet the unavoidable disbursements still press hard upon the means of supply. The attention of the public has been more than once called to the subject, by notices in the periodicals of the day. A few legacies have fallen to the association, but the funds are principally composed of donations and annual subscriptions.

In the spring of 1825, a donation of one hundred dollars was made to the association, by a society of coloured women, who had united for the purpose of affording assistance to the sick of their own colour; and at one time contemplated an extension of their plan, so as to include the objects embraced by our female friends. Their donation was vested in a city water loan, on which interest is receivable at six per cent. This is designed as the beginning of a fund for the purchase of a permanent location for the Shelter.

It is very desirable that an enterprise of so noble a character, so well calculated, not only to promote the improvement of an oppressed and degraded race, but to diminish the future expenses of government, should be placed beyond the reach of pecuniary embarrassment. The very class whom these benevolent females are endeavouring to mould into useful members of society, are the children, with whom, if they continue to be neglected, we may reasonably expect, at a future day, our jails and penitentiaries to be crowded. If society can be secured, by the education of our youth, from the depredations of lawless and untutored manhood, certainly policy, no less than humanity, dictates the course to be pursued. If any of those who are entrusted with an abundance of wealth should feel disposed, in making their final arrangements, to remember the Shelter, their posthumous liberality may probably be a blessing for ages to come, and can scarcely, within the reach of possibility, be productive of harm.

The foregoing interesting narrative of the origin and progress of the shelter for Coloured Orphans, is extracted from the African Observer, a valuable monthly journal, conducted by Euoch Lewis. We have before noticed this excellent work in the columns of "The Friend," and it was with sincere regret that we received a request to inform the subscribers to it, that it is suspended for the present. We consider its suspension a real loss to the public; but the general apathy which prevails in relation to the momentous subject of negro slavery, the unwillingness of those who are involved in the evil to see its mischiefs exposed, and the inevitable consequences of persisting in it clearly set forth, renders the number of those who cheerfully support such a work, too small to warrant its continuance. Those, therefore, who have hitherto received the numbers, will consider this a sufficient notice of their discontinuance; and such as are in arrears for it, will confer a favour on the editor by forwarding to him the amount of their subscriptions.

Extract from the Eleventh Annual Report on the State of the Asylum for the Relief of Persons deprived of the Use of their Reason. Published by direction of the Contributors, third month, 1828.

The managers having been left at liberty, by the late meeting of the contributors, to publish the annexed statements and questions, and the legal opinion obtained in answer thereto, have thought it would be useful and satisfactory to make them public, for the information of the friends of the Institution.

The circumstances which gave rise to the application to counsel are as follow: Testimonies of disownment having been issued by their respective monthly meetings in the cases of two of the managers, a minute was made at a meeting of the Board in the first month, stating it as the prevailing sense of the managers, that the seats of those managers were thereby vacated. One of them who was not then present, attended the next meeting, and questioned the right of the managers to make such a minute. Desirous of ascertaining whether they had acted with strict regularity, the managers agreed to apply to counsel learned in the law for advice and information. Other reasons influenced them to pursue this course. In the year 1817, a record book of the names of the contributors was prepared by a committee of the association, who laid it before the annual meeting in 1818, and recommended in their report, that it should be given in charge to the managers for their care and revision. The report was adopted,* and the managers have annually since that time appointed a committee to examine and correct the list of contributors. The changes heretofore occurring in this list, from year to year, were so slight, that no difficulties were experienced, in properly notifying the contributors of the annual meeting. Since the last annual meeting, however, very considerable changes had occurred. Testimonies of disownment had been issued by monthly meetings against upwards of forty of the contributors; and the validity of these testimonies was in many cases denied by the party against whom they had been issued. Many of the monthly meetings that were contributors to the Asylum had divided, and each division claimed the right to appoint an agent for the Asylum. Unwilling, under these circumstances, to take upon themselves the whole responsibility of deciding upon these points, it was agreed to state the facts to counsel for advice and information. The eminent individual to whom the committee applied, was designated in the Board as the one in whose opinion their entire confidence would be reposed.

It may be added, that in making out the statements and questions, not only every fact which the committee believed to be essential to a fair representation of the whole subject, but every fact and question which were suggested to the committee as essential in the estimation of others, were clearly stated.

Phila. 3d mo. 26, 1828.

Doubts having been expressed respecting the construction and bearing of certain articles in the Constitution of the Contributors to the Asylum, the following statements and questions are submitted to Horace Binney, for his opinion thereon.

* At an annual meeting of the Contributors to the Asylum, held 3d mo. 18th, 1818.

By the adoption of the report of a committee made at this time, it will become the duty of the managers, annually, to inspect, at the time of settling the accounts of the treasury, the book to be kept by him for recording contributions, donations, and bequests to the Institution.

Extracted from the minutes,
CLEMENT BIDDLE, Clerk.

1. Art. 2d provides that any monthly meeting belonging to the Yearly Meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia, contributing two hundred dollars, shall be considered a member of the Association, and have the right to appoint an agent to act on its behalf at the meetings of the Association. Art. 6th declares that every such meeting may recommend one poor patient, at one time, on the lowest terms of admission.

The monthly meeting of Little Britain, belonging to the western quarterly meeting, paid the requisite contribution. It was afterwards, by the regular process of the discipline, transferred to another quarterly meeting belonging to the yearly meeting of Friends held in Baltimore, as a branch thereof, which it continues to be. Does the monthly meeting thereby lose either or both of the above recited privileges, viz. 1st, that of appointing an agent, and 2dly, that of recommending on the lowest terms?

2. The yearly meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia stands adjourned, to meet at the time prescribed by the discipline, viz. the third second day in the fourth month next, at the meeting house in Mulberry street. A meeting, also called by its members the yearly meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia, was, at a meeting of its members held in the tenth month last, appointed to be held on the second second day of the fourth month, in this city. This Association is chiefly, if not entirely, composed of persons who were at the time of the yearly meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia, in the fourth month last, members thereof; and who then voluntarily separated from, and have since withdrawn their connection with that body, and held separate meetings. It is composed like that of subordinate meetings held quarterly, and these of still subordinate meetings held monthly.

Several of the monthly meetings, which are contributors to the Asylum, are situated as that of Abington is situated, viz. The larger part of the members calling themselves Abington monthly meeting, hold meetings monthly, and make report to and attend the quarterly meeting, that sends representatives to the yearly meeting that is to meet on the second second day of the fourth month: i. e. to the newly organized yearly meeting. The remaining portion of the members also hold meetings monthly, and make report to, and acknowledge the authority of, and attend the quarterly meeting which sends representatives to the yearly meeting held on the third second day of the fourth month: i. e. to the old established yearly meeting referred to in the constitution of the contributors. Both the meetings above mentioned, (viz. those held monthly,) have appointed agents to the Asylum, who will probably attend the meeting of the contributors with minutes of their appointment. Which of them is, under the constitution, to be considered as entitled to a seat therein?

3. The second article of the constitution declares, that every individual subscribing six dollars per annum, or twenty-five dollars at one time, and being and continuing a member of the religious Society of Friends, shall be considered a member of this Association. This article further states as follows: "A contributor who has been disunited from the religious Society of Friends and reinstated therein, may resume his rights of membership in this association." What is the proper evidence to the contributors of the fact, that an individual is disunited, and, therefore, no longer entitled to membership in this Association?

The following case has occurred: A. B. a contributor to the Asylum, was a member of Green street monthly meeting at the time that meeting was laid down by Philadelphia quarterly meeting, and its members attached to the monthly meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the northern district. A testimony of disownment, disuniting him, has been issued against him by the northern district meeting. A. B. contends that Philadelphia quarterly meeting had no power to lay down Green street monthly meeting, and denies that he was within the jurisdiction of the northern district meeting.

It is proper further to state, that the large majority of the members of Green street monthly meeting agreed, at the monthly meeting in the fourth month last, to apply to the quarterly meeting of Abington, to be received as a constituent branch thereof, and declared their connexion with the quarterly meeting of Philadelphia to be dissolved. At the quarterly meeting of Philadelphia, held in the fifth month last, (information of these proceedings being received through a committee previously appointed,) the monthly meeting was laid down; at Abington quarterly meeting, held a few days afterwards, the application was received, and the monthly meeting adopted as a branch of that quarterly meeting. The meeting being informed by a committee from Philadelphia quarter, that it considered the members of Green street meeting as being still under its jurisdiction. Those members of Green street monthly meeting who made this application, hold meetings monthly; make report to and attend the meeting held quarterly at Abington, which sends representatives to the yearly meeting that is to be held on the second second day of the fourth month; and the existence of a monthly meeting at Green street, as a monthly meeting of the religious Society of Friends, is asserted by the persons who thus meet and make report through the meeting held quarterly at Abington, to the yearly meeting last named. The members of Green street meeting, who disapproved of, and opposed the above mentioned application to Abington quarterly meeting, concurred in the decision of Philadelphia quarterly meeting laying down their monthly meeting, and acknowledge themselves to be within the jurisdiction of, and attend the monthly meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the northern district. Are the contributors bound to inquire into the circumstances of this case beyond the fact of the testimony having been issued?

4. In case an individual, a contributor to the Asylum, and a member of Abington monthly meeting, is disunited by that portion of the members which adheres to the old established yearly meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia, does such a testimony of disownment deprive him of the privileges held under the constitution as a contributor?

5. Are the rights of a contributor affected by a paper purporting to be a testimony of disownment issued against him by an association, calling itself a monthly meeting of the religious Society of Friends, calling itself Abington monthly meeting for instance, which does not hold its meetings in subordination to, or religious fellowship with the old established yearly meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, which existed at the time of the formation of the constitution?

6. The third article declares, that the managers shall continue in office for one year, and until others are appointed; supposing A. B. and B. C. two of their number, to have been disunited from the religious Society of Friends by their respective monthly meetings; are their seats as managers thereby vacated? and if so, is it competent to the managers to make an entry upon their minutes, so declaring?

7. By the constitution of the contributors, &c. can any other person than a member of the yearly meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia, be a manager of the Asylum?

8. The original subscription paper fixes the annual payment which entitles to membership at ten dollars, and the life subscription at fifty dollars. Was it competent to the contributors, at any subsequent period, to lower these terms? In other words, are those persons who pay six dollars annually, and twenty-five dollars in one sum, legal contributors?

It is proper to state that the subscription paper which is herewith submitted, was handed round, and received the signatures of the original subscribers in 1813. The constitution was adopted in the same year, and engrossed on the minutes of the contributors; it has frequently been printed by their direction, and has been altered in some of its provisions according to the mode prescribed in the 8th article. But it has never had the signatures of the members affixed to it.

In case a monthly meeting belonging to a neighbouring yearly meeting, should address certificates to the meeting held monthly at Green street, as to a regular monthly meeting;—or in case a neighbouring yearly meeting should hold a correspondence with the meeting which is to be held on the second second day of the fourth month next; ought these circumstances to have any influence in the consideration of the above questions?

REPLY.

I have deliberately considered the preceding statement and questions, and am of the following opinion:

1. That the monthly meeting of Little Britain, although transferred to a quarterly meeting belonging to a different yearly meeting from that of Philadelphia, has not lost the privileges of appointing an agent, and recommending a patient on the lowest terms. At the time of its contribution, it was a monthly meeting belonging to the yearly meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia, and there is no provision that its title shall depend upon its so continuing, which is the rule of qualification for individuals contributing as members of the religious society of Friends. I give this opinion, however, upon the presumption that the yearly meeting of Friends in Baltimore, is in unity with that yearly meeting of Friends in Philadelphia, which was alone in existence in this city, when the Asylum was founded. If such unity should cease to exist, I do not mean to say what would be the effect of that circumstance upon the rights of the monthly meeting of Little Britain.

2. The constitution of the contributors, to the Asylum, acknowledge but one yearly meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia; and it is supposed, that, according to the discipline of Friends, there can be but one true and regular yearly meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia. If there be two or more in point of fact, one or more must be irregular, and must be held in violation of the discipline maintained by the others. One only can therefore be the standard for determining the qualifications of members of the Asylum; and the question is, how this one is to be ascertained.

It must be recollected, that neither the contributors, nor the managers of the Asylum, are an ecclesiastical body, competent to decide upon religious qualification, except as it is a matter of fact decided by some other competent body. They may judge whether monthly meetings or individuals are in unity with a particular yearly meeting, or are members of the religious Society of Friends; but they can adjudge it only by an outward sign given by a body, whose competency they are bound to acknowledge.

The question is, what yearly meeting of Friends in Philadelphia the contributors and managers are bound to respect, and to take as the standard for deciding the fact of qualification; and I entertain no doubt whatever, that they are bound to respect, and to take as their standard for the purpose mentioned, that yearly meeting which alone existed at the institution of the Asylum, and which has continued, since that time, to hold its meetings as one and the same body, by regular appointment or by adjournment, and in the same place. A yearly meeting, composed of quarterly and monthly meetings, having no unity with the original yearly meeting, but having separated from, and withdrawn their connection with that body, cannot be recognized for any purpose, by the contributors or managers of the Asylum. The separation may have been right, or it may have been wrong. Until that matter shall be decided by some tribunal, to whom all parties must render obedience, the new yearly meeting, together with its quarterly and monthly meetings, unless the latter are recognized by the old yearly meeting, cannot be considered as having a legal or regular ecclesiastical existence. It is of no effect, that a neighbouring monthly meeting, duly constituted, may have addressed certificates to one of these monthly meetings, as to a regular monthly meeting; or that a neighbouring yearly meeting may have corresponded with what I have termed the new yearly meeting in Philadelphia. No neighbouring yearly meeting can either decide or affect the question, so far as regards the managers of the Asylum, or its contributors. They must regard the state of the fact as conclusive, until by law it is held otherwise; and the state of the fact is, that the original yearly meeting has continued in possession down to the present moment, exercising all the authority which the rules of discipline give to that body; and to this yearly meeting only, and to its officers only, can they resort, to learn what quarterly and monthly meetings are recognized by it; and to such monthly meetings only, and to their officers only, can they resort, to learn whether members claiming to belong to certain monthly meetings, do really belong to a monthly meeting in unity with the yearly meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia.

It must be obvious that any other course than that which I have pointed out, would throw upon the contributors to the Asylum, and its managers, the duty of deciding a question, to which they are not legally competent; and that the course which is pointed out compels them to decide nothing but a fact, to which they are competent, namely, the continuance of the old yearly meeting in Philadelphia down to the present time, in the full assertion, and in the exercise also at least over a considerable body of Friends and of meetings, of all their authority under the acknowledged Rules of Discipline.

I am clearly of opinion, then, that if both the monthly meetings, so called, of Abington, or any two monthly meetings, in the like predicament, send agents to attend the meeting of the contributors, one only can be received, namely, the agent of the monthly meeting in unity with, and recognized by the old yearly meeting of Friends held in Philadelphia; and the evidence of such recognition is to be sought for in the certificate of the clerk of the proper superior meeting, namely, either of a yearly meeting, who will identify the recognized quarterly meeting by its clerk, or such other indication as may be preferred; and the clerk of such quarterly meeting will in like manner show and certify the monthly meetings recognized by it. An agent presenting a testimonial of his agency, signed by the clerk of a recognized meeting, will be entitled to perform the duties of agent for that meeting in the affairs of the Asylum; and no other agent can be.
